34. And Simon remembered the smell of the fire and brimstone, and fearing that Ahrimanes was upon him, he struggled valiantly to get in, and the two guides pulled and the others laid on, and the stone which divided the gates being (as was said before) very soft, they at length pulled him quite through the stones, having one leg in each gateway.

35. And when Simon was got within the city, and had finished sneezing, the guides bid him weep for his sins. So Simon wept, and the tears burst forth as a great and mighty flood, and the bridge that spanned from the one nostril to the other was carried away by the force of the waters, and still he wept.

36. So he wept till the springs dried up and the waters abated.

37. And they repaired the bridge that was carried away by the floods, and Simon rested himself after his manifold labors.

38. And after some little while Hydrocephalus and Cannotbedamned took Simon by the nose and led him to a certain pool called Bapto.

39. And when Cannotbedamned came to the pool, the spirit again came upon him so that he staggered under his burden, and presently fell into the water.

40. But having, by the grace of the king Jah, been preordained to die in the air, he was not drowned, but was drawn out again.

41. And the spirit having departed from him, he laid hold of Simon, and Hydrocephalus laid hold of him also.

42. And Hydrocephalus addressed himself to the congregation,* saying, Men and brethren, listen to me, and open wide your ears that the words of knowledge may enter. Forasmuch as this sheep hath entered into the sheep-fold of our great king, it is needful that he should be well washed, and ye are gathered together to the sheep-washing, therefore it behoveth us to tell him what is necessary.

43. And Hydrocephalus addressed himself to Simon, saying, Hear, O my son, and give ear to thy shepherd; this day art thou become one of our flock; yea, thou art henceforth a young ram amongst the sheep of our great king. Therefore, see to it that thou obey the voice of thy shepherd; meddle not with the young ewes, and give up thy fleece when it is required of thee; what thy shepherds teach, that shalt thou steadfastly believe, and question not their sayings.

44. But I, Philo Aletheia, hereabouts fell asleep, not being any longer able to listen to the preacher, so that I heard not the remainder of his speech, though I doubt not that it was exceedingly pleasant, and caused the congregation to shed many winks, and mayhap tears also. However, I was awoke from my sleep by much bleating of the heavenly flock; and, looking up, I saw Simon gathering himself out of the pool, and Hydrocephalus helped him.

45. And the guides gave Simon another glass called Faith, and it was exceedingly like unto that called Imagination, nor could any man distinguish between them, except he were skilled in such matters; and he could use his glasses together, either before the other, and they fit into each other, and when he looked through them so great was their virtue that he could by them see many great and wondrous sights, though nothing was present.

46. And Simon was greatly delighted with his glass, and rejoiced exceedingly, and the guides with him. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

*After much study, we have, we believe, discovered the import of these gates, and the figures belonging to them. They are symbolic (prophetically of course) of the various creeds of the present day. And the exactness of the metaphoric representations is marvelous in the extreme; and, in our estimation, puts the inspiration of the whole MSS. beyond dispute. The gate, verse 6, represents Catholicism; the three crowns and key are the well known symbols of the Pope. The gate, verse 7, is typical of Huss and his followers (the word Huss, in Bohemian, meaning goose); he was roasted by order of the Pope, and therefore, roast goose is his appropriate symbol; and, as everybody knows, Bo is the proper thing to say to a goose. The gate, verse 8, is the Lutheran; the temple and crown, in juxtaposition representing the union of Church and State. The gate, verse 9, is the Calvinistic; the temple and the lamb referring to their claim that Christ, and not the State, is head of the Church. The gate, verse 10, is the Quaker's gate. Fox is the name of the founder of the sect, and a lighted lantern symbolic of the "inner light" they boast of. The gate, verse 11, evidently has reference to the Baptists. That of verse 12 to the "Adventists," believers in the immediate advent of the Millennium, the "old man" is Time, who is about to have the extinguisher put upon him by the bellyless angel behind him.—TRS.

*In the Greek tongue Hydrocephalus imports water on the brain.

*This is a somewhat abrupt intimation of the presence of a congregation, no previous mention being made of one; but we can only translate the MS. as it really is, we have no idea of improving the language of inspiration.—TRS.

THE MEDICINE OF SUNSHINE.—The world wants more sunshine in its disposition, in its business, in its charities, in its theology. For ten thousand of the aches and pains, and irritations of men and women we recommend sunshine. It soothes better than morphine. It is the best plaster for a wound. The good Samaritan poured out into the fallen traveler's gash more of this than of oil. Florence Nightingale used it on the Crimean battlefields. Take it into all the alleys, on board all the ships, by all the sick-beds. Not a pailful, not a cupful, but a soulful. It is good for spleen, for liver complaint, for neuralgia, for rheumatism, for failing fortunes, for melancholy.—Faith and Works.

WHAT A LEAF SAID.—I am a fading leaf, watching for the signal for my dissolution. You think as you like about man, as he fades and falls—make the end of your life here as mournful as you please—dishonor death by evil names and images but leave one of your sad analogies. I protest against being one that shudders at dissolution. I might have done that in June, when my life was all to live; but in September, when I begin to loosen from the spray, the loosening seems as good as the budding.

It is a sweet mystery, to be made clear, no doubt, some time. So I shall die as I have lived, with my face to the sun and the loving heavens, and welcome the autumn frost, as I welcomed spring sunshine.—Rural Home.

Communications.

An Open Letter to O. B. Frothingham.

MR. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, Dear Sir: I have perused your sermon, as published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 23, 1878, styled "The American Gentleman," and from which I infer you are an advocate of hard money; and, being, as I am, convinced that a full legal-tender irredeemable paper money, issued directly to the people from the national treasury, is the only money within the limits of possibility for the Government to supply in quantity adequate to meet the immense business demands of 47,700,000 American citizens, I have taken the liberty to propound the following questions for your consideration, and trust I shall see your response in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER at the earliest date consistent with your engagements:

1. What is money?
2. What do you mean by the term "honest money"?
3. What kind of money issued by the United States would be an honest money to offer as a legal tender in England, France, or Germany, and that would, or does, pass as honest money "among men of all nations, and which laborers could safely take for their toil"?
4. Are the present national bank bills an honest money?
5. Are the greenbacks (so called), with the exception of "duties on imports and the interest of the public debt" stamped upon them, honest money?
6. Is demonetized silver an honest money?
7. Is depreciated currency an honest money?
8. Will the coin to be issued in accord with the Silver bill lately passed by Congress over the President's veto be honest money?
9. Is any paper currency an honest money?
10. Is the gold coin of the United States honest money?
11. Which of these kinds of money have the producers or laborers usually received for their toil?
12. Is it possible for one nation to issue any money "the essence of which would be a common value all over the civilized world," or, in other words, a legal tender for either debts or commodities?
13. Did the United States ever issue any money of any kind that was, or is, received by other nations for customs at par with their own gold coin?
14. What do you consider is the true cause of so many failures of all classes of business men, of the unparalleled and increasing number of foreclosures, the general paralyzation of all branches of industry, that has turned millions of laborers to beggars and starved others to death?
15. What, in your opinion, would prove an effectual remedy for our cruel and increasing hard times?

As you are a public man, and probably an older, and certainly a much wiser, man than your interrogator, judging from your wide reputation as a profound thinker, I have proposed the above questions as a truth seeker, feeling that it is quite possible my present views may not be correctly based; yet my convictions are so strong that the theory of the greenback advocates, practically exemplified, would be a universal panacea for our present financial ills, that I shall be disappointed if you succeed in answering them in harmony with the financial theory intimated in your sermon.

I have proposed fifteen questions, some nine of which can be answered by a simple yes or no, if such mode is your pleasure. The finance of our country is the paramount question that now agitates the minds of thoughtful American citizens, and for the best of reasons. Judging from the knowledge you have manifested in all your sermons that I have had the pleasure and profit to peruse in the ever-welcome TRUTH SEEKER, and especially in the sermon to which I have referred, in your mention of the true relations between capital and labor, I have every reason to expect that your reply will not be of the New York Tribune style—very prolific of assertions, but ruinously deficient in proofs—but that you will give these fifteen questions those candid replies which the laborers' interests demand, and which you will comprehend at a glance from that high moral standpoint upon which you have so eloquently and truthfully based "The American Gentleman."

With assurances of esteem, I am,

Yours for the truth, D. W. FILLEBROWN.

East Highgate, Vt., March 24, 1878.

The Labor Question.

MARGARET CHAPPELLSMITH'S ARGUMENTS.

Bland's Silver bill will as surely benefit the laboring class as its demonetization in 1873 has damaged their interests. You speak of the greenback dollar as an irredeemable paper currency. Let me tell you, if you do not know it, that the greenback dollar will be redeemed, as certainly as the gold or silver dollar will, in all the necessaries of life. It is as certain to be redeemed as the Government bond is, and the value of it is above gold. We cannot have them exchanged for gold, and burned up, and continue to use them; and the mass of the people want to use them. Capitalists make great complaint now, with gold at only two per cent premium. The truth is, they gave loans with low-priced currency, and now want to bring it to a gold standard to collect in.

You say the industries do not employ labor as they formerly did, "but this is not caused by what passes for money." I tell you it is. I do not mean to say that manufacturers cannot get money at reasonable rates; but the consumer cannot buy till he pays his debts, or will not, and so there is no market for goods. There is not, and cannot be, an over-production of goods in general; but a scarcity of the medium of exchange may and has caused a want of consumption. You say, "There is not a demand for the supply of money there in circulation." I know there is not, at six and ten per cent, and there never should be. If the laboring class could get money at one per cent per annum, prosperity would soon revive. I know that in that case not so many persons would be enabled to sit back in the easy chair and perform the part of consumers only, but that would be all the better. Let us arrange our finances so that six hours' labor per day will be enough for any man to make a living, and so that the shrewdest will have to work one hour a day to make a good living, and all will be well. Of course, I mean the greatest good to the greatest number. You speak of the number of laborers that need employment. All ought to need employment, so that one man cannot subsist on another man's labor without laboring for him in return. If we would prohibit interest on money entirely, it would pay a greater dividend in manufacturing, shipping, and traffic than ever was safe to loan it at for interest. You say, in substance, that "irredeemable paper money reduced the humble-minded English laborers to the condition of paupers." I tell you it did no such thing. It was the resumption of specie payments while the poor were in debt that did it. If the English Government had preceded the resumption of specie payments with five or ten years prohibiting credit by abolishing execution, all would have went well. You quote Paine against paper money, but he probably never thought of it except on the gold-basis idea, which always has been a failure. You ask, "In what are farmers to be benefited by their obtaining a higher price for their products?" Why, my dear, in paying their debts in a currency similar in value to what it was when their debts were contracted; and all farmers are in debt in Illinois, whether they ever borrowed a dollar in their lives or not. Each man owes his pro rata of State, county, and town indebtedness, if nothing else. You say a good deal about the creditor being cheated in having to receive his loan in a less valuable currency than that in which it was made; but you do not intimate that it would be injustice for the laboring man to pay in a more valuable currency, though he is usually the weaker one, and should be the one protected by law; for the spirit of our laws is to protect the weak against the strong. It is as plain a proposition as ever was presented that a farmer can get more dollars for a load of corn, or a horse, cow, or hog, or the laborer for a day's work, when greenbacks are low than when they are high, and each one will pay a dollar debt. Then give the people the benefit of one billion of currency for five years, and declare that after that the Government will reduce its currency and prepare for specie resumption on a gradual scale, so as to let the debtor class get out of debt, and all will be well. When the crisis of '73 came, capitalists asked for more currency; and now, when the people want it restored to what it was, they are hooted as inflationists. But be assured if this Congress does not do the will of the people, the next one will have to. I respect your different opinion, and I am, Yours truly, J. R. PARKS.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion Reviewed.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The "Bennett-Teed Discussion," which has come to my notice through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has interested me greatly, and it is with regret that I learn of its discontinuance. The exceedingly able manner in which you have defended the negative of the question in debate, and your very courteous and manly treatment of your opponent, must win for you the good-will of all who have followed the discussion from the beginning to its close. Whatever may be the opinion of the reading public concerning the clearness or obscurity, the soundness or unsoundness, the coherence or incoherence of Mr. Teed's argument, it, to my mind, carries with it evidence of the possession of a knowledge of theologic and scientific truth, which, however obscurely elaborated and expressed it may be, deserves the encouragement and aid of thinking men. Out of these "visionary vaporings," as you have expressed it, there drop some clear, well coined thoughts—however startling and novel—which have, to my mind, the form of scientific facts. His presentation of evolution and involution as coördinates and coincidentals, simultaneous and eternal in operation, is, I think, a new thought to most men; yet it would be as easy to conceive of a positive without a negative as of evolution without involution as its coördinate.

His declaration, also, that the normal relative position of substances is defined by their specific gravity or levity seems not to be without reason. That gases diffuse and intermingle is not to my mind proof that they do not exist in strata. Because moisture exists diffused through the atmosphere it is no proof that it is nowhere gathered into seas. The hydrogen that is being constantly disengaged or produced at the surface of the earth must of necessity be diffused through the atmosphere and mingle with the gases near the earth in its ascent to the normal position of levity, unless it speedily combines with other substances to form compounds. Only three or four years ago, an aeronaut put forth through the public press the declaration of his belief that because of the constant disengagement of hydrogen at the earth's surface, and of its levity as compared with atmospheric air, there must of necessity be a hydrogen sphere above us. Because we do not know with what or how it combines to return to the earth again, and thus repeat its eternal round of change, it does not invalidate the almost self-evident fact that a hydrogen sphere exists above our atmosphere. We cannot easily conceive of a substance, whose atoms move easily upon themselves, as sinking below or even into another substance of greater specific gravity than itself; nor can we more easily conceive of a substance rising above or even into another of greater specific levity than itself.

That substances are found out of their normal spheres or positions by the operation of forces does not, to my mind, invalidate the correctness of Mr. Teed's assertion. A light, impervious sack, filled with air and plunged under water, would rise to the surface—to its own element—and there remain. One filled with hydrogen and plunged beneath the water would not only rise to the surface but would continue to rise through the atmosphere and ascend to its highest limit, if not impeded by its envelope, or, at least, till it reached a substance of equal specific gravity with itself. If it were dropped from a more tenuous sphere, above the hydrogen, it must descend through it till it reaches its own substance, but not beneath its own substance and into another of greater specific gravity. It seems to me that this is self-evident and needs no proof, and that Mr. Teed has here announced the discovery of a law of the physical universe which further investigation will confirm—a law as much as gravitation, or attraction, or repulsion, is a law. That substances are diffused and found out of their normal position does not disprove it.

The normal position of water seems to be at or near the surface of the earth, but we find it diffused above and beneath this position, else we should have no rain. If we could accept the assertion of Mr. Teed as a fact, the displacement of the atoms of a substance from the normal position of its main body by the forces which integrate and disintegrate—as of water, oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, carbonic acid gas, etc.—would seem to be necessary and in accordance with physical laws, and not opposed to law.

One, under the head of "Tedious Wisdom," has attacked Mr. Teed in a manner that may be amusing, but it can hardly be regarded as logical.

Nor do the distinguished scholars he brings to his aid help him much. He arrays these men in line of attack with evident satisfaction, but we find their assault as destructive to himself as to Mr. Teed. He quotes Dr. Büchner as telling us that "Mind is the product of matter." If a product of matter, itself is matter, we must accept Mr. Teed's theory of the conversion or transmutation of substances. If it is matter in another form or condition from that from which it is supposed to proceed, it should still contain some of the elements or properties of matter—and elements or properties which can be demonstrated—for he quotes Moleschotte as saying, "Nitrogen, carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, sulphur, and phosphorus, possess their inherent properties from eternity," and DuBois Reymond as saying, "A particle of iron remains the same whether it crosses the sky in the meteor stone, rushes along in the wheels of the engine, or circulates in the blood through the temples of the poet. These qualities are eternal, inalienable, and untransferable." If these scholars are correct, and mind is a product of matter, being a product is matter (for it is declared to be "indestructible, imperishable, and immortal," and its qualities "eternal, inalienable, and untransferable"), and must possess the elements and properties of matter, which should be revealed by the same tests as declare the presence of the elements and properties of matter elsewhere. If it is not matter, but yet is a product of matter, then matter is transmuted and transformed and becomes something else, and matter as such is not "indestructible, imperishable, and immortal" (Büchner), "eternal, inalienable, and untransferable" (DuBois Reymond) and does not possess its "inherent quality from eternity" (Moleschotte).

If matter is the producer or cause of mind, then mind is an effect of matter; but I neither know nor can conceive of an effect which in its order does not become a cause. We know that mind is a cause. We both perceive and feel its effects every hour of our lives. The logician, who, as a theologian, scientist, or socialist, has built up a vast fabric, is witness. The orator who cries, "Let us march against Philip; let us conquer or die," or who arouses us to a sense of vassalage with "Give me liberty, or give me death," or he who stills the angry mob by a word, or sends the blood tingling to our finger tips and causes our frame to shiver with emotion, furnishes both objective and subjective evidence that mind is a cause.

If a cause, it is because it acts upon something or some no-thing, and the something or some no-thing in turn perpetuates the act in all its formations and transformations. I can not conceive of no-thing (except the no-thing be the thing in essence and not the thing in existence) as acting upon something. If mind is a thing it must have the properties of a thing. The difficulty seems to arise from our not being able to distinguish and express the subtleties of the universe which our minds perceive, but which our physical senses cannot grasp or take the least cognizance of. This would indicate to my mind that we must be the possessors of more than the five senses which belong to the body, viz., seeing, hearing, feeling, smelling, and tasting; and that these are but the faculties by means of which other and higher faculties are set in operation—the channel through which the mind is fed and sustained.

If I understand correctly the article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 23d, Mr. Fiske has declared that "Mind was a function, not a product of the organization." You, in your third reply, make this statement; "This mind being merely a function, and purely a product of organization" etc. Büchner declares "Mind is a product of matter in an organized form." Alas! "who shall decide when doctors disagree."

You say in your third letter, "Something was never produced from nothing." In effect you declare that something labored and brought forth nothing, for you affirm that something—matter—produced mind; that mind (in fourth letter) "is not matter; it is not substance," hence is nothing. Unless we possess within this material organization and its organs of sense, another corresponding and related organization, "which is not matter" and "is not substance" with its organs of sense, I cannot conceive it possible for us to take cognizance of products which are neither matter nor substance. With what shall we cognize them?

You say it is an "utter impossibility to create something from nothing," but you seem to unconsciously represent this nothing, mind, as acting and being acted upon; as having perception, sense, motion, quantity, quality, grasp, and powers, when you say, "To my mind this position seems more reasonable," "But such a conception is too absurd for any sensible [having sense, perception] mind to entertain for a moment," "My mind is more or less disturbed and perturbated." (Can you disturb nothing?) You also speak of more or less mind, and of differences in quality. You surely do not mean to say that there is more or less of nothing, and that it has different qualities! "Your mind is capable of grasping something better," you say to Mr. Teed, and of Jesus say, "Numbers of men have lived in the world who possessed greater powers of mind." Taking these sayings of yours concerning mind, and your declaration that it is a product of matter, it is a puzzle to me how you can escape what to me is an inevitable conclusion—that mind is both cause and effect; or how you can demonstrate to the satisfaction of thinking and intelligent men that mind "is not matter; it is not substance" therefore nothing.

It seems to me that what Mr. Teed has said concerning the integration and disintegration, or the production and destruction of water, fairly challenges attention and investigation, which are something better for scientific purposes than ridicule and contempt—the hostile batteries which all ages have turned upon the "visionary," who sometimes proves to be the "substantial." Time was when water was believed to be a simple substance, and not a compound of two, as we believe to-day. Time may be when we shall know that water is more than oxygen and hydrogen. Time was when intelligent men believed the earth to be stationary. Time is when men believe it to revolve.

While I would render all honor to the noble scholars and workers of past and present time, I do not forget that they have put forth gross errors as scientific truths, which were believed and taught and sustained, and which were subsequently set aside as unscientific and untrue, or only partial truths. Mr. Collins tells us that oxygen and hydrogen will mix, but he does not call the mixture water. Until he has added the third element, or force, he has no water. What becomes of the force or substance generated by the "gun-barrel process," which enters into the water to produce or liberate the hydrogen? Mr. Collins asks himself, "Where does the heat go to?" and then says, "That is a question that no one ever expects an answer to." This does not settle the question. It is a legitimate one, though not answered and perhaps not admitting of answer at present, but it is one which we have a right to ask, and which we ought "to expect to have satisfactorily answered sometime." Once it would not have been thought possible to measure the distances of the planets correctly or even approximately so. He says, "One might just as well ask, Why is water fluid instead of solid?" Well, why is it? and I would ask, Why is it solid instead of fluid, and what causes it to take such form, and to become more bulky as it cools, contrary to the law govering most other substances? Before oxygen and hydrogen are chemically united, they are simply oxygen and hydrogen; afterwards, they are neither, but a new and different substance, having none of the properties of either. We have no more assurance that oxygen and hydrogen are simple substances than the ancients had that water was. We merely know of nothing to the contrary, and are limited to this for the present. No man has a right to set limits and bounds to the powers and activities of the human mind. In producing hydrogen from water by electricity, something—call it substance, force, mode of motion, what you will—is generated by the metallic plates and acid solution, which becomes an element in the separation or formation of the two gases; and I am not aware that any man has ever told us what became of it. A writer in the Boston Journal of Chemistry says: "It is now pretty generally conceded that ozone must be an allotropic form of oxygen, unless oxygen, instead of being an element, is a compound, of which ozone is one of the constituents." The same writer continues: "That ozone is either oxygen or a constituent of oxygen would appear to be proved by the fact that it can be produced by sending electric sparks through pure, dry oxygen sealed up in a glass tube. If this be done, the bulk of the gas is diminished somewhat, and the presence of ozone can be detected by the smell as well as by chemical tests." Another writer says: "Ozone is changed by heat into oxygen." "Ozone has a certain work to do, and in doing that work is transmuted into oxygen." In Ganot's work on physics we are told, "Its true nature is not accurately known. Some regard it, and with great probability, as an allotropic modification of oxygen, and others as a teroxide of hydrogen."

Should hydrogen and oxygen hereafter be discovered to be compounds instead of elements, our teachings as to "what is water, and how produced" would undergo a change, the extent of which is not easy to conjecture.

Mr. Sickles says to Mr. Teed: "I am in good company, while you are alone in the advocacy of your pet theories." Now, I confess to a "sort of weakness" for the man who stands alone for "conscience sake," unless I believe him to be completely in the wrong, and deserving a good beating. It is no crime to stand alone, yet the world has too generally regarded it as such, if the man who stands alone proves to be a disturbing element. Every man who has been made the nucleus of a great reformation, whether of the religious, socialistic, scientific, or philosophic thought of mankind, has at the beginning stood alone; and in past time the opposition has generally been something worse than a newspaper attack. In reviewing these few prominent points of the "Bennett-Teed Discussion," my desire is to bring them more forcibly and with more distinctness to the minds of your readers for their further consideration. Confident that the truth will, and desirous that it should triumph, I am

Yours most respectfully, W. Kennedy.

Remarks.—We cheerfully admit that Mr. Kennedy is a very able defender of Mr. Teed's philosophy, and we will not undertake to say that in all of his positions he is wrong, while we are as ready to confess that our knowledge of the abstruse the imponderable, as well as of many other departments of the Universe, is quite limited. We wish we knew a great deal more than we do.

As to a stratum or sea of hydrogen, we have no special objection to it, nor does the idea strike us as extremely unreasonable or improbable. There undoubtedly is above our atmosphere a light form of matter, and perhaps it is as likely to be hydrogen as any other substance. What the ether is which scientists hold fills inter-planetary and interstellar space is not known. That there is something there can hardly be doubted, for light could not travel through a perfect vacuum. That something may be hydrogen for all we know to the contrary. As, however, so few of the primates are found in nature in a pure or uncombined state, it seemed improbable at first that vast quantities of hydrogen should exist in a pure state above the atmosphere. As willing, however, as we are to waive all objections to this theory we cannot understand what relation, either way, the matter has to Jesus Christ being Lord God Almighty, and Creator of heaven and earth.

Mr. Kennedy has sandwiched us between Prof. John Fiske and Büchner, making us to agree with both. So long as he places us in such good company, and makes us to harmonize with them we cannot complain.

Much of the difficulty about what mind is, and what it does, can, we think, be obviated if the term brain be used instead of mind. It is the brain, solar plexus, and nervous system that do the thinking, and not the mind. The mind is simply the thoughts, and thoughts are a motion of the brain, and are no more a form of substance than is speaking, seeing, hearing, or walking. These are produced by the action of the vocal organs, the visual organs, the auricular organs, or the locomotory organs or muscles, as thoughts are the work of the mental organs. Muscle does the work of the world, and brain moves the muscle. The brain occupies the highest position in the body, and has by far the highest order of work to perform.

The brain is intimately connected with the other parts of the body, and depends largely upon the conditions of the stomach, the digestive and assimilative apparatus, the circulatory system, and all that goes to make up a well-conditioned organization. As a rule, the better and healthier the physical apparatus, the better the brain and the better the mind. There may be slight confusion between the terms product and function, but thinking is just as much a natural physical process as any other action or function of the body. Animals also have the sense in common with man, but as their brain and mental organs are far more imperfect or undeveloped than man's, they therefore think and reason far less perfectly. Perception, reason, and memory are found in the animal kingdom as really as in the human, though, of course, in a lesser degree, or of a lower grade.—[Ed. T. S.]

Capt. Brown's Lecture.

We clip the following notice of a faithful worker in the Liberal cause from the Dallas (Texas) Daily Commercial:

"Our reporter attended Capt. Brown's lecture, last evening, on 'Evolution, and its Lessons of Immortality and Individuality," which was listened to with profound respect and admiration by a large and intelligent audience, and is pronounced by good critics a masterpiece of eloquence. The music and singing by Prof. Vandercook was of a nature to be appreciated by every lover of that which is beautiful and sublime. The Dallas Truth Seeker's Society are anxious to procure Capt. Brown as lecturer, and the Captain has prepared to return and make his home in Dallas, provided the friends of Liberalism will compensate him for his labors among them. All persons friendly to the cause of Liberalism are requested to confer with the officers of the society. Capt. Brown leaves here to-morrow for Waco, and we cordially recommend him to all classes of Liberals desiring an able and effective lecturer.

W. F. Jamieson debated with Elder Cunningham fourteen sessions at Springfield and Joplin, Mo. They have agreed to debate sixteen sessions more; eight at Girard, Kansas, and eight at Carthage, Mo.—April 1-9, and 10-18. For debates and lectures address 172 and 174 Clark street, Chicago, Ill.

The Popes and their Doings; or, Biographical Sketches of the most noted Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God. Holy Cross Series No. 3. 271 pp. 12mo. New York, D. M. Bennett, 1878. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This book contains brief sketches of some 150 different popes, embracing their more prominent actions and their general character, whether for good or ill; and it must be confessed that they were a sorry lot, their influence being largely extended for ill—in antagonism to the best interests of humanity. It contains some very plain statements in unvarnished language, mostly taken from Catholic authorities. Within a narrow compass will be found, in as trustworthy a form as possible, what elsewhere can only be learned by consulting numerous bulky volumes. It will be found useful for reference as well as for reading.—Spiritual Offering.

Letters from Friends.

White Rock, Nevada, March 26, 1878.

Friend Bennett: Inclosed find one dollar; place it to the credit of Mr. George Goltman, White Rock. He wishes to become a subscriber to The Truth Seeker, commencing Jan. 1, 1878. Please send back numbers to his address. He will send the balance of subscription money as soon as he can. You can also place his name and mine down for a copy each of the "Champions of the Church."

I would like to see a copy of your paper sent to every family in the United States. I am satisfied it would do more good than all the Bibles that have been or ever will be distributed. Had I the coin, it should go to every house, but being an old man, and not able to work much, I will do the next best thing that I am able to do to start The Truth Seeker on its mission. I have been living in the mountains of California and Nevada for the last twenty years, mining and operating in mines. I have collected a large and very rich lot of mineral specimens from most of the noted gold and silver mines on this coast. My proposition is this: To every reader of The Truth Seeker who will send me twenty five or fifty cents, I will send by return mail, postpaid, a handsome mineral specimen of gold or silver ore. The money sent to me, after taking out postage to pay for sending the cabinet specimen, shall be forwarded to D. M. Bennett to be placed by him to the credit of The Truth Seeker Distributing Fund—a fund created for the purpose of sending The Truth Seeker three months to any name that any of the friends of the cause may think proper to send in to the editor. By this method the party sending to me will get value for his money, and at the same time be doing a good act to help the Liberal cause. Brother Bennett, if you think well of this proposition of mine, start it. I will do my best. I think it a good idea to start a fund of that kind. I have a large supply of rich ore on hand and can get more if wanted. Yours truly,

V. J. Borrette.

Friend Borrette is a very worthy man and is well known in the region of country where he resides. He has acceptably filled the position of Justice of Peace, agent for Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express, and other places of trust. Any remittances made to him will be faithfully attended to. A friend of ours, now with us, is acquainted with Bro. Borrette, and speaks in the highest terms of him. The proposition made relative to The Truth Seeker Free Distributing Fund is a good one, and appears feasible and well worth carrying out.—[Ed. T. S.]

Leeds, N. Y., March 31, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: A friend of mine has read one of your publications, called the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," and has been considerably shaken by it. But he says he does not believe that such a man as Humphrey ever existed; that if he did, he got shamefully beaten; that you have the best of the argument, etc. Now, if he could be convinced that such a man lives and really wrote his part of that book, why, then, considerable has been accomplished; and what I want of you is to send me the address of this Mr. Humphrey, so that I may write to him and thereby prove the thing to my friend.

Yours respectfully, S. D. Warner.

Reply.—We assure our friends that the Rev. G. H. Humphrey is a bona fide, living man, and, withal, a very able gentleman. He is pastor of the Thirteenth Street Presbyterian Church in this city. His address is 343 East Fifteenth street this city.—[Ed. T. S.]

Snowville, Va., April 6, 1878.

Dear Friends of the Truth Seeker: I write this to tell you that one of the noblest, bravest, and most outspoken of all the champions of free speech, needs the aid and assistance of his Liberal brothers and sisters for means to live. Daniel Tuttle of Poplar, Crawford Co., Ohio, has lost all the savings of his lifetime by going security for a friend, and now nearly eighty years of age, and crippled besides, he has to begin the world anew by selling Liberal publications. He has a great quantity of his papers, The Divinity Physician, that he wishes to dispose of. I have been reading them, and find them unique, forcible, argumentative, and very original. Any one ordering a few numbers, even if no more than twenty-five cents' worth of them, will be doing a good deed, and at the same time receive the full worth of his money. He offers to take in exchange for his papers any Liberal publications from authors or publishers, which he will sell as he can. I shall mail him to-day a few copies of "John's Way" as a free gift, and only wish I could do more. I hope those who can will not defer till it is too late, or till they forget it. Now is the accepted time. Fraternally,

Elmina D. Slenker.

Kirksville, Mo., March 28, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Sir: I have received three copies of Payne's Age of Reason. The last I returned as an indication that I did not want it. I suspected something wrong from the first number, for which reason I did not subscribe. This man beyond a doubt, at least in my mind, is troubled with a species of insanity; and, out of charity, after what has been published, I think it would be well to let him alone. I do not believe he can injure you after so many facts concerning him have been published.

Respectfully, Wm. Hart.

Jamestown, Col., March 28, 1878.

Mr. Bennett, Dear Sir: As soon as I am able I will send for The Truth Seeker. But money seems to be more precious than diamonds just now. I sent you a dollar for some tracts a short time ago, but I expect the snow blockade on the railroads will delay them for some time. You are, in my opinion, the grand apostle of modern Freethought. May you have success in strangling the "Minotaur" of superstition, and lift the incubus from the people that has been smothering them for weary ages. Every liberal minded man should help you to the extent of his utmost ability in the grand work, for the sake of future posterity, even if he does suffer for opinion's sake during his life-time. Ignorance and superstition will battle demoniacally for the supremacy, but Science and Reason are bound to come off victorious in the end. I feel assured you possess the qualities to make a good general in our cause. You have been put to the test, and have come off with your colors flying, and if not a great victory, at least the enemy have gained nothing to congratulate themselves with. Hoping that your future efforts may be crowned with merited success, I remain, yours truly,

D. W. Morrison.

ROCKLAND, ME., March 30, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: I inclose for you a two-dollar "William" on account. Guess Seth Wilbur is the "fellow what stole de onions." We "smell his breff" way down here. Every one of your subscribers here has received liberally of his illiberal productions. We have no use for them, as they are unfit for any purpose.

Yours very respectfully, A. M. AUSTIN.

FREDONIA, N. Y., April 5, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just read in THE TRUTH SEEKER your manly statement of your honest convictions in the face of threats to withdraw subscriptions because you dare to be honest.

Bigotry is not a child of the Church alone, but the shadow of ignorance and conceit is quite as palpable in the ranks of so-called Liberalism.

You have something to do in emancipating the heathen at home. Your leanings to a hope of eternal life so modestly and fairly expressed seem to be feared as a contagious disease. Some who feel that they are protected from the Church by vaccination indicate that there is still danger of the dreaded disease appearing in the evidence of a future state, and with the Church they unite in the endeavor to discourage and suppress free investigation and evidence of a future life. Neither is a truth seeker, nor a monopolist of truth, but I trust that some of the "Liberal" fault-finders will in future study more fearlessly the true meaning to be placed upon the words supernatural and material. There may grow out of the latter, phenomena they little dream of—truths both for the Church and Materialists. "Consistency is a jewel," because so rarely found. Send me copies of your fearless paper. I think I can, with its aid, win for you more subscribers than you will lose by truth seeking.

I expect to return to lecture and labor in the vicinity of Binghampton from May to November. Yours for truth, liberty, and progress. LYMAN C. HOWE.

SALEM, MASS., March 30, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: The quotation from the Chicago Tribune in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 30, is utterly false. No such petition has been presented from Essex, or from any other town. When woman is publicly stigmatized by an unqualified ignominious lie, it is not only the right but the duty of the community to as publicly defend her. Accompanying this, is a true copy of the petition, signed by sixty men and women of Boston, and vicinity, Salem, Marblehead, Danvers, Beverly, and Ipswich (not one from Essex), to eight of whose names M. D., was attached; five of whom were men, and three were women; not an editor nor a clergyman. The subject has been presented incorrectly in six public journals besides your own, and no two agreeing. Says the Boston Herald, "What is the matter in Essex County?" not aware, perhaps, that its own county was represented.

The petitioners have had "leave to withdraw."

The subject has been misrepresented and ridiculed by the Rev. Joseph Cook (whose lectures are stereotyped), at one or more of his "Monday Lectures in Tremont Temple"! "What is the matter" in the counties and the States that editors and ministers are led into misrepresentation, lest woman with her children step out of the ruts of dishonor and debasement into a higher plane of civilization, side by side with the man who has sought to plunge them into such, holding himself exonerated from all just responsibility, and at liberty to perpetuate such offenses in whatever community he can find a victim; because statute law protects him in such diabolism, as if villainy should be upheld, while society stands aghast, impotent to shield though humanity bleeds at every pore? Woman is told that it is her own fault! that she should protect herself!

When she seeks the power to protect herself, she has leave to "withdraw" and is made a subject of public misrepresentation and ridicule. To misrepresent and ridicule women is the "Anointed's" second nature; his chief stock in trade. It is the corner-stone and the keystone, also, of his immaculate power. "Woman brought sin, and death, and damnation into the world;" so inaugurating a "hell" which she has been peopling to the present time, causing the sacrifice of untold millions of the lives of her own children in this world and the sacrifice of untold billions of dollars. A huge outlay! The result of eating an apple. And now the "Anointed" are trying to demolish this by proving that there is no "hell"! They can't do it.

Did woman own so marvelous a lie, and so firmly established, she would stand by it at all hazards, leaving man to unravel it by the power of his own reason. She would not desert her best friend in its death struggle.

[COPY OF PETITION.]

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Massachusetts in Legislature convened:

We, the undersigned members of this community, respectfully petition your Honorable Bodies to abolish "Illegitimacy" from our midst, enabling every woman who stands in the connection or relationship of a wife, in any respect, towards any man, to sustain her position respectably by acknowledging publicly such relation, and recording her name as a married woman, endowed with all the rights and privileges pertaining thereto. So that the law of nature, which in all cases executes its judgments towards woman, shall not be interrupted in its judgments towards man, by any legal immunity from its results.

Every man knows that no child can be imposed upon him; so, likewise, should he know that no child can be illegally imposed upon a woman, thereby creating "Fallen women and illegitimate children." In this uplifting of ourselves, we ask you to legally sustain us, removing every obstacle, and extending every protection.

Is man ashamed of the above petition that he either dares not, or will not, present it in its true light; or does he think that woman should be ashamed? Unspeakably greater is the shame that necessitates the call for such a petition! MARY UPTON FERRIN.

PATRON, NEB., April 1, 1878.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Please put our names down for one copy of "The Champions of the Church." We know from the extracts we've read it will be splendid. A friend of ours whose father is a Presbyterian deacon, and whose friends are all church-members, said, when reading of the blood-thirsty Constantine, "Oh! I wish father, and brother E. and C., could see this. I don't believe they ever heard of it. If they have, they never say a word about it." My brother J. C. Baird of Sigourney, Iowa, wrote me lately congratulating me on the "Signs of the Times," but we missed THE TRUTH SEEKER containing it. I suppose there is some mismanagement of the mails out this way. We send THE TRUTH SEEKER all over this county, and some to other counties in hopes of gaining some new subscribers for you; therefore not having them on hand, cannot tell what number was missed. Wishing you every possible success, we remain your sincere friends.

ROBERT and MAY B. FINCH.

AVOCA, N. Y., March 26, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find draft for three dollars, which please place to my credit on TRUTH SEEKER, which will pay up to January 1, 1879. Accept my congratulations on your escape from that fanatic, Anthony. S. W. Payne sends me his Age of Reason. Think he must have got my name from your list, for I take no other New York paper except The Sun, and that is addressed differently. Yours sincerely, JAS. N. MOORE.

SPEDSON, ARK., March 24, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I have received begging circulars and sample papers from S. W. Payne. I have never written him a line. I know not how he got my name, unless from your list, and I cannot think he got it in an honorable way. I must say I like THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope it may long flourish. Your friend, JOHN T. WISE.

GREEN ISLAND, N. Y., April 1, 1878.

I have received circulars three or four different times from S. W. Payne, asking for aid in favor of his paper. At first I felt disposed to assist him, for I thought he was trying to help along the good cause; but when I learned that he was working in connection with Anthony Comstock, for whom I have no respect at all, I did not wish to lend my aid in that direction. I hope Mr. Payne will be able to explain how he got my name, but I think he took it from your list. H. WILBUR.

MARCELLUS, MICH., April, 1 878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have received circulars at two different times, and one copy of Payne's Age of Reason some two months ago. I don't know how he got my address. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only paper I take or have east of Detroit. One paper of the Liberal order is all I care for. JOSEPH R. STREETER.

WATERMAN, IND., March 26, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I take the opportunity of sending you a letter. I read your paper. I have an aunt that takes it; her name is Sarah Vansickle. She near about goes crazy when she doesn't get her paper. Uncle Alfred Girard and uncle Schuyler La Tourette take it, and aunt Mary Hourford. I read the stories from the devil and "The Darwins," and about Anthony Comstock. Bear down on old Comstock, and send your paper ahead. I am eleven years old, and I had my leg broke last summer. From a reader of your paper, KATIE C. CLICKEM.

CLEARFIELD, PENN., April 1, 1878.

DEAR BENNETT: Inclosed please find $2.00, for which credit me on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will send you more soon; I do not wish to lose a single number of the paper and will find enough money somehow to pay for it. Please change the middle letter of my name to correspond with that below I would say that I have received two or three copies of Payne's Age of Reason, with my name written as you have it on your list; and, as no other publisher ever had it in that way, the editor of that paper must have procured it from your list.

Yours truly, WM. R. BROWN.

TITUSVILLE, PA., March 31, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I never knew or had any acquaintance with S. W. Payne. When I, nevertheless, received the prospectus of his Age of Reason, with a request to subscribe, and some other papers with reference to it, and, finally, the first number of the Age of Reason, when that appeared, I did not find anything surprising in it, but thought he had learned my address from seeing it in other papers, as I receive very frequently similar papers pamphlets, letters, etc., in this manner from persons unknown to me. But when I received the above-mentioned papers a second time from him, at the time when you were robbed of your mail list, the suspicion becomes very strong that he forgot that he had sent them to me once before, and, finding my name on your mail list, sent them again, as, it seems, he did to all your subscribers. Having learned, however, more than enough of the real character of the man, I, of course, did not wish to have anything to do with him nor with his paper. Truly Liberal men and papers or measures I am always willing to assist whatever I can, but frauds and shams, never!

You are at liberty to make any use of this letter you please. Truly yours, MORRIS EINSTEIN.

ROSEBURGH, OREGON, March 20, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I am so glad that you have so politely bowed out of the field that monomaniac, Cyrus R. Teed. As you say, it was a Teedious job to read his wild and silly lucubrations, especially when he trucked in chemical science. When he talked of hydrogen and oxygen, it was quite evident he had never studied the rudiments of chemistry, or the rudiments of any branch of physical science whatever. My teachers in Glasgow College, Scotland, in chemical science—in 1836, Dr. Thomson, and, in the same University, when my health permitted me to resume my medical studies, in 1846, Dr. Anderson, both chemists of European fame—would have been ashamed of their youngest student making such egregious errors as this self-constituted messiah, C. R. Teed, who has come to enlighten us, in this land of liberty, on his ignorant crotchets, and calling us all fools who won't swallow his absurd ipse dixits. If you give him half a column of your valuable space at any future period, you thereby curtail your many readers' chance of obtaining sound knowledge from your valuable correspondents and contributors, without speaking of your own waste of time in replying to his puerile and sickly talk. If he has never been in an asylum (I mean Cyrus R. Teed), his friends must look to it. He is sure to get there, and before long, too. I have met with much smarter and more sane men in many of our Scotch insane asylums; and I am sorry to think of it, but it is nevertheless true, that he is a candidate for the kind of treatment there adopted.

Inclosed find three dollars for one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER; and I will endeavor to get as many new subscribers as possible for you. Your sixth and eighth letters are masterpieces of politeness and sound reasoning, and remind me much of my lamented friends Charles Southwell and George Jacob Holyoake. Charles Bradlaugh and Charlie Watts—both of the London National Reformer at present—could not "hold a candle" to either Southwell or Holyoake; and although I can see you are no classical scholar, and make no pretensions to being such, still, your sledge-hammer, solid blows, your sound common sense and invariable politeness, constitute you a controversialist of no mean order. Do not, therefore, waste your valuable time on such silly opponents as Teed. Get an archbishop of the Church of Rome, or a cardinal, now since they have got a fresh pope, or a bishop of the Church of England, or the moderator of the Church in which I was born and baptized—the (now Liberal) Church of Scotland—and you will have a foeman worthy of your steel to contend with. Bishop Watson's reply to Tom Paine (the Bishop of Llandaff) has never yet been answered, and never can be; for Tom Paine stood upon wrong ground—the Theistic side. He smashed Tom Paine all to pieces; and those old-fashioned Theists can never stand before such men as Paley, Watson, and others. Therefore, when you next debate get a dignitary of the Church, and not a mere will-o'-the-wisp—a nobody; and then your readers will be pleased, instructed, and delighted with your replies to such a person. We have been pleased here much, but better pleased when you closed the so-called "debate."

Respectfully yours, PETER JACK, M.D.

NOTES FROM THE LECTURE FIELD.

MR. EDITOR: That the friends and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may know where I am, and what I am doing in the cause of human freedom, let me say, I am in harness, and still on the war path, fighting against superstition in all of its various forms,

Since I arrived here from California, our Italy of the West, I have lectured almost nightly, and twice each Sunday to large and enthusiastic audiences, and my engagements will carry me to July next.

And I must say Michigan, as never before, is being swept by a wave of Freethought. Our Bob Ingersoll has stirred the murky waters of stupidity and superstition in Grand Rapids, Detroit, and other points. Long may he wave. I never call him to mind that I do not think of a monument, a liberty pole, bearing aloft the emblem of freedom; a waving plume that decks the brow of down-trodden humanity.

This is not a good winter for revivals of religion in Michigan. The preachers have preached, and the Christian people have prayed, but to little purpose.

The leaven of Freethought is in the atmosphere. Liberal literature is being passed from hand to hand, and the spirit of Thomas Paine is almost omnipresent in these days, and almost any school-boy is now able to confront and confound the preacher in the pulpit.

The Chicago papers have run riot on hell and damnation this winter, and the doom of the hateful old dogmas has gone forth into every town and hamlet, and the poor preachers robbed of hell, devil, and damnation of infants, wear a sickly smile, while they crow over the Infidelity of the times, and but for the red ribbon movement into which they are trying to infuse Chsrtianity, and reap converts to the Church, their case would be almost hopeless.

We were quite amused recently with the temperance fight at Sturges, where the preachers, as everywhere else, are trying to steer the temperance ship, but like every other big ship trying to navigate into shoal waters, they put her hard and fast on the rocks of theology.

A professor Carey has just closed a course of lectures on temperance, in which he claimed that the Bible was a temperance book, and the wines of the Bible were not intoxicating. Hence it was not binding upon the Church of our day to use in communion service the cup of devils, as he termed the intoxicating cup. But these children of God do not fully agree.

The Presbyterian clergyman of Sturges, "not a Red-Ribbon man," fully imbued with the letter of the gospel, came out with an elaborate discourse proving conclusively that the wines of the Bible were all intoxicating, and bringing forward copious examples from the Bible to prove the character of the wines of Scripture; such as the fact of drunkenness among the priests of Judaism, and the story of Lot, who made a beast of himself with wine; also the story of Noah and his drunken spree, and the curse of Noah upon the children of Ham in consequence; also how David made Uriah drunk, and then committed murder, to get his wife; and how the members of the church of Corinth were reprimanded for getting drunk on the wine at communion service, and many other examples in the Old and New Testaments to show the intoxicating character of the wines of the Bible.

We thought he won his case. But what a revealment from the Book of God to prove that the intoxicating cup at the Lord's table is not a cup of devils, as claimed by many members of the Christian Church!

So, as the clergy disagree, the people reach out for broader ground on which to build, and science herself comes in to settle the temperance question by showing that what is not food is poison, and that nature nowhere commends even the moderate use of poisons, and that temperance is a broad word, and covers our complete being—not simply abstinence from strong drink, but from everything that will mar the beauty of body and mind.

In conclusion, let me say that I have given a course of six lectures in Plainwell and eight lectures in Sturgis, with marked success, besides attending the State Convention of Liberals and Spiritualists held at Kalamazoo on the 21st, 22d, 23d, and 24th of March. This convention was marked throughout by a unanimity of action and feeling seldom found in so large a body of people so diverse in thought and opinion upon minor subjects. Dr. A. B. Spinney was re-elected as President for the coming year—a live man, full of zeal for the cause. By unanimous vote the convention amended the constitution of the association so as to read, "The Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists"—a right move, as the battle we are fighting must and will be fought out on the broad line of Freethought as Liberal people, forgetting to fight each other about small matters, but, hand in hand, making a common cause against the common enemy of human freedom.

Hudson Tuttle and Giles B. Stebbins, who were advertised to be at the convention, were absent, much to our disappointment, as we had learned to love these strong men from their writings, and desired to grasp them by the hand. We were highly pleased, however, to meet Susan M. Johnson, E. F. Stewart, Charles Andrews, Mrs. Morse, Mrs. Shepard, Mrs. Pearsal, Brother Fishback, and other noble workers in the cause of reform. The semi-annual meeting, by vote of the convention, will be held at Grand Rapids the first of next September, when we hope to have a grand time. On Saturday and Sunday, the 30th and 31st of March, we will meet a large gathering of friends at Saranac to celebrate the thirtieth anniversary of modern Spiritualism.

Our headquarters will be at Ionia, Michigan, for some time to come, where we will promptly attend to all calls to agitate the people on any of the issues involved in the gospel of nature. DR. J. L. YORK.

Dives Personates Lazarus.

St. Peter's successor sat close by his gate
As the Romans roamed out and roamed in;
The passengers pitied his wretched estate
And filled his petitory tin.
For ever he chanted, as crowds came and went,
With cadence so sad and so sweet:
"My hard-hearted landlord has seized me for rent,
And has turned me out into the street;
Se pity, good Christians! of every degree,
And pardon my modest demand;
Pray help me to raise for my lawyer his fee,
To defeat this atrocious brigand."

This outrage was published by steam and by wire,
And the placards bore heading like this:
"St. Peter a pauper! without wood or fire!
St. Paul once more in vinculis!"
Yet ever he chanted and rattled his box.
Taking presents from loafer or lord—
Checks, guineas or pennies, coats, hats, shirts and socks;
Coal by cartloads and wood by the cord.
"Kind Christians!" he cried, "I am ragged and poor:
I can't walk: for that tyrant and brute
Has kicked on my shin an incurable sore,
And the pain is extremely acute.

The pilgrims from regions in partibus came,
Pouring tribute and tears, ex voto;
They denounced in all tongues this incredible shame,
And they kissed his great toe, in toto.
He wrote all these gifts on small parchment-scraps,
And he chalked each itinerant hat;
He blessed and besprinkled their baggage and traps—
Their cars, boats, and donkeys, at that.
Still he chanted his solo so low in their ear—
Yet the chink don't its melody mar—:
"Good Christians! pray pay off the seizure this year—
(But I can't take your silver at par)."

Cold, hunger, exposure—a terrible troop—
Will finish the most robust tramp;
So how could this mendicant live on bone soup,
With a Vatican, say, for his camp?
One morning the coroner found, upon oath,
This shrewd actor, who parts so combined
As to personate Dives and Lazarus both,
Died in rags and left treasures behind:
For when they examined the tatters he wore,
They found, quaintly quilted within,
A Jew broker's receipt for a million or more
Filtered through the petitory tin.

The landlord his tale as a tissue of shams
Denounced, and thus loudly he spoke: "Oh,
I charged him no rent, and had given him alms,
For I thought him in pauperis loco!
And all you philanthropists see you are sold,
For we always must drink as we brew:
He could not trust one of you Christians with gold,
But deposited it all with a Jew!"

Dr. William Morrison's Case.

Dr. William Morrison, who was recently arrested on a charge of violating the United States Mail laws, and who pleaded guilty before United States Judge Benedict,, claims that he is not an "advertising doctor," but is a family physician of good standing in the community. He further states that he was foolishly inveigled into the trap only after the receipt of several decoy letters written and sent by or at the instigation of Anthony Comstock. It is denied that the Doctor was ever in jail in his life, and it is to be regretted that statements prejudicial to his case crept into the Telegram of the 19th ult.—Telegram.

The City Press on the Restell Affair.

[From the Graphic].

Is it right to do evil that good may come? Is it a good thing for the community at large in putting down one form of vice to permit and encourage the development of another? Is there not danger in any method of ridding the world of one class of social parasites which develops another? . . . . Three-quarters of a century ago Rev. Sydney Smith, who knew something of human nature, thus graphically depicted the dangers to which such societies were liable:

"It is hardly possible that a society for the suppression of vice can ever be kept within the bounds of good sense and moderation. If there are many members who have really become so from a feeling of duty, there will necessarily be some who enter the society to hide a bad character, and others whose object it is to recommend themselves to their betters by a sedulous and bustling inquisition into the immoralities of the public. The loudest and noisiest suppressors will always carry it against the more prudent part of the community; the most violent will be considered the most moral; and those who see the absurdity will, from the fear of being thought to encourage vice, be reluctant to oppose it. . . . Beginning with the best intentions in the world, such societies must in all probability degenerate into a receptacle for every species of tittle-tattle, impertinence, and malice. Men whose trade is rat-catching love to catch rats; the bug-destroyer seizes on his bug with delight, and the suppressor is gratified by finding his vice. The last soon becomes a mere tradesman like the others; none of them moralize, or lament that their respective evils should exist in the world. The public feeling is swallowed up in the pursuit of a daily occupation and in the display of a technical skill."

Not only is "the suppressor gratified by finding his vice," but he carefully cultivates its growth. In order that he may get the credit which follows energy and success, he selects some person that he thinks has committed the crime which it is his duty to detect—a duty on which his bread and butter depends—and he goes to the person, and by all the inducements which human ingenuity can suggest he urges and beseeches him to commit the crime so that he can get the reward. The man becomes the detective and informer, and ceases to be the public-spirited citizen. A recent trial of a rum seller in Connecticut found a minister of the gospel defending deception in the knaves whom he had employed to entrap the dealers in whiskey. There was no proof that the men would have sold any liquor had they not been appealed to in the most specious way by the informers. The Sunday liquor traffic ought to be put down, but in doing so there is no need in developing a class of social parasites whose whole duty shall consist in entrapping their fellow-beings into committing offenses by means of the most persistent and specious lying. The remedy is as bad as, if not worse than, the disease.

In the present case, if Mr. Comstock has been correctly reported, he did not originally take up the Restell matter because he thought it a public duty to do so. No one had complained of the woman for prosecuting her nefarious business, and it is current rumor that the pills and powders which she sold were a harmless sham and that she herself was simply a fraud, whatever might have been the intention of herself or her patrons. Mr. Comstock was badgered into entrapping Restell. Men said to him: "Yes, you are afraid of big game. You arrest the poor, but you permit one of the rich women of New York to prosecute her trade openly in this city." With the woman or her trade no one can have any sympathy, and very few will regret her end. Mme. Restell is nothing, but the good of society is of the highest importance. The development of a class of spies and detectives whose fortune and fame would depend upon their success in entrapping the members of society into the commission of crime would threaten the very existence of society. The detective has a tremendous advantage over any private individual. He has the sympathies of society on his side. His methods are condoned so long as his motives are right, and his motives are taken for granted in nine cases out of ten. If, on the other hand, we look at the history of the detective service in this city we see how little deserving detectives have been of any credit. The whole detective service has been rotten, and there is hardly a question that if the truth were known detective and thief were synonymous in most cases. Just look at the history of the detective service in Washington. Has there been a man that has used detectives in recent years that has not been smirched, and the most threatening circumstances now connected with Secretary Schurz is that he is making use of the detectives who figured so extensively in all the past vileness of Washington detective life.

Let us not forget then that there are great dangers lurking in our present methods of suppressing immorality. We may produce a class of professional liars, informers, and decoys. And if we do, it will be pretty certain that we will not suppress vice, but suppress those who do not "come down" to the information. As yet we are safe, but the present system needs careful watching lest it should become the nursing mother of a class of rotten detectives.

After a full account of the Madame's funeral, the Telegram gave the following:

Mr. Farrell, a son-in-law of the Madame, stated that she had at one time intended to flee to Canada; but she gave up this plan at the persuasion of her friends. He then went on to say: "Comstock's attempt to make her appear the vile person he represented her was an outrage, and his coming here with six officers expecting to find a house full of patients must have been a great disappointment to him, as it only ended in the arrest of one old woman. There never has been a patient taken in this house, and all attempts to prove it would have failed. My wife has during her mother's trouble been constantly with her, and the other day, when she went to the Surrogate's office to deposit her will, she asked my wife to go with her, saying at the time: 'Carrie you are my only heir.' Whether this is so or not I don't know, as we have not yet read the will."

In the Court of Oyer and Terminer this morning Mr. Orlando L. Stewart appeared before Justice Daniels and it was stated that no action would be taken in the case of Madame Restell's indictment on account of her death. This fact will be inscribed in the indictment. Subsequently Mr. Stewart spoke with District Attorney Phelps as to the returning to the heirs of the estate the $10,000 bail in bank notes deposited in the hands of Mr. Phelps.

The Bible in the Schools.

The action of the New Haven Board of Education, some time ago, in deciding to suspend the reading of the Bible and other religious exercises in the public schools of that city, naturally led to strong dissatisfaction on the part of some people. Various petitions of remonstrance were addressed to the board, and referred to a special committee for consideration. That committee has recently reported upon the subject, recommending the board to adhere to its previous action, and that report has been adopted. This settles the question at least for the present, and, as we would hope, permanently. We have no doubt that the action is right. The public school is a State institution, organized and conducted under its authority, and supported by compulsory taxation, which is indiscriminately levied upon all taxpayers, without any reference to their religious faith or want of such faith. This single statement is sufficient to show that the State should not make the school an instrument of religious propagandism of any type, whether Protestant or Catholic. It cannot do so without injustice to a portion of the people. Protestants would so reason in an instant if the State made the school a Catholic machine. The objection is just as valid when the State makes the school a Protestant machine. The simple truth is that it ought not to be made a religious machine at all. In the language of Professor Walker, who is a member of the New Haven Board, we think that the State had better "leave religion to seek its own agencies, as it can and will, without any help from the state."—Independent.

THE

and one of the youngest may both now be had at the price of the former by any NEW subscriber to "the grand and sterling old Boston Investigator." Col. Ingersoll said: "The Investigator is the best of the Liberal papers." (This was before he read the Evolution.) We will send both papers, prepaid, one year, to any bona fide new subscriber to the Investigator, for $3.50, which is the price of the Investigator alone.

The Investigator is now in its forty-seventh year. It is a weekly of eight large folio pages, contains the news pertaining to Liberalism, reports of meetings, correspondence all over the world, abstracts, and sometimes full reports, of such Liberal lecturers as Col. Ingersoll, B. F. Underwood, Horace Seaver, and other eloquent Freethinkers.

Every Radical in America should take these two papers and induce others to take them.

In addition to the above splendid offer, we offer until May 1st to send, in addition, to any one not now a subscriber to either the Evolution or the Investigator who will send us $3.50—to reach us before May 1st—a copy of a choice edition of the Koran. Address

THE SPIRITUAL OFFERING.

Vol. II., Commencing May 1, 1878.

A Monthly 48-page Magazine, devoted to the Interests of Humanity from a Spiritual and Scientific Standpoint. Published in Springfield, Mo., $1.25 per annum. D. M. Fox and Nettie Pease Fox, Editors.

Regular Contributors.

Prof. S. B. Brittan, Wm. Emmette Coleman, Mrs. Kate Osborn, Mrs. E. G. Planck, Wm. F. Jamieson, Prof. Wm. Denton, Warren Chase, J. S. Loveland, John Wetherbee, J. S. Ludlam, Esq., Miss Belle Bush, James Straub, A. W. St. John, Mrs. H. F. M. Brown, Dr. D. Higbee.

THE SPIRITUAL OFFERING, the first year of its existence, has obtained a circulation, more or less, in thirty-five States of the Union, and probably no Liberal paper or magazine ever published has in so short a time from its commencement given more universal satisfaction.

In our list of regular contributors will be found some of the best writers in the ranks of Spiritualism and Liberalism. We expect soon to add to the list of names othes eminent writers, men and women.

In the March number we commenced a department specially devoted to the review and critical notice of new publications, which will hereafter constitute an interesting feature of the magazine.

With the new volume we inaugurate a department devoted to the careful consideration and record of phenomenal Spiritualism, gathered from the most reliable sources in our own and foreign lands. Other improvements and enlargement to sixty-four pages are contemplated at an early date, if our friends will at once exert themselves in our behalf. The price is so very low that we trust every Spiritualist and Liberalist will regard it as an obligation to sustain the efforts we are making to publish a first-class magazine at a lower price than ever before attempted. To aid our friends in getting subscribers, we have arranged to send

The Offering and Banner of Light one year, $4 00
The Offering and Freethought Journal, an exponent of modern, English, German, and American Scientific Materialism, a monthly, both for 2 00

The orders for these publications should come through this office. All new subscribers can make quite a saving by availing themselves of this offer. The price of the Offering is so low we cannot offer commisions. If our friends work for us, they do so from a desire to extend our circulation, which must be large to sustain the magazine at present price.

It will be conducted independently, impartially. Nothing looking to man's welfare will be deemed alien to its pages. Unrestricted discussion of all questions of humanitarian import will be ever maintained by it. Offensive personalities and indelicacy of language will be wholly excluded. In its editorial conduct, the truth, beauty, and utility of Spiritualism in its higher phases will be advanced. It will not in any particular be a sectarian journal, but broad, progressive, and liberal—will give fair and equal expression to all forms of thought. "A fair field and no favor" it extends to all. Above all things, it aims to be Liberal, to be devoted to Liberalism in its broadest, most extensive application.

With this understanding, we appeal to our patrons, and all who would aid us in this work, to respond immediately. We desire to know as near as may be, at as early a date as possible, the number of copies of new volume necessary to print. Address SPIRITUAL OFFERING, Springfield, Mo. 2t4

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF

CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact fac simile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is in England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on live issues with a promptitude unequaled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest, cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers.

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

ALIUNDE;

Or, LOVE VENTURES.

ILLUMINATED COVER, PAPER, 12MO, 226 PP. POSTPAID, FIFTY CENTS.

BLASPHEMY IN A NOVEL.

To the Editor of the Hebrew Leader:

SIR: In the New York World appeared a notice of a book which you recently reviewed entitled "Aliunde; or, Love Ventures," in which the man of the World was much shocked to discover "a curious compound of blasphemy and in that a kind of unkempt cleverness," etc. As to the blasphemy, it appears that it consists in the talk of a young Hebrew, one of the characters, who speaks of Jesus Christ as "a Jew carpenter," the "dead Jesus of Nazareth, the son of a peasant, and a man executed with criminals," etc. In Chapter XIII. a discussion takes place in the attempt to convert the happy South Sea Islanders to Christianity, in which a priest of Koro-Kama avows his belief in one only invisible God, and rejects all new gods. This seems to have horrified the people of the World, though I never knew before that the refusal of a Hebrew or a South Sea Islander to give up monotheism and believe in three gods (Father, Son and Holy Ghost) constituted blasphemy! However, we live and learn even from the World, though the Christians are expressly warned to "keep themselves pure and unspotted from the world." The book was intended as a Polynesian love story, as you stated, and a portion of it attempted to burlesque the Electoral Commission, as the New York Daily Graphic said. I am profoundly saddened to think that the exemplary Christians of the World should have been shocked at the "blasphemy" of a little love story, and shall consult the theological and logical Editor of that journal before I again trespass and transgress. THE AUTHOR.

A LIVELY narrative of adventures in an imaginary country of Arcadian simplicity and general delightfulness. Three boys yet in their teens entrust their lives, their fortunes (consisting of sundry of Uncle Samuel's promises to pay on demand), and their sacred honor to a frail craft which sails across the (miscalled) Pacific Ocean. During their voyage King Neptune, awakening from a deep sleep (caused by reading seven-eighths of a page of Tupper's P. P.), shakes himself and likewise shakes the voyagers—into the water. The youths, while swimming around in search of their lost vessel, strike against a coral reef some six feet beneath the surface, and standing upon this they spend the night in the depths of despondency—and salt water. At daybreak they wade to the shore of a mysterious island which happens to be conveniently near, and they are met on arrival by three beautiful daughters of Eve clothed with "severe simplicity." They are led by their unknown charmers to the chief of the island, who, with commendable zeal, marries them at once to their fair discoverers, and the tired mariners spend some delightful years in the unknown land with no more to do than the president of a life insurance company. The book relates some of their numerous adventures and describes the life and manners of the islanders. Running all through the volume is a vein of political satire on recent events which have taken place in the United States. Aside from this the book is well written and possesses some real humor which commends it to all in search of reading which, while it does no harm nor any positive good, still serves to amuse.—*N. Y. NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.

Great Magnetic Remedy.

DO YOU SMOKE?

DO YOU CHEW?

DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective. Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed we warrant the REMEDY to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.

Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. Gems of Thought.

A SINGLE burst of mirth is worth a whole season full of cries with melancholy.—Hood.

HOW WEARY, stale, flat, and unprofitable seem to me all the uses of this world!—Shakspere.

THE quivering flesh, though torture-torn, may live; but souls, once deeply wounded, heal no more.—Elliott.

YOU have many enemies that know not why they are so, but, like the village curs, bark when their fellows do.—Shakspere.

IN life it is difficult to say who do you the most mischief—enemies with the worst intentions, or friends with the best.—Lytton.

IT is the mind that makes the body rich, and as the sun breaks through the darkest cloud, so honor appeareth in the meanest habit.—Shakspere.

IF all men would bring their misfortunes together in one place, most would be glad to take his own home again, rather than to take a proportion out of the common stock.—Solon.

THE past is never wasted. The agonies of life and the bitterness of death shall be unto every human heart the creative power of a new and wonderful region of bliss.—L. N. Goddell.

WHATEVER that be which thinks, which understands, which wills, which acts, it is something celestial and divine; and, upon that account, must necessarily be eternal.—Cicero.

NOTWITHSTANDING the sight of all those miseries which wring us, and threaten our destruction, we have still an instinct that we cannot repress, which elevates us above our sorrows. —Paschal.

THE mind is nourished at a cheap rate; neither cold nor heat, nor age itself, can interrupt this exercise; give, therefore, all your care to a possession which ameliorates even in its old age.—Seneca.

GAYETY and a light heart, in all virtue and decorum, are the best medicine for the young, or, rather, for all. Solitude and melancholy are poison. They are deadly to all, but, above all, to the young.—Talfourd.

LET there be an entire abstinence from intoxicating drinks throughout this country during the period of a single generation, and a mob would be as impossible as combustion without oxygen.—Horace Mann.

WHEN misfortunes happen to such as dissent from us in matters of religion, we call them judgments; when to those of our own sect, we call them trials; when to persons neither way distinguished, we are content to attribute them to the settled course of things.—Shenstone.

SAVE the love we pay to heaven, there is none purer, holier, than that a virtuous woman feels for him she would cleave through life to. Sisters part from sisters, brothers from brothers, children from their parents, but such woman from the husband of her choice never!—Knowles.

HOW EXCELLENTLY composed is that mind which shows a piercing wit, quite void of ostentation; high erected thoughts, seated in a heart of courtesy; and eloquence, as sweet in the uttering as slow to come to the uttering; and a behavior so noble as gives beauty to pomp and majesty to adversity.—Sidney.

TWO PERSONS who have chosen each other out of all the species with a design to be each other's mutual comfort and entertainment have, in that action, bound themselves to be good-humored, affable, discreet, forgiving, patient, and joyful, with respect to each other's frailties and imperfections, to the end of their lives.—Addison.

IF misery be the effect of virtue; it ought to be reverenced; if of ill-fortune, to be pitied; and if of vice, not to be insulted; because it is, perhaps, itself a punishment adequate to the crime by which it was produced; and the humanity of that man can deserve no panegyric who is capable of reproaching a criminal in the hands of the executioner.—Johnson.

MIRTH is God's medicine. Everybody ought to bathe in it. Grim care, moroseness, anxiety, all this rust of life, ought to be scoured off by the oil of mirth. It is better than emery. Every man ought to rub himself with it. A man without mirth is like a wagon without springs, in which one is caused disagreeably to jolt by every pebble over which it runs.—Beecher.

THE course of none has been along so beaten a road that they remember not fondly some resting-places in their journeys, some turns of their path in which lovely prospects broke in upon them, some soft plats of green, refreshing to their weary feet. Confiding love, generous friendship, disinterested humanity, require no recondite learning, no high imagination, to enable an honest heart to appreciate and feel them.—Talfourd.

EDUCATE thy heart. Widen out thy views of life. Cultivate kindness, tenderness, generosity, and charity towards all. Despise not nor look with disdain upon the apparently low and mean. Thou knowest not the difficulties and afflictions under which they labor, nor the trials and tribulations they have to endure. Noble efforts, heroic self-sacrifices, simple, unobtrusive kindnesses, may dot the pages of their life—records all over with golden spots—while thine may present a smooth, clean surface of blank nothingness, because thou hast simply been negatively good. The poor, the humble, and the uneducated, who speak not to the great world their life-thoughts, may be really more deserving of its honor and renown than is many a canonized hero who has, by a few great actions, won his place high up on the ladder of Fame.—Etmina, D Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

"WHAT'S the difference," asked a teacher in arithmetic, "between one yard and two yards?" "A fence," said Tommy Beales. Then Tommy sat on the ruler fourteen times.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN says he finds Boston "corroded with the midnight livery of unutterable gloom," a condition we have ourselves noted, but omitted to mention, having relatives there.

A YOUNG gentleman who ventured West in the prevailing fashion of neckwear, was immediately utilized by the thrifty Grangers, who smeared his lofty shirt collar with coal tar and set him up as a grasshopper trap.

HUGO'S last work, "The Art of Being a Grandfather," affords encouragement to parents. And yet it is the art of being a father which costs. The other is supplementary. It is the art of being neither which Americans study most profoundly.

A FOURTEEN-year-old girl went to a coal yard the other morning and ordered half a ton of coal. On paying for it she lacked three cents of the requisite sum, and the dealer said, "Well, bring it the next time you come, for I tell you coal is coal now-a-days." "Is it?" retorted the girl, "I am glad to hear it. The last I got of you was two-thirds slate." Smart girl that!

ONE of the Norwich steamers had struck, and, while the passengers were hurriedly making preparations for their safety, a fat old Dutchman seized a life-preserver, and, trying it on, began to fill it, blowing till he was red in the face with his efforts. "Hallo," said a bystander, "you can't fill that thing; there's a big hole in it." A blank look came over the Dutchman's face. "Mein Gott, is dat so? Den I better keeps my wind in me."

AT four o'clock yesterday morning Mrs. Ferguson, hearing a noise in the front room, arose and made an investigation, and was shocked to find her daughter and a young man on one and the same sofa. Mrs. Ferguson burst into tears, but the daughter said soothingly, "Don't be alarmed, ma. It is merely a caucus. We are about to start a new party." Then Mrs. Ferguson was intensely relieved, and went back to bed with her face illuminated with smiles.

THE LAY OF THE GRASSHOPPER.

There was a grasshopper lived in a palm tree,
Silver voiced as a frog in June;
Was not pleased with his situation—
Thought he'd like to go to the moon.
Oh! Heigh-ho! How shall I get there? oh!
A hop and a skip, and a flop and a flip,
And over the clouds I'll go.

Up he went like a streak of lightning;
Lit on the moon like a thunderbolt;
Nought could he find but a man with a lantern,
Riding about on a pea-green colt.
Oh! Heigh-ho! Why did I come here? oh!
A fling and a swing, and a flap of my wing,
And back to the earth I'll go.

Off he shot like a blazing rocket;
Down he came like a falling star.
What should he meet but a gay little goshawk,
Flying up from the earth so far.
Oh! Heigh-ho! Poor little grasshopper, oh!
A snap and a squeak in the bonny bird's beak,
And there was an end of him, oh!

—From the Nursery.

A DECEITFUL HUSBAND PUNISHED.—We met Old Mose yesterday, and noticed that there was a dark cloud hovering over his despondent brow.

"What's the matter, Uncle?" we asked.

He shook his head as if he had nothing left to live for, and said:

"Ise in a peck of trouble. De Lord knows where dis heah is gwine to end. I'se done gib it up."

"What is the trouble about?"

After several sighs which seemed to come up from the bottom of his boots, he explained that he was the Secretary of the local colored Lodge of Free Masons; that he was the custodian of the books: that for keeping the books he was paid by the lodge $10 a month; that every Saturday night, after the lodge was over, he carried the books home, and turned them over to the "ole 'ooman, Aunt Dinah," for safe keeping, and she stowed them away in her trunk, "along with her 'fishal flowers, and fedders, and finery, and sich." He also stated that he had forgotten to mention to Aunt Dinah that he was receiving $10 a month for keeping the books, and he had uniformly forgotten to turn over to her the aforesaid $10, but had squandered the same for his own little personal expenses; that some unknown demon had informed Dinah that Old Mose was getting $10 for keeping the books, and consequently when he remarked the other evening that it was time for him to go to the lodge, and requested her to hand him out the books, instead of doing so she sat down on the trunk, and positively refused to turn over the documents until he paid over the $10. When he told her the $10 were his'n for keeping the books, she retorted: "Who's been keepin' dem ar books? Hasn't I been keepin' de books in de trunk all de time? Han' out dem funds wat's comin' to me for keepin' de books."

"What did you tell her, Mose?"

"I tole her I wanted dem books to keep de minits in, dat she didn't know how to keep de books, but she 'lowed she was gwine to show me she knowed how to keep de books, and foah God! she is a keepin' dem. De lodge has pinted a committee to investigate my accounts, and dar she is squattin' on de trunk holdin' out her han' for de $10 I'se done spent. Doesn' yer know somebody who wants $10 wuff of whitewashin' done in advance?"

Notes and Clippings.

TALMAGE has stood in his pulpit and shied a brick at Tweed's character. Tweed was never a buffoon, however bad he was.—Telegram.

THE Israelite complains of "a screw loose" in Jewish society, of "gorgeous temples with their slim attendance, well paid and gifted ministers with no audiences."

PROFESSOR ADLER made a grand raid on the clergy of all denominations on Sunday, the 14th. In his opinion, a large number of them are only "religious tramps who feed on the offal of knowledge."

A FLORIDA negro mistook a mule for a ghost and poked it with a stick. The verdict recited that he came to his death by using too short a stick in probing the unknowable for evidence of a future existence.

A BAPTIST missionary writes to a Shanghai paper that he saw men carrying in baskets little girls 8 or 9 years old, to be sold for food. He says they boil and eat these children, so severe is the famine. The distress extends over regions of China inhabited by about 57,000,000 people.

DR. TEMPLE WEST and some of the Ritualist authorities in England have declared, with reference to the recent marriage of Lord Roseberry, that it was "worldly" for his Royal Highness to sanction a marriage in Lent; it was "fleshly" of him to sanction it on a Wednesday; but it was "devilish" when the bride was a Jewess!

NORWAY is very liberal in politics, but quite the reverse in religion. With the exception of about 6,000, all the people are Lutherans. Those of all other creeds, Jesuits excepted, have been tolerated, but not admitted to public offices. By a recent act there has been a mitigation of this rule, except in the case of judges and the higher officials.

Two old women were recently flogged in the public plaza of Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, on a charge of being witches. Those barbarous Mexicans—those particular ones who did the flogging—are no farther advanced in civilization than were the New England Puritans of two hundred years ago, or the Baptists of Dallas County, Texas, of six months ago.

THE Rev. John Fox, all the way from London, England, lectured on "Hell" in Chickering Hall, this city, on the 14th. He advertised that he would answer Col. Ingersoll. There were fifty persons present when he commenced, and only fifteen remained when he closed. "His argument was that Christ said: "Depart from me, ye accursed, into everlasting punishment."

A CORRESPONDENT asks: "If everlasting punishment spoken of so often in the Bible does not mean everlasting, what hope have we of everlasting life?" We are forced to remark that we do not know, and incline to the belief that everybody else is in the same fix; and we may add that thus far we have never found any one who knew anything whatever about this subject.—Boston Transcript.

LULLY, the celebrated composer, was sick and sent for a confessor, who told him he could not recover until he had burnt his last opera, which was in bad repute. After a while Lully yielded, and the opera was committed to the flames. When convalescent, a friend called him a blockhead for yielding to so silly and unreasonable a demand. The composer drew him down and whispered in his ear: "Don't worry; I've burned the original, but I've kept a copy."

BLASIUS PISTORIUS, the ex-priest, was brought up for sentence in the Oyer and Terminer Court in Philadelphia, on April 13th, for killing Farmer Jacquette, near Morristown. After sentence of death had been passed upon him, he made a speech in which he charged that his life had been sold by his counsel. He called the presiding Judge a liar and murderer of justice. This is the second time he has been tried, having been before convicted in Montgomery county.

A MAN who had announced his first attack of rheumatism learned in one half hour that the following would cure it: Iodide of potassium, quinine, glauber salts, raw onions, lemons, raw silk, oil silk, gin and tansy, rock candy and whiskey, Turkish baths, a potatoe carried in his pocket, a horse chesnut carried in his pocket, an eel skin around his leg, a suit of red flannel, chloroform liniment, hot lemonade, a trip South, a dry atmosphere, equable temperature, sulphur baths, mustard and hot water camphor liniment, and electricity.

MR. A. R. ARNOLD estimates, in an article in the Nineteenth Century, that were the Church of England disestablished it would retain a surplus of £120,000,000 after all claims had been met. Jesus said, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell what thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven." But perhaps, the Church does not want to be perfect and to have treasure in heaven at such a sacrifice. They would prefer to act on God's injunction to the Israelites: "And it shall come to pass that when ye go, ye shall not go empty."

ONE day the Right Rev. Bishop Selwyn, of Litchfield, England, when walking in the country, in the garb of a solid squire, came across a party of five or six potters sitting around a brand new kettle, and was desirous to know what they were about.

"Loying for kittle, maister," was the answer.

"What do you mean?" inquired the Bishop.

"Why, whosoever tells the biggest loy, maister, gets the kittle."

"Very wrong, very wrong to lie, my friends," observed the right reverend gentleman; "I never told a lie since I knew good from evil."

"Give the kittle to maister, mates!" was the spontaneous and unanimous verdict of the potters.

IN the Cucharas valley of New Mexico penitents are often required to undergo frightful sufferings. They fast until scarcely able to stand, scourge their naked bodies until they are covered with sores, and on Good Friday take heavy wooden crosses on their backs and stumble along, blindfolded, to the summit of a hill. Here they are bound to the upright crosses with strong cords, and left for three days. Some are said to die through weakness and pain, and to be secretly buried. Others fall insensible before reaching the hill. On Easter Sunday, in 1876, four penitents died from the effects of the torture, one of whom lay all Easter night on the threshold of a church, after three days of scourging. In the morning life was extinct.

THE CHINESE SOLOMON.—A version of the real Solomonaic story is to be found in China. As in the Hebrew tale, two women had each of them an infant, one of which died by misadventure, the bereaved mother claiming the surviving child. The official before whom they came did not suggest so cruel a measure as the division of the infant, but simply ordered that it should be handed to a domestic in his yamen to be brought up for official life. He rightly surmised that the real mother would gladly accept so good a chance for her offspring, while the pretended mother, who only wanted the child in order to dispose of it, would demur. Judgment was accordingly given in favor of the tearful acceptor of the proposition, and the story, which is alleged to be historical, is widely believed.—Folk Lore of China.

COMSTOCKISM IN CONGRESS.—J. B. Wolff, of New York, appeared before the Committee on Revision of the Laws, on the 10th inst., on behalf of the fifty thousand signers to the petition presented a few days ago by Representative Butler, protesting against what is known as the Comstock law. He held that all such laws are unconstitutional, an invasion of personal and State rights, dangerous, and subversive of society itself; that Congress has no power over the moral quality of mail matter, that all questions of common morality and crime belong to the States, except those expressly prohibited in express terms; that the law itself is ambiguous and dangerous in the hands of such men as Comstock; and that the whole nation is responsible for every falsehood told and injustice done under this law; and thus, by the infamous methods of Comstock and his confreres, wholesale crime is committed to punish a few harmless enthusiasts, or a few hardened criminals. He massed all the facts bearing on the subject, State and national, to show the progress already made toward a censorship of the press, and a practical union of Church and State, and the danger of placing it in the power of any man, or set of men, to say what is indecent or immoral in mail matter.

AT last the Almighty has had the limits of his power defined. Joseph Cook, in his lecture on "Marriage," startles his orthodox hearers by asserting that "even God cannot make sin happy." We thought he could; but Mr. Cook, being a regularly-ordained deputy of the Almighty, ought to know just how far his power extends, and he wouldn't lie under such a terrible mistake if he could avoid it. And yet so many people find happiness in sinning. Now, there's Ingersoll. He is hilariously happy when he is denouncing the Bible, and his face smiles like all nature on a spring morning when he says there is no hell. It must be Satan that makes sin happy. Mr. Cook, do you really think that all things are not possible with God? Beware, Joseph! Speak not so slightingly of your maker and Redeemer. But perhaps he is not your maker. The men who go down to the sea in ships have a saying which may be the first chapter in your private Genesis. It is as follows: "The Lord sends food, but the Devil sends Cooks." Oh, Joseph, beware how you stir the religious soup. The more you stir it, the more it shows its mysterious origin. Let well enough alone. Just ladle out the thinner part to the public and leave the indigestible lumps and bones at the bottom. Too many cooks spoil the broth, even when they use the scientific method.

SLADE AND THE ASTRONOMER.—WHAT AN EMINENT SCIENTIFIC MAN SAW THE AMERICAN MEDIUM DO.—F. Zollner, the Professor of Physical Astronomy at Leipzig, describes some experiments which he made in that city in December, 1877, with Mr. Henry Slade, the American. Herr Zollner observes that "if a single cord has its ends tied together and sealed, an intelligent being, having the power voluntarily to produce on this cord four dimensional bendings and movements, must be able, without loosening the seal, to tie one or more knots in this endless cord." And he proceeds to say that "this experiment has been successfully made within the space of a few minutes at Leipzig, on Dec. 17, 1877, at 11 o'clock A. M., in the presence of Mr. Henry Slade, the American. I myself selected one of the four sealed cords, and, in order never to lose sight of it before we sat down at the table, I hung it around my neck, the seal in front always within my sight. During the seance I constantly kept the seal—remaining unaltered—before me on the table. Mr. Slade's hands remained all the time in sight; with the left he often touched his forehead, complaining of painful sensations. The portion of the string hanging down rested on my lap—out of my sight it is true—but Mr. Slade's hands always remained visible to me. I particularly noticed that Mr. Slade's hands were not withdrawn or changed in position. He himself appeared to be perfectly passive, so that we cannot advance the assertion of his having tied those knots by his conscious will, but only that they, under these detailed circumstances, were formed in his presence without visible contact, and in a room illuminated by bright daylight." There were four knots in the cord, and the Professor describes very minutely how they were sealed. Several other scientific men were present. He concludes thus: "The four knots in the above-mentioned cord, with the seal unbroken, this day still lie before me. I can send this cord to any man for examination. I might send it by turn to all the learned societies of the world, so as to convince them that not a subjective phantasma is here in question, but an objective and lasting effect produced in the material world, which no human intelligence with the conceptions of space so far current is able to explain. Only one other kind of explanation would remain. This explanation would consist in the presumption that I myself and the honorable men and citizens of Leipzig, in whose presence several of these cords were sealed, were either common impostors, or were not in possession of our sound senses sufficient to perceive if Mr. Slade himself, before the cords were sealed, had tied them into knots. The discussion, however, of such a hypothesis would no longer belong to the dominion of science, but would fall under the category of social decency. The German Professor comes to the opinion that Mr. Slade was "innocently condemned in London, a victim of his accusers' and his Judge's limited knowledge."—London Daily Telegraph.

BAYARD TAYLOR, our minister to Germany, has sailed for Europe.

OUR Government has at last recognized Diaz as President of Mexico.

A BROOKLYN lady has died of hydrophobia produced by a cat's bite.

THE Lowell mill agents have cut wages down from five to fifteen per cent.

A RECENT fire in Tokio, Japan, destroyed four thousand houses. Only one life lost.

STEAMER Childwell Hall was wrecked on the coast of Portugal. Twenty-six lives lost.

LAST Sunday was Palm Sunday. By the way, who stole that donkey? (See Matt. xxi, 2.)

THE Mormon Church and Brigham's many heirs are fighting about the money left by the prophet.

THE latest dispatches from Europe indicate that war is inevitable—and will be for several years to come.

THE American war ships in the South Pacific have been ordered to seize all vessels engaged in the coolie trade.

STEENBURGH, a negro at Fonda, N. Y., has confessed to the murder of eleven persons. He is to be hanged in a few days.

THE exodus of the Southern negroes to Africa has commenced. The ship Azor has sailed for Liberia with the first shipload.

CANTON, China, has been visited by a severe hurricane, which, with two waterspouts occurring at the same time, caused great damage in the city.

THE Beecher-Tilton scandal has been resurrected. Mrs. Tilton has caused a letter to be published in which she confesses her adultery with Beecher.

WM. M. TWEED died in Ludlow Street Jail on Friday, 12th inst. His death furnished a subject for several of our sensational clergymen on Sunday last.

LAUNCELOT FOGARTY, of this city, killed his wife by pouring sulphuric acid into her ear as she lay in bed, and then committed suicide by cutting his throat.

A FIRE in Clarksville, Tenn., on the 13th, swept over fifteen acres, and destroyed between fifty and seventy-five of the principal business houses. Loss, $500,000.

ANOTHER strike on the Santa Fe Railroad. It was a tornado this time. It knocked forty-five cars off the track and destroyed a number of houses. Several lives were lost.

S. A. CHACE, the treasurer of the Union Mills, Fall River, Mass., a very pious and religious man and a model of Christian morality, has been arrested for embezzling $200,000.

REV. JOHN JASPER, of Richmond, Va., who proves by the Bible that the "sun do move," is conducting a revival with wonderful success. He finds plenty of supporters for his astronomical theory among the negroes.

"FAMINE spreading. Cannibalism exists. No rain. Worse next year!" is the latest news from China. And yet in this civilized and enlightened country there is a law which makes it a crime to inform poor people how to avoid such horrible suffering.

THOSE pious Texans, who are so opposed to Infidelity that they flog its teachers, worship the Lord on Sundays with bull-fights. On Sunday, 14th inst., they had a fight between a savage bull and a ferocious African lion. The Bible says, "Thou shalt offer every day a bullock for a sin offering for atonement," but they can't afford it oftener than once a week.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"Oh, but it does interest us," said Edith. "I never thought what an innovation a factory was before. You must have been really proud of all you accomplished, and you must have made lots of money, too."

"We were proud of what we did, that's true, and we had cause to be so. Father was the only one in all the establishment that knew the least thing about either the machinery or the manufacture of goods, and he had to be eyes, ears, and brains for all; and it nearly wore him out. He had invested his all in the venture, and his partners, not appreciating his efforts, pulled against him, so he had them to fight as well as to run the business; and every patron wanted a 'good bargain,' and to pay as little as possible, and some wanted the whole weight of their wool in yarn, and others boasted that they actually got more weight in goods than they took there in wool, and so it cost them nothing, so cunningly had they lied and twisted about. Oh, it wasn't all sunshine, I assure you. We had to take all manner of truck, too, for pay, even to string beans and jelly made of clear cider boiled down. Still, we made a fair living, and sold out for enough to start us up here, and have the proud satisfaction of knowing we have benefited the world, besides. No less than three or four factories are now in full operation where there would have been none had we not opened the way. Our plan is always to do good work, and be frank and honest with our customers. We have many tough cases to deal with, but on the whole find it as profitable a business as most others, and perhaps no more laborious or difficult to engineer through."

The hours flew swiftly by, and it was nearly dark when the girls rose to leave. Willie walked up with them, he and Edith doing most of the talking, for Myra had all at once become shy and silent, answering only in monosyllables when spoken to. But her heart was full. She, who had never cared specially for any young man in her life, and had made it her boast that she was too sensible to fall in love, had been captured by the simple glance of a pair of blue eyes which seemed to her deep wells of living light, life, and love.

Girl-like, she and Edith had often spoken of young Darwin, and jokingly said they should set their caps for him. But Myra, in her mind, had always fancied Edith would have the preference, as she was more staid and dignified, more refined and ladylike, and better suited in all ways to be the wife of a philosopher, such as she presumed the only son of Mr. Darwin would be, because of the way he would have been educated and trained by such parents as his.

Now, perhaps some of my readers may not think it perfectly proper or modest in our two heroines to be talking so freely of trying to "catch" this young stranger for a sweetheart. But remember this is a Radical story, written in a Radical age, and by one of the most radical of Radicals, who believes in showing up human nature and all other sorts of nature just as they are. Those who know the nature of girls know that they begin to think of beaus and sweethearts when very young, and that this is a natural consequence of their organization and training, and it is healthy, proper, and legitimate that they should do so. The sexes are the equivalents one of the other, and neither can be complete or perfect alone. Passable happiness may be enjoyed in single life, and perfect misery may result from an unfortunate marriage. But these exceptions do not affect the great whole, any more than would the annihilation of a drop of water perceptibly affect the depth of the Atlantic Ocean.

Myra walked on home with Edith, and then she and Willie retraced their steps till they reached her own door. Myra's silence seemed to have communicated itself to Willie, for scarcely three words were spoken from the time they left Edith till they reached Mr. Scott's. As they stood a moment at the gate, Willie suddenly looked up and said:

"Several young people are going to take a walk next Sunday to see Mrs. Brown's flower-garden, and will not you and Edith go along?"

"Yes; we shall be glad to do so," said Myra; "for I hear her hyacinths, tulips, crown-imperials, and lots of other choice flowers, are in full bloom. She has the finest flowers in all the country. Nothing inferior ever finds a place within her borders. Her tulips are as large and double as a cabbage-rose, and the hyacinths are just entrancing."

"But can you walk that far? It is fully three miles."

"Oh, yes. I am a physician's daughter, you know, and have studied hygiene, and am aware that walking is the healthiest kind of exercise, so practice the art all I can. Edith, too, is one of the sensible sort; and we generally take our walks together, so she is as good a pedestrian as I am. I suppose Rose and Minnie are good walkers, too; are they not?"

"Yes, my sisters can walk as far as I can, and with just as little fatigue, too; and few women of her age can outwalk mother."

"Or outdo her in any way," said Myra, warmly. "You have the loveliest and best mother in the world, Mr. Darwin."

"I know it, Miss Myra, and I appreciate her, too, and am proud that others do the same. It must be one of the greatest of trials to have a parent that one cannot venerate and respect. To be ashamed of a father or mother must be even harder than for parents to be ashamed of their children. I don't see how a father or mother can ever do a mean or bad action, lest they shock the sensitive, loving spirits of those who look up to them as almost divine. But excuse me; I am keeping you out too late; so good-night and good-by."

Myra watched him till he turned the corner, then sighed and entered the house, where she found her father and Mr. Darwin discussing evolution. Her first impulse was to steal off to her room and muse over the new feelings that had crept into her heart, making life seem all at once a sacred and holy thing; but her father called to her to come and talk with them awhile; and, too kind and loving to wound him by a selfish refusal, she drew her low stool to his knee, and, leaning her head upon his lap, while his fingers threaded her soft curls, which were unfettered by chignon, hair-pins, or other disfiguring and worse than useless supplementaries, she said, "Well, father, and what shall I talk about? I'm sure Mr. Drawin will be much more interested in hearing you discuss evolution that in aught I could say—and, by the way, it's singular you happen to be called Darwin, isn't it?" said she, flashing her eyes upon their guest, with a merry smile at the conceit.

"Yes, it is quite an odd coincidence," said Mr. Darwin; "but the world is full of just such 'happen so's.' I know several men by the name of Paine, and every one Infidels; but no doubt there are Darwins who do not believe in evolution, and Paines who do believe in Christianity. Just as you came in, your father asked me if I believed man sprang from the monkey. I will now answer his question, by saying that I think man an evolution from nebulæ on up through progressive grades of mineral, vegetable, and animal life, passing on through some portion, perhaps, of the monkey tribe to the highest development of that, and still progressing till he became more perfect than any other existing animal, and beginning to develop human traits, which, though at first but one degree above animals, yet in time he grew on and on till he reached his present status. So you see evolution is only unfolding and developing. Nothing was made in its full perfection all at once. All matter, with its powers and potencies, has existed from eternity. Space is endless, and full of worlds. It is full of matter, too, for there is no such thing as empty space. The infinite, the eternal, and the immortal are only applicable to such things as space, matter, life, heat, motion, etc., taken as a whole. All forms and identities are mortal, perishable, and finite. You ask, Who created the first form of life? I reply that life is only a form of force, and is just as naturally a consequence of what is as are heat and light. All that is is evolved from combinations of matter. Those who try to settle the theory of spontaneous generation only fail of proving the real fact because they destroy the conditions necessary to produce manifestations of life. They boil fluids, put them through certain chemical tests, and, in air-tight vessels, and under these unnatural conditions, they wonder why life is not evolved. The life was there, but they destroyed it. Let light and air enter, and life will inevitably return again. To live is just as natural as to die. Both are but simple results of certain operating causes. Worlds are formed from nebulæ. They pass through countless changes and vicissitudes, develop with the circling years, and at last visible life is evolved or produced. Step by step it goes on, till the highest evolution it is capable of is reached, and then a moment's pause and retrogression begins. The world and all its productions begin to grow old and decay, till at last all seems to dry up and die out, and again countless ages roll along, bearing upon their wings the cold, dark, dead, desolate world, swinging like a black, lifeless ball in space, till it is dispersed, dissolved, and once more returned to nebula, or meets with some other equally relentless fate. Worlds are like the small objects which we see around us. A tree dies, and its component parts go to make portions of, perhaps, thousands of other objects, both living and dead—animals, insects, men, vegetables, soil, and who shall say what else? So of a world when it goes back to its atoms; these may remain in one nebula, or be scattered—who shall say where?—but never lost, never annihilated; for they are indestructible. They never began, and will never end."

NUTRITION EXPLAINS ADAPTATION.

As the different laws of transmission may be naturally divided into the two series of conservative and progressive transmission, so we may also distinguish between two series of the laws of adaptation, first, the series of laws of indirect, and secondly, the series of laws of direct adaptation. The latter may also be called the laws of actual, and the former the laws of potential adaptation.

The first series, comprising the phenomena of indirect (potential) adaptation, has, on the whole, hitherto been little attended to, and Darwin has the merit of having directed special attention to this series of changes. It is somewhat difficult to place this subject clearly before the reader; I will endeavor to make it clear hereafter by examples. Speaking quite generally, indirect or potential adaptation consists in the fact that certain changes in the organism, effected by the influence of nutrition (in its widest sense) and of the external conditions of existence in general, show themselves not in the individual form of the respective organism, but in that of its descendants. Thus, especially in organisms propagating themselves in a sexual way, the reproductive system, or sexual apparatus, is often influenced by external causes (which little affect the rest of the organism) to such a degree that its descendants show a complete alteration of form. This can be seen very strikingly in artificially produced monstrosities. Monstrosities can be produced by subjecting the parental organism to certain extraordinary conditions of life, and, curiously enough, such an extraordinary condition of life does not produce a change of the organism itself, but a change in its descendants. This cannot be called transmission by inheritance, because it is not a quality existing in the parental organism that is transmitted by inheritance. It is, on the contrary, a change affecting the parental organism, but not perceptible in it, that appears in the peculiar formation of its descendants. It is only the impulse to this new formation which is transmitted in propagation through the egg of the mother or the sperm of the father. The new formation exists in the parental organism only as a possibility (potential); in the descendants it becomes a reality (actual).

As this very important and very general phenomenon had hitherto been entirely neglected, people were inclined to consider all the visible variations and transformations of organic forms as phenomena of adaptation of the second series, that is, as phenomena of direct or actual adaptation. The essence of this latter kind of adaptation consists in the fact that the change affecting the organism (through nutrition, etc.) shows itself immediately by some transformation, and does not only make itself apparent in the descendants. To this class belong all the well-known phenomena in which we can directly trace the transforming influence of climate, food, education, training, etc., in the effects upon the individual itself.

DIRECT AND INDIRECT ADAPTATION.

We have seen how the two series of phenomena of progressive and conservative transmission, in spite of their difference in principle, in many ways interfere with and modify each other, and in many ways coöperate with and cross each other. The same is the case, in a still higher degree, in the two series of phenomena of indirect and direct adaptation, which are opposed to each other and yet closely connected. Some naturalists, especially Darwin and Carl Vogt, ascribe to the indirect or potential adaptation by far the more important and almost exclusive influence. But the majority of naturalists have hitherto been inclined to take the opposite view, and to attribute the principal influence to direct or actual adaptation. I consider this controversy, in the meanwhile, as almost useless. It is but seldom that we are in a condition, in any individual case of variation, to judge how much of it belongs to direct and how much to indirect adaptation. We are, on the whole, still too little acquainted with these exceedingly important and intricate relations, and can only assert, in a general way, that the transformation of organic forms is to be ascribed either to direct adaptation alone, or to indirect adaptation alone, or lastly, to the coöperation of both direct and indirect adaptation.

CHAPTER IX.

LAWS OF ADAPTATION.

In the last chapter we reduced into two groups the phenomena of Adaptation or Variation, which, in connection and interaction with the phenomena of Heredity, produce all the endless variety of forms in animals and plants—first, the group of indirect or potential, and secondly, the group of direct or actual Adaptation. We shall occupy ourselves with a closer examination of the different laws which we can discover in these two groups of the phenomena of variation. Let us first take into consideration the remarkable and very important, although hitherto much neglected, phenomena of indirect variation.

Indirect or potential adaptation manifests itself, it will be remembered, in the striking and exceedingly important fact that organic individuals experience transformations and assume forms in consequence of changes of nutrition which have not operated on themselves, but upon their parental organism. The transforming influence of the external conditions of existence, of climate, of nutrition, etc., shows its effects here, not directly in the transformation of the organism itself, but indirectly in that of its descendants (Gen. Morph. ii. 202).

As the principal and most universal of the laws of indirect variation must be mentioned the law of individual adap- ation, or the important proposition that all organic individuals from the commencement of the their individual existence are unequal, although often very much alike. As a proof of this proposition, I may at once point to the fact, that in the human race in general all brothers and sisters, all children of the same parents, are unequal from their birth. No one will venture to assert that two children at their birth are perfectly alike; that the size of the individual parts of their bodies, the number of hairs on their heads, the number of cells composing their outer skins or epidermis, the number of blood-cells, are the same in both children, or that both children have come into the world with the same abilities or talents. But what more specially proves this law of individual difference, is the fact that in the case of those animals which produce several young ones at a time—for instance, dogs and cats—all the young of each birth differ from one another more or less strikingly in size and color of the individual parts of the body, or in strength, etc. Now this law is universal. All organic individuals from their beginning are distinguished by certain, though often extremely minute, differences, and the cause of these individual differences, though in detail usually utterly unknown to us, depends partly or entirely on certain influences which the organs of propagation in the parental organism have undergone.

MONSTROSITIES.

A second law of indirect adaptation, which we shall call the law of monstrous or sudden adaptation, is of less importance and less general than the law of individual adaptation Here the divergences of the child-organism from the parental form are so striking that, as a rule, we may designate them as monstrosities. In many cases they are produced, as has been proved by experiments, by the parental organism having been subject to a certain treatment, and placed under peculiar conditions of nutrition; for example, when air and light are withdrawn from it, or when other influences powerfully acting upon its nutrition are changed in a certain way. The new condition of existence causes a strong and striking modificatian of form, not directly of the organism itself, but only of that of its descendants. The mode of this influence in detail we cannot discover, and we can only in a very general way detect a causal connection between the abnormal formation of the child and a certain change in the conditions of existence of its parents exerting a special influence upon the organs of propagation in the latter. The previously mentioned phenomenon of albinism probably belongs to this group of abnormal or sudden variations, also the individual cases of human beings with six fingers and toes, the case of the hornless cattle, as well as those of sheep and goats with four or six horns. The abnormal deviation in all these cases probably owes its origin to a cause which at first only affected the reproductive system of the parental organism, the egg of the mother or the sperm of the father.

A third curious manifestation of indirect adaptation may be termed the law of sexual adaptation. Under this name we indicate the remarkable fact that certain influences, which act upon the male organs of propagation only, affect the structure of the male descendants, and in like manner other influences, which act upon the female organs of propagation only, manifest their effect only in the change of structure of the female descendants. This remarkable phenomenon is still very obscure, and has not as yet been investigated, but is probably of great importance in regard to the origin of "secondary sexual characteristics," to which we have already made allusion.

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier.

[CONCLUDED.]

Since Christians limit the power of God the Father to the begetting of but one Son, why do they not have it, likewise, that this second person, as also the third, should, like the first, have the power of begetting each a son in his own image, and equal to him in all things? If this power of engendering a son is a perfection in the first person, it is, then, a perfection and a power which neither the second nor third person possesses. Thus, those two persons being wanting in a power and a perfection to be found in the first, they cannot, assuredly, be equal one to the other. If, on the other hand, they say that this power of begetting a son is not a perfection, they should not, then, attribute it to the first person any more than to the two others, for this reason, that we cannot attribute anything that is not perfect to a being all-perfect.

But they would not have the temerity to say that the power of begetting so divine a person is not a perfection; and if they say that this first person had the power of engendering many sons and many daughters, but that it was his will to beget alone this his only son, and that the two other persons in like manner did not will to beget others, we may ask them, first, whence they know that this was so; for we can see nowhere in their pretended Holy Scripture that these divine persons have declared themselves positively on this head. How, then, can Christians know anything about it? They speak, consequently, but according to their own ideas and vain imaginings. And if, it might be said, these pretended divine persons had the power of begetting many children, and would not, it follows that this divine power would remain with them without effect. It would be quite without effect in the third person, the Holy Ghost, one who begot or produced nothing, and would be almost without effect in the two others, seeing that they confined its exercise to such narrow limits. And in this way the power they possessed of engendering and producing many children has remained with them idle and without effect—which it would hardly be proper or polite to say of divine persons.

Christians blame and condemn the pagans in that they attributed divinity to mortal men, and worshiped them as gods after their death. They are right in this; but those pagans did neither more nor less than they themselves have done and are still doing, seeing that they attribute divinity to their Christ; so that they should condemn themselves, since they have fallen into the same error as these pagans, by making a god of a man that was but mortal—so mortal, indeed, that he died a shameful death upon a cross.

It would be idle for the Christians to say here that there is a great difference between their Jesus Christ and the gods of the pagans, under pretext that their Christ was, as they affirm, true God and true man in one, seeing that the divinity had been veritably incarnated in him; by which means the divine nature finding itself joined and united hypostatically, as they say, with the human nature, made of Jesus Christ a true God and a true man. Such a thing never was, say they, with regard to the gods of the pagans.

The weakness of this answer is evident from the fact that it would have been as easy for the pagans to say as the Christians have said, that the divinity had been incarnated in those whom they worshiped as gods. And, again, if the divinity had consented to be incarnated and united hypostatically with the human nature in their Jesus Christ, how do they know but that this same divinity had been equally willing to be incarnated and united hypostatically with the human nature of these great men and admirable women, who, by their virtues, their fine qualities, or their great or good actions, have excelled ordinary mortals, and have in this wise caused themselves to be worshiped as gods and goddesses? And if the Christians refuse to believe that the divinity ever consented to be incarnated into these great personages, why do they seek to persuade us that it ever was incarnated into Jesus Christ? Where is the proof of this? Their faith and their belief, which was in the pagans as well as in them. Thus they err, both one and the other.

But that which is more absurd in Christianity than in paganism is that, whereas the pagans have as a general rule attributed the divinity only to those who, either by their excellence in virtues beneficial to their country or their discoveries and inventions of certain arts and sciences, the Christians have bestowed this divinity on a man of no account, having neither talent nor learning nor address, born in the lowest walks of life, and who, from the day he entered into public life and obtained a little notoriety, was treated as a fool and a dreamer; and finally was hung, just like the generality of all who have attempted to play a like role, without having either the courage or the ability to sustain it.

Even in his time, there were many similar impostors, calling themselves the true Messiah promised by the law; and among these a certain Judas Galilean, a Theodorus, a Barcon, and others, who under a vain pretence deceived the people, and tried to persuade them and draw them after them, but they perished miserably, one and all. Let us now pass on to the discourses or sermons, and certain of the actions of Jesus Christ, which are among the most singular of their kind. "Repent ye," he says to the peoples of the earth, "for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; believe ye these good tidings." And he went strolling through Galilee, preaching and proclaiming in this way this pretended impending coming of the kingdom of heaven. As no one has as yet seen the least sign or appearance of the advent of such a kingdom, it speaks for itself that it was but imaginary.

In divers others of his preachings and discourses we find the following descriptions of this so lauded kingdom.

It was in this wise that he spake to the nations: The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field. But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat and went his way. But when the blade was sprung up and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. It is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof he goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field. And again it is likened unto a merchantman seeking goodly pearls; who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it. It is like unto a net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind, which, when it was full, they drew to shore, and sat down, and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away. It is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field; which, indeed, is the least of all seeds; but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof, etc. Very worthy of a God, these discourses and such like, are they not?

And in like manner must we judge of his acts, if we examine them closely. First, his having strolled about an entire province preaching and proclaiming the new coming of a kingdom that up to the present has never come. Second, his having been transported by the Devil to the top of a high mountain, where he fancied he saw all the kingdoms of the earth; this could only be but the delusion of a visionary; for it is certain that there is not a mountain on the surface of the earth from the extreme summit of which can be even seen the whole of one single kingdom, unless it be the petty kingdom of Yvetot, which is in France. It was then only in his own imagination that he saw all those kingdoms, and that he was transported to the top of this mountain, as well as to the pinnacle of the temple. Third, when he healed the deaf and dumb man as mentioned in St. Mark, it is said that he put his fingers into his ears, and that having spat on the ground, he threw up his eyes, gave a deep sigh, and said to him, Ephphatha. In a word, read which we may of his recorded acts, they are all more ridiculous one than the other.

And now, having had under our eyes some of the fooleries attributed by the Christians to a God, we will proceed to examine a little into their mysteries. They worship one God in three persons, or three persons in one God, and they attribute to themselves the power of manufacturing gods out of paste of flour, even to the manufacturing of as many of them as they will. For, according to their principles, they have only to pronounce four words over any number of glasses of wine, or of these wafers of flour, and they straightway become as many Gods, were there millions of them. What nonsense! With all the pretended power of their Christ, they could not make even the smallest insect, and they believe they are able to make Gods by the thousand. They are indeed the victims of a strange blindness, those who maintain such miserable errors, based as they moreover are on the doubtful sayings of a fanatic.

They cannot perceive, blind that they are, that it will open a wide door for all sorts of idolatry to worship their images of wafer, under the pretext that their priests have the power of consecrating them, and of changing them into Gods. All the priests of all the idols that ever were, might they not have boasted, would they not still boast, of being able to do as much?

Neither can they perceive that the same reasons that demonstrate the vanity of the gods of wood, stone, etc., worshiped by the pagans, demonstrate equally the vanity of the gods of paste and flour, worshiped by themselves. Why do they deride the pagan gods? Is it not because they are but the work of men's hands, dumb and insensible images? And what, then, are their own gods, whom they keep shut up in a box, for fear of the mice?

In what, then, may consist the vain resources of the Christians? In their morality? It is the same at bottom as that of any other religion; men's cruel dogmas have been born of it, and have preached persecution and hatred. In their miracles? But what nation has not had its own laughed at and derided by all wise and thinking men? Their prophecies? Has not their utter falsehood been demonstrated? Their morals? Have not these been and are they not still, too often infamous? The establishment of their creed? Did not fanaticism begin, intrigue build up, and brutal force support visibly, palpably, the edifice? Their doctrine? But is it not the height of absurdity?

To conclude, my dear parishioners, I trust I have herein given you a sufficient preservative against all such follies, but your own reason will do more than my arguments, in the which I would to God I were mistaken! But from the days of Constantine human blood has been shed like water for the establishment of these abominable impostures. The churches, Roman, Greek, Protestant, so many vain disputes, and so many ambitious hypocrites, have ravaged Europe, Africa, and Asia. Add to these, my friends, the multitudes offered up as victims to these quarrels, the multitudes of priests and of nuns rendered sterile by their profession, and you will say with me that the Christian creed has destroyed the half of the human race.

May the true God, the great God of the universe, lead us back once more to that religion of nature, the arch-enemy of which is Christianity; that sacred and holy religion that has its place in the human heart, and teaches us to do unto others as we would be done by. Then nowhere on this earth could there be found other than good citizens, kind and just fathers, obedient and submissive children, and devoted and loving friends. God gave us such religion when he gave us our reason. May fanaticism no longer pervert it!

The end of my earthly course is drawing very near, and, to resume all the experience of my life and career in a few words, I would that the last of the kings were strangled with the intestines of the last of the priests!

Letters from the Devil.

NO. XII.

My Dear Readers: I promised you that in this letter I would talk about the formation of the strata of rocks which form the crust of the earth. You must know, then, that when, after very lengthened eras, the surface of the earth had got so cooled down that water could remain upon it in a fluid form, the fused matter of which the globe was composed became solid, and formed what are called igneous rocks, or rocks congealed from a fused condition. These may be said to form the substratum of the crust of the earth. This sort of rock is denominated trap by your geologists, and differs from other rocks more in the process by which it was produced than in its inherent composition.

At the time the earth became crusted over, the internal commotions of the seething mass produced great disturbances upon the surface. You can hardly imagine what a rugged and uneven surface the earth presented at that time. Fissures were produced which ran down into the earth not only hundreds of feet, but absolutely miles in extent. The portions of the earth immerged in water were often covered to immense depths; and, notwithstanding that extensive upheavals have taken place and the configuration of the surface has been wonderfully changed, the leveling tendency has ever since been in operation; the mountains have been crumbling and wearing down, and the gulches, fissures, and valleys have been gradually filling up.

The formations of the mountains on the globe were among the grandest phenomena that have ever taken place in connection with your earth, and were splendid to behold. I assure you it was a majestic sight to float over the earth at an altitude of one or two miles and witness the rising, from the seething mass within, of a chain of grand mountains hundreds of miles in extent. It was interesting to see the rocks tossing and tumbling, moved by the forces swelling the fiery tide below, as the winds play with the leaves of the forest. Jah and I often used to stop in our flights around the globe and witness the birth of mountains. When the earth had made an extra vigorous throe, Jah would clap his hands in the greatest enthusiasm and shout to me, "I tell you, Luce, that was grand! That effort could not have been beaten, could it?"

"No, Jah," I replied; "that was about as fine as anything we ever saw. I perceive that the people who will in future ages inhabit this part of the globe will call these mountains that have just been thrown up the Alleghanies. Those on the west side of this continent, which were thrown up the last time we were over there, will be called the Rocky Mountains, while there will be an immense upheaval on the other side of the globe, and those will be called the Himalayas. I know, Jah, you will be pleased to see them come up, and if you wish I will let you know when the rising is to take place, and you can step around and witness it."

"All right, Luce; put me down for that display. I will be sure to be on hand."

In addition to the solidification of the fused matter on the surface of the globe, immense quantities of the rocks were produced by the tremendous outflows of lava, or rock material in a state of fusion. There were ten times as many volcanoes in operation on the globe then as now, and the way they threw up the melted rocks and earthy matter was most interesting to behold. On the side of the earth turned away from the sun it was a magnificent picture to see the fiery tide pouring out of some half a dozen different craters and witness the swelling streams of liquid fire rushing down the mountain sides and seeking repose in the valleys at its feet. Sometimes these deposits of igneous formations would amount to hundreds and thousands of feet in depth, and it would require a long time for it to cool down to the temperature of the surrounding rocks.

The disintegration of the mountains of rocks was the work of vast epochs of time, but, under the effects of the air, the water, the sun, and the elements of nature, did the work. The vast oceans in time dissolved and bore away immense quantities of triturated rocks and sedimentary matter of various kinds. These fine particles of rocky material were deposited in strata on the bed of the ocean, and for a long, long time remained in a soft, plastic state like mud or clay, but in time hardened and became solid rock. These formations are known as aqueous rocks, because they are deposited by the water; and this accounts for the laminated or stratified appearance which they present, in contradistinction to the igneous rocks, which show no seams or strata.

The early age of the earth in which these processes took place is called the Azoic age, because it was without life, or when there was no organized life upon the planet, and it covered a great era of time; thousands of years would be but a mild way of expressing the extent of era. Jah and I were busy at work all along those flitting ages, laying the foundations of things for the teeming life that was to exist on the globe. We attended personally to the igneous upflow, as well as to the aqueous deposits which now form your lower strata of rocks; and in a similar manner other stratifications took place from age to age, as the planet ripened in years.

The second age of the earth is called the Paleozoic, in consequence of its great antiquity, and is subdivided according to the forms of animal life which subsequently appeared. The first division is called the Silurian, in which appeared the molluscs, including cuttle-fish, oysters, clams, snails, and all animals of the same class having no vertebra or backbone; the second, the Devonian, or the age of the fishes; the third, the Carboniferous, or the age of the coal plants; the fourth, the Mesozoic age, or the age of reptiles; the fifth, the Cenozoic age, or the age of mammals; the fifth, the Age of Man. I do not wish to anticipate, but deem it best to name the different ages, that we may understand each other as we go along.

The earliest stratified rocks contained no qualities not resident in the primitive or igneous formations; though in many of the rocks subsequently formed were deposits of chemical or crystallized matter, as I described to you in a former letter. The lower strata of rocks just alluded to contain no fossils, nor remains of organic life, vegetable or animal, for the reason that when they were formed, no life at that time had taken place on the globe; and how this kind of life first came into existence, will give me great pleasure to inform you. The crust of the earth varies in thickness from ten miles to one hundred miles or thereabouts, and this variation is due to several causes, among which are the condition of the fused mass of the fiery ocean below in different parts of the globe, the nature of the crust itself in various localities, and the magnetic currents that permeate in varying degrees the outer portion of the earth.

From a chemical point of view, about one-half of the earth's crust is oxygen, which, as you already know, in its natural state is an invisible gas. I have indicated to you that that is the supporter of life and of combustion. Water contains nearly ninety per cent of it, and the atmosphere more than twenty per cent. Sand is more than half oxygen, and limestone and clay about half.

About twenty-five per cent of the earth's crust is silicon, the base of silica, sand, and flint, which are simply silicon combined with oxygen. When thus combined, let me tell you, it is the principal ingredient of all the rocks except marble and limestone. In pure water silica is not soluble, though when highly heated and when moderately warm and combined with potash, which is again about half oxygen, it is readily dissolved by water, and thus may be deposited wherever the water flows. The pores of organic bodies buried in the earth have in this way frequently been filled with silica, and the shape and general appearance of them preserved for ages.

Another important element in the earth's surface is aluminum, a white metal between tin and iron in some of its qualities, but light as chalk. When combined with oxygen it forms the clay with which the earth so plentifully abounds. Other substances or impurities are often blended with it, sometimes iron and sometimes other substances. When pure aluminum is crystallized it forms the sapphire, next in hardness to the diamond.

Calcium also enters largely into the crust of the earth. It is a light yellow metal a little harder than lead, and unites with oxygen with the greatest facility, forming quicklime. Limestone and marble are the carbonates of lime. When burned in the kiln the carbonic acid is driven off and the quicklime is left. One ton of good limestone yields about eleven hundred-weight of lime. When lime and sulphuric acid are united, sulphate of lime, or gypsum, is the result. Of this large quantities are found in the the outer portions of the earth.

Magnesium exists in considerable quantities, especially in some varieties of rock. It is a white, brilliant metal. It, also, combines so readily with oxygen that it is not easily kept from oxidization. When thus united with oxygen, it becomes magnesia. United with silica it forms hornblende, talc, soapstone, and serpentine. The soapstone stands a very high degree of heat without decomposition.

Iron forms about two per cent of the earth's crust, and a much larger portion of its internal composition, as I have before indicated. It is seldom found in its native condition except in meteorites, but is combined with oxygen, carbon, and sulphur. When iron rusts, it is simply forming a union with oxygen. Iron is found blended with many varieties of rocks, and hence becomes an ingredient of soils.

Potassium, another important component ingredient in the earth's crust, in its metallic state is silver-white, soft and plastic, and may be molded like wax. It has a greater affinity for oxygen than any other metal, as is proved by its burning when thrown upon the surface of water, the oxygen of the water uniting with it and liberating the hydrogen, which burns with a beautiful flame. By this process potassium becomes potash. It exists chiefly in feldspar and clay, and constitutes about five per cent of the igneous rocks. It enters into most woody fiber and the stalks of many vegetables. Combined with nitric acid it constitutes nitre, or saltpetre, which is a conspicuous element in the earth's surface.

Sodium resembles potassium in appearance and other qualities. Combined with oxygen it becomes soda, and with chlorine, a heavy gas, it becomes salt. Of this large quantities are held in solution in the waters of the ocean. It is also found in vast beds in various parts of the earth. It exists in the igneous rocks, and some seven per cent of granite is soda.

Carbon is generally found united with oxygen, when they becomes carbonic acid gas. In this condition immense quantities are locked up in the lime-rock and coal of the earth. The atmosphere contains about one part in twenty-five hundred by weight; but as I told you in a former letter, previous to the existence of limestone and the coal, it was united with the atmosphere in far greater proportions. Charcoal, as you know, is nearly pure carbon, while the diamond is the same thing in the crystallized form. Without carbon the trunks of trees and other plants would not have sufficient stamina to stand erect and resist the winds which so often fiercely sweep by them. About two per cent of the earth's crust is carbon.

Hydrogen I have talked to you about already. It is the lightest substance of which you have any knowledge, and exists in great abundance, and extends farther from the earth than any other form of matter connected with it. It forms one-ninth part by weight of water, and since water enters into the combination of the rocks and the earths, it cannot, for a moment be lost sight of. Gypsum contains twenty per cent of water. So including the water which exists in such immense quantities on the earth's surface, hydrogen, of course, figures extensively in forming the earth's exterior.

Sulphur is sometimes found in a perfectly free state, but more generally in combination with metals, as iron, lead, copper, silver, etc.

Of the elements I have here named, the exterior portions of the earth are largely composed, and by union they form the various minerals; thus silicon and oxygen form quartz, which when ground to powder forms sand; and this, united again by pressure, makes sandstone. Flint is a variety of quartz. In its various forms quartz forms nearly one-half of the earth's crust.

Silica, uniting with alumina and potash and soda, forms feldspar, which constitutes one-tenth part of the earth's crust. Mica is composed of nearly the same materials in different proportions.

Limestone, or the carbonate of lime—a union of carbonic acid with lime—forms about one-seventh of the crust of the earth.

Hornblende, a black or greenish-black mineral which enters into the composition of most of the igneous rocks, is composed of silica and magnesia. Such rocks are very tough and dark in color. Talc, or soapstone, a soft mineral, I have already mentioned. Chlorite, a mineral somewhat like talc, is also composed of silica and magnesia.

Granite is the great underlying rock of the globe, and was produced, as I have already intimated, by the cooling of the fluid mass below the surface. Dig where you please, if you go deep enough you will be pretty sure to find granite. It is not a little curious that, while it occupies the lowest position in the earth's strata, it is also found on the surface of the earth and on the tops of the highest mountains, as you may find by visiting the White Mountains in your own New Hampshire, Mont Blanc in Europe, and many peaks of the Rocky Mountains. These were, in an early age of the world, thrown up, in the way I have described, from the lower strata. It is by no means uncommon that rocks are found upon the surface of the earth that originally were a mile or more below. Granite is crystalline in structure, and is composed of feldspar, quartz, and mica. Different varieties of granite possess other ingredients not necessary now to mention.

As the water descended it wore down this granitic crust in a manner similar to the rivers wearing down the rocks at the present time, though owing to the presence in the water at that time, of a large percentage of sulphuric acid, it possessed far greater soluble power than ordinary water, and consequently cut down the rocks much faster. The sediment thus carried down was deposited in the lower recesses of the ocean as already described.

I have explained to you the difference between igneous and aqueous rocks, and I must say a word about a third class called the metamorphic rocks. These first laid at the bottom of the ocean in the usual strata, and as such belong to the water-made rocks, but the heat passing into them from the subterranean fires, they became melted and otherwise transformed, so that upon cooling they crystallized. They possessed the appearance of the igneous rocks.

There was a time when the granite and the metamorphic rocks covered the whole globe, and on them the waters rested, and they composed the land surface in every part of the world; but at the present time but little of this primitive surface remains. It has been covered by sediment, worn down and carried away by the waters, and only those portions exist which have not been worn away, or are under water, and so have never been covered by sediment. Where these rocks are found on the surface, and at the tops of mountains, as I showed you, they have been elevated in the great upheavals that have taken place from beneath the underlying rocks; while in still other localities the rocks that once laid above them have been swept off by denuding agencies that have been operating for unnumbered ages.

But I have held you long enough for one letter. I will now give you a rest by closing. I thank you for the attention you give me. I will meet you again in a week from this day, when I will tell you something of the successful experiments my Brother and myself made in getting up animal and vegetable life.

Until that happy hour, my dear readers, still believe me your true friend,

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

THE COPERNICAN SYSTEM.

The treatise of Nicholas Kopernik, on the Revolution of the Heavenly Bodies, in which, for the first time, appeared what is now known as the Copernican system of astronomy, was given to the world in 1543. The author was old and feeble, and dared not undertake the publication of his work himself. The friend to whom he instrusted the task, in order to break the force of the hostility which he saw was sure to be aroused by the book, prefaced it with a declaration that its doctrines were put forth merely as plausible theories, assumed hypothetically, and not as absolutely true. Thus modified, the book was printed, and a copy of it was put into the hands of its author as he lay upon his death-bed. For many years it attracted no particular attention. The telescope had not yet been invented, so that there were no means of verifying or disproving, by actual observation, the conclusions to which Kopernik had arrived, and some eminent astronomers, among them Tycho Brahe, refused altogether to accept them. Theologians dismissed them with contemptuous disdain. Luther called Kopernik "an upstart astrologer" and "a fool, who wishes to reverse the entire science of astronomy." Melancthon declared it to be "a want of honesty and decency to assert such notions publicly;" and when Giordano Bruno visited England, in 1583, he found himself quite alone in his recognition of the new theory of the solar system. At length, however, the telescope confirmed Kopernik, and men of science accordingly began to adopt his views. Then the Church roused itself. The treatise of the deceased astronomer was, in 1616, put upon the Index Expurgatorius, and the famous proceedings against Galileo, who had distinguished himself as Kopernik's advocate, were set on foot. Without repeating the familiar story of Galileo's trial, condemnation, and abjuration, it may be interesting to reproduce some of the formal contradictions of the truth of the Copernican system which were made in the course of the proceedings against him.

In 1612 Cardinal Conti writes, in reply to a letter from Galileo making inquiry of him on the subject, that the opinions of Kopernik appear to him to be altogether inconsistent with the holy Scriptures.

In 1614 the Dominican monk Father Caccini preached at Florence his famous sermon against Galileo from the text, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?"

For the year 1616 the records of the Inquisition at Rome show the following entry:

"PROPOSITIONS TO BE CENSURED.

"Censure made in the Holy Office of the city, Wednesday, Feb. 24, 1616, before the undersigned Theological Fathers.

"First—The sun is the center of the world, and altogether immovable with local motion.

"Censure.—All said the said proposition to be foolish and absurd in philosophy and formally heretical, inasmuch as it contradicts expressly the teachings of Holy Writ in many places, according to the proper meaning of words, common interpretation, and the opinion of the holy fathers and doctors of theology.

"Second—The earth is not the center of the world, nor immovable, but in its totality is moved with a daily motion.

"Censure.—All said this proposition should receive the same censure in philosophy, and in regard to theological truth to be at least erroneous in faith."

Then follow the names of eleven members of the Holy Office, one of them being an archbishop. The following day, Thursday, Feb. 25, 1616, the following entry was made:

"The most illustrious Lord Cardinal Millinus notified the reverend fathers, lords assessors, and the commissary of the Holy Office that censure had been returned by the theological fathers upon the propositions of the mathematician Galileo, that the sun is the center of the world and immovable with local motion, and that the earth is moved with daily motion. His Holiness ordered the illustrious Lord Cardinal Bellarmine to call before him the said Galileo and admonish him to relinquish the condemned opinion, and, if he refused to appear, that the Father Commissary make him a precept before a notary and witnesses to altogether abstain from teaching any doctrine or opinion of this sort, or to defend it, or to treat of it, and if he do not acquiesce that he be imprisoned."

Immediately following this entry is one purporting to relate the giving to Galileo, in the public manner provided, of the precept not to hold or teach the Copernican doctrine, and his promising to obey. According to other authorities the monition was made privately by Cardinal Bellarmine. Whichever action was had, it was the last for many years. Not before 1632 was the proceeding stirred up again, but then matters went on with energy to their final result. In 1633 judgment was pronounced against Galileo in these terms:

"We say, pronounce, judge, and declare thee, the aforesaid Galileo, to have rendered thyself to this Holy Office vehemently suspected of heresy on account of those things which were deduced in the written process and which thou hast confessed as above; that is, that thou didst believe and hold that false doctrine, and contrary to the holy and divine Scriptures, that the sun is the center of the universe and does not move from east to west, and that the earth moves and is not the center of the world; and that such an opinion may be held and defended as probable after it was declared and defined to be contrary to Holy Writ, and consequently that thou hast incurred all the censures and punishments decreed and promulgated by the sacred canons and other general and particular constitutions against delinquents of this sort. From the which it pleases us to absolve thee, provided only thou first, with sincere heart and unfeigned faith, before us abjure, curse, and detest the aforesaid errors and heresies, and any other error and heresy contrary to the Catholic and Apostolic Church, in the form which shall be shown by us to thee."

The next day Galileo publicly made the required abjuration and took a solemn oath never thereafter, in speech or in writing, to teach that the sun stands still and the earth moves.

The foregoing is by a writer in one of our recent New York periodicals, and from its appropriateness is transferred here. The honor of first giving to the world the true theory of the motion of the solar system is by universal consent accorded to Copernicus, though there are the strongest grounds for believing that Pythagoras more than three thousand years ago taught that the sun was the center of the system, and that the earth moved around it, and not the sun around the earth. From modern philological discoveries made in India, it is found that practically the same doctrines were taught in that ancient country before the time of Pythagoras, and why they should have fallen into disbelief seems singular; but there were no telescopes in those days with which to closely watch and prove the motions of the heavenly bodies, and it was so apparent to the general observer that the earth remained stationary and that the sun passed around it that Ptolemy and all the rest seemed to accept it as a fact. Besides, as the Jewish Scriptures taught the same incorrect system, the nations who adopted them as the basis of their theological belief were strongly inclined to disregard the Pythagorian system of astronomy and adopt fully the Ptolemaic. Copernicus is however as justly entitled to the honor and praise of the world for the great discoveries he made as though Pythagoras and the Indian astronomers had never existed, for in his time it had become unknown that what is called the Heliocentric theory had ever been taught.

The great merit of Copernicus, and the basis of his claim to the discovery under consideration, is that he was not satisfied with a mere discovery of his views, but that he devoted a large share of the labors of a lifetime to their demonstration, and thus placed them in such a light as to render their ultimate acceptance inevitable. Apart from all questions of the truth or falsity of his theory, the great work which it has developed, De Revolutionibus Orbium Celestium deservedly ranks as the most important compendium of astronomy which has ever appeared in the world. Few books have been more completely the labor of the lifetime of one individual than this.

Copernicus was born in Thorn, in Prussia, in 1473, twenty years before the discovery of America, but he studied at the university of Cracow. He became an ecclesiastical dignitary, holding the rank of canon during a large portion of his life, and finding ample leisure in this position to pursue his favorite studies. His own scientific inclinations prompted him to the pursuit. It is claimed that he conceived the true system of the world as early as 1507. For many subsequent years, during the middle portion of his life, he applied himself to astronomical observations and computations necessary to the perfection of the system he had devised. He communicated his views to his limited number of friends by whom they were received with such doubts and protestations as great innovators are bound to experience. He long withheld the publication of his views, fearing the popular prejudices that would be sure to be aroused. In 1540 a brief statement of his theory was published by his friend Rheticus; and as this was somewhat more favorably received than was expected, he soon set about the publication of his great work, and as is seen by the foregoing statement he barely lived to see the first copy that was completed from the press, and it was left for an admiring world to do him honor.

Besides the great effect which the discoveries of Copernicus had upon the astronomical views which the world had previously indulged in, they were also destined to have fully as great an effect upon the theology of the world. With the reception of the truth of his system the errors of current theology had to give way. Since the world has been compelled to admit the fact that the earth is not the center of the universe, and that the sun and all the stars do not revolve around it, the main pillar of theological belief has been overthrown. Genesis, and almost the entire Bible, has practically been set aside. What is called "revelation" has retired to the rear, and positive knowledge has come to the front. It has been found that the latter is far more truthful and reliable than the former, and the wise and sensible among the inhabitants of the earth have been governed accordingly.

It has been well and truthfully said that "the work of Copernicus was the greatest step ever taken in astronomy. But he still took little more than the single step of showing what apparent motions in the heavens were real, and what were due to the motion of the observer. Not only was his work in other respects founded on that of Ptolemy, but he had many of the notions of ancient philosophy respecting the fitness of things. Like Ptolemy he thought the heavens as well as the earth to be spherical, and all the celestial motions to be circular, or composed of circles. He argues against Ptolemy's objections to the theory of the earth's motion; that that philosopher treats of it as if it were an enforced or violent motion, entirely forgetting that if it exists it must be a natural motion, the laws of which are altogether different from those of violent motion. Thus, a part of this argument was really without scientific foundation, though his conclusion was correct. Still Copernicus did all that could have been done under the circumstances. His hypothesis of a small epicycle one-third the eccentricity represented the motions of the planets around the sun, with all the exactness that observation then admitted of, while, in the absence of any knowledge of the laws of motion, it was impossible to frame any dynamical basis for the motions of the planets."

Comstockism Snubbed.

By a recent decision by Judge Dillon in the U. S. Court in St. Louis, when Drs. Clark Whittier, Chas. A. Bohannan, and T. W. Williams were arraigned for sending prohibited matter through the mails, a reproof was cast by the Judge upon the principal agent of the "Society for the Suppression of Vice" for sending decoy letters to induce parties to commit what the laws—the passage of which was procured by the same agent—pronounce a crime. The Judge held that, were prohibited information sent by mail to a fictitious party who has no existence, legally no crime had been committed, from the very fact that no information had been absolutely imparted to a bona fide person. For that reason he decided that a case could not be maintained against the accused. If such rulings had been made in Judge Benedict's court in the numerous cases brought by Anthony Comstock, many an unfortunate wretch, instead of being sent to prison for a term of years, would have been set at liberty. Who can say that society or morals have been subserved by the Comstock mode of doing business?

Judge Treat in following Judge Dillon made these remarks:

"The questions involved in these cases are extremely difficult of solution. It is necessary to discriminate with care, on the one hand, between the offense charged against the postal laws and the modes of proving the same, and on the other hand the offense stricken at by state statutes, and the moral wrong and outrages implied in the vocation or business denounced. The sense of indignation against such vocations or conduct should not permit a violation by the courts of established rules of law or an unlawful exercise of jurisdiction, nor the countenance of unlawful contrivances to induce or manufacture crime.

"The postal system is designed by statute, for obvious reasons, to observe and not enforce the sanctity of private correspondence."

Well would it be if the United States Court in this district could have been presided over by judges able and fair enough to give such rulings.

The Radical Pulpit.

The Value of the Higher Sentiments.

A SERMON BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

I have something to say, this morning, on the practical values of the higher sentiments. The word "sentiment" is of vague significance. I use it in the best accepted meaning, as expressing the higher feelings of humanity. A sentiment is not a dogma, or a doctrine, or a thought; neither is it a powerful feeling or emotion. We may say that it is thought saturated with feeling, or it is feeling based upon thought. The element of intellectuality and the element of feeling always cease in a sentiment. Thus, we say adoration is a sentiment, the sense of the sublime is a sentiment, reverence is a sentiment, admiration is a sentiment. Analyze any of these things, and we find at the bottom there is always a basis of opinions, whereas how beautiful and charming and evanescent in its influence is the aroma of feeling which associates with it. Sentiments hold the same place in the conduct of life that flowers and pictures do. Flowers are the aroma of nature; the fleeting, evanescent bloom on the face of things. The value of a picture does not consist in the texture of the canvas or in the character of the pigments with which it is painted, but in the delicate communication of genius which the artist, out of his own mind, imparts to those of vulgar taste. The power of the statue does not lie in the material of which it is composed, whether it be marble or granite or alabaster, but in the fine element of creative genius which the artist has imparted to it. The higher feelings, the higher sentiments, do for the practical life exactly what these lovely things, these creations of nature and art, do for the education of the whole human family. Now, of late years, it has been the custom of chemists to take things piecemeal, to resolve them, so to say, into their elements. The chemist will take a creation of art and resolve it into a few vulgar pigments. The same moral chemistry has been at work of late years, to pull to pieces these fine sentiments, showing them to be composed of very cheap and even vulgar and disreputable elements.

For instance, Mr. Thomas Butler resolves the sentiment of reverence into wonder and fear. We wonder, he says, because we are ignorant; we fear because we are weak. As we outgrow our ignorance and our weakness, we outgrow our veneration. In wild and savage times, when ignorance was dense and weakness was all but universal; when one man, or half a dozen men had all the knowledge and one person had all the power; when the sceptre was given into one hand and the crown was placed upon one head, then reverence was at its highest, then the priest, taking advantage of it, kept man down in the most supreme degradation. Then the king, the potentate, the emperor, the prince, taking advantage of it, kept man down in abject servility. As knowledge extended, as men became masters of their existence, reverence declined. Submit any of our sentiments to the same process, the sentiment of thanksgiving, thankfulness, gratitude. Gratitude, in the last analysis, may be resolved into a kind of self-complacency. We are thankful for what we respectively receive, for a single favor bestowed upon us and no one else, because we are picked out from the world, lifted and set apart, for the bestowment of some special gift; we are thankful just in proportion as we feel we are well to do. The consequence is that the feeling of gratitude, the sentiment of thankfulness, is associated with a kind of partiality, exclusiveness, and even meanness. But, as we search the world more generally, and discover that the great giver of gifts bestows what are not favors but objects of favors, that sorrow keeps pace with joy all round the world, that disappointment balances satisfaction, and that the wildest despairs are scattered broadcast over humanity, the sentiment of thanksgiving begins to decline. We then doubt whether there be any being to whom we should give thanks; and when, furthermore, the review reveals the fact that the discipline of life is not a discipline; that sorrow does not soften; that care does not dignify; that disappointment does not dream and relieve; then the sentiment of thanksgiving declines more and more, until at last it goes out altogether, and in place of gratitude we have the grim duty, the determination to do our best for ourselves, to fight our way through the world as well as we can and ask no favors from anybody. Apply the same method of analysis to the sentiment of loyalty, which plays so heroic and beautiful a part in the education and history of mankind. Loyalty, that is the soldier's fidelity to his flag; that is the patriot's fidelity to his country; that is the yeoman's fidelity to his prince, the nobleman's fidelity to his king or queen. It betrays; therefore, a narrow exclusiveness closely associated with pride and vanity, self-conceit and, to a certain extent, servility. For why is the noble loyal to his king except that he expects favors? Why is the soldier loyal to his flag? Why is the patriot loyal to his country except that he identifies his own prosperity, his own happiness, his own dignity with that of his country? Therefore, loyalty may be resolved by this remorseless process into a peculiar subtile kind of selfishness which does not ennoble, which does not dignify. As our ideas are expanded; as our sympathies are extended; as humanity is more than country; as humanity is more than kings, more than princes; as the ideal is more than the symbol, loyalty ceases, and each man and woman looks out for himself or herself.

Honor, the sentiment of honor, what is it? Honor is a man's pride in himself, that is, a man's feeling of selfishness. Take even that delicate, lovely quality, modesty, that sweet, fair, most aromatic of all virtues, that grace almost too evanescent to be called a quality—and, aye, it possesses subtle forces. What is it? Shyness, timidity, self-distrust, self-depreciation, self-contentment, and even a fault which marks those who do not estimate themselves, who do not estimate their future conduct, who do not stand upon their qualities, who go shining about, deferring to this one and that, and humbly waiting for some favors to be bestowed upon them.

It is quite possible that loyalty and honor and admiration and reverence and modesty may all spring from this mean beginning. What of that? The pond-lily that floats in the water in your parlor had its root in the mud. Go down into the slime from which it grew and there are all manner of disgusting things. Is the lily less beautiful? Is its whiteness less lovely? Is its aroma less sweet? Is it any the less perhaps the most charming creation of nature. The rose which beauty wears on its bosom, does it lose in color or fragrance because it has to be diligently cultivated in soil and in an earthen pot. Beauty does not carry the earthen pot about from which it grew. The rose vindicates itself. What if the works of art, the "Transfiguration" of Raphael, the "Assumption" of Titian, are nothing but a few coarse pigments painted upon coarse canvas. What of it? Is the picture less divine, is it any the less fascinating? Day by day it still continues to fascinate more and more as the exquisite beauty is apparent.

The visitor in the cathedral of St. Peter's at Rome, standing upon the marble floor looking up into the dome, which hangs overhead like the all-covering heavens—here, through the gloomy atmosphere, we see the forms of evangelists, saints, angelic in their greatness and gracefulness. We stand there on the pavement rapt in wonder. The heavens seem coming down with these angelic forms. Up, up, through a narrow winding staircase, we climb to a narrow balcony that surrounds the dome. What are all these? What are they made of? Bits of charcoal, pieces of brick, fragments of broken glass, which the artist put in place exactly where each one was most effective. Who cares that these seraphic features were made of these bits of broken glass and charcoal and fragments of bricks? There they are, there they have been ever since genius placed them there, and there they will stand as long as human edifice is allowed to remain on the globe. Grant that lovely things have ugly beginnings; the question is, Are the things in themselves lovely? Take this sentiment of reverence; its beginning, we will say, was in wonder born of ignorance, in fear born of weakness. Grant that it is born of superstition that has crouched into the dust; grant that kings and priests have played upon it, and have degraded mankind; grant that almost every ugly thing, and certainly some of the most ugly things, in history are traceable to it—yet reverence, when cultivated and refined, when born into nobleness, is still a spiritual grace so exquisite that it deserves to be called divine. Emanuel Kant said, "Two things excite my veneration: the starry heavens, and the moral nature of man." Was Emanuel Kant's wonder born of ignorance? Was his fear born of weakness? He was the prince of modern philosophers; in his day, one of the greatest mathematicians; in his time, one of the most advanced psychologists. Emanuel Kant foretold the existence of the planet Uranus before Herschel discovered it. Emanuel Kant was no more awe-struck before the heavens than the first modern astronomer is; and this Emanuel Kant earned an immortal fame by the keenness with which he traced out the processes of development.

Take the sentiment of thanksgiving. It may consist of a species of self-complacency. Grant that it provokes self-conceit. We are angry at times with the thankful people who have everything they want, forgetful of the millions of people who have nothing they want at all. Grant that nothing is more impertinent at times than the gratefulness of people, for it is associated with self-conceit, with vanity, with the feeling that they are the elect, that they are picked out from the rest of mankind; and yet what is lovelier than to despise to receive, to put one's self as a recipient before nature, before man, before one's friends; always to keep the attitude of one who has not everything and who is not ashamed to thank you when you will bestow the smallest gift?

The sentiment of loyalty is, indeed, associated with some of the ugliest things in history—with cruelties, with oppression, with servility, with partisanship; and yet what is more kingly, more transporting, than to see a man faithful to his principles—a reformer clinging to his cause, a philanthropist living up to his ideal of rectitude, a dreamer following his vision?

Honor—the law of honor, the code of honor—is the code of the duelist. Grant that honor has been associated with cowardice, with servility, with cruelty; nevertheless, the sentiment of honor is that which makes out of the common man the gentleman; it is that which gives to the gentleman his quality of gentlemanliness; it is that which makes a man pledge his life, ready to bear, to endure, to do anything, rather than to compromise the fair purity of his character.

Modesty may be shyness, self-depreciation, self-contempt; but suppose all the world were immodest, suppose no man depreciated himself, took himself, perhaps, for a little less than he was worth—what would become of us? What would become of society then? That lovely flower, modesty, so evanescent—it breathes the aroma of truth, gives bloom to all our society.

The Three Currency Systems.

There is now being discussed by the American people, and urged for adoption by their respective advocates, three systems of currency. One is a system for the people, another is a system for the banks, and the third is a combination of the two. The first, the legal-tender note or greenback system, is based upon the credit of the Government, the property of all the people and the wealth of the entire nation. The second is the national bank note system and is based upon the credit and property of the national bank corporations secured to a certain e nt by government credit in the form of United States bonds purchased by the banks and deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington.

The third system is one to be formed by a combination of the legal-tender notes and the national bank notes. By this system the Government would furnish a part of the currency in the form of greenbacks, and the banks a part in the form of bank notes. The adherents of each of these systems propose eventually to have their currency at par with coin and hence convertible into coin at the will of the holder. Now, what are the advantages and disadvantages of each of these systems, and which would be best suited to the wants of the business of the country and of the most profit to a majority of the people?

One of the most important advantages of the greenback over the bank note system is, that greenbacks are made lawful money for ordinary business purposes, while the bank notes are not, but are simply convertible into lawful money. The difference between money and currency is this: Money is that which the law declares shall be received in payment of debts, and for that reason it becomes a legal-tender. This is why greenbacks are called legal-tender notes. Currency may be money, or it may be something which is used in business transactions as substitute for money. These national bank notes are currency, but they are not money for general business purposes. Greenbacks are both money and currency, while bank notes are only currency. All money is currency, but not all currency is money. Currency, however, is supposed to be at all times convertible into money. Bank notes are at par with greenbacks, and circulate equally as well with them from the fact that the banks are, when called upon, obliged to give greenbacks in exchange for them. Although bank notes seem to be of the same value as greenbacks and interchange freely with them, yet from the fact that one is money and the other is not, it makes the greenback far the more valuable. Another advantage of greenbacks over bank notes is that they are not only made and stamped by the Government as lawful money, but they represent a portion of the public debt on which the people pay no interest. Bank notes on the contrary, by being secured by Government bonds, represent a portion of the public debt on which the people do pay interest. The saving of interest that would accrue to the people in a few years by having their currency all in greenbacks representing debt that bears no interest would be immense. On the other hand the burden of taxes to be levied upon the people by changing its greenback currency, representing its non-interest debt, into Government bonds instead of paying bonds to secure a bank note currency, would also be immense. As the currency now stands there are in greenbacks in round numbers $351,000,000 and in bank notes $318,000,000. So long as greenbacks are kept as money representing the non-interest debt, at 4½ per cent they save the people, $15,795,000 a year, or in twenty years, including the principal, it would save $824,850,000. This is about half of our present bonded debt. On the other hand, the $318,000,000 of bank notes, representing that amount of bonds bearing the average rate of interest now paid on bonds (5½ per cent), are costing the people $17,490,000 a year, or in thirty years, including the principal $842,700,000. It will thus be seen that by keeping our greenbacks as currency we save in thirty years $824,750,000, and by keeping bank notes as currency it will cost the people in thirty years $842,700,000. By changing all the greenbacks to bank notes, it would cost in thirty years $824,850,000 more than it will cost to leave them as currency. By changing bank notes to greenbacks it will cost the people $842,850,000 less than it will cost to leave them as they are, adding what we now save to what we would save by having all our currency greenbacks, and it would effect a saving in thirty years of $1,667,550,000, which would just about cancel our present bonded interest debt. By putting all the present volume of currency in greenbacks we shall save in interest in thirty years enough to free the nation from debt, while if we were to convert it all into bank notes we shall nearly double the present debt at the end of that time.

Can there be any doubt in the minds of any intelligent men as to which of these two systems of currency is the best and most profitable for the people to adopt? It will be just the difference in cash between $1,667,550,000 paid to the people and that same amount paid by the people which in reality would be a difference of $3,335,100,000 in thirty years' time.

As the bankers will own the bonds that are used to redeem the greenbacks and remove them from circulation it is evident that if the bank note system of currency is adopted, this $3,335,100,000 would be earned by the people in thirty years and paid to the banks; while, if the people made greenbacks a national currency, this amount would be in the hands of those who earned it.

The principal object from first to last of those who are engineering this question of specie resumption is to get rid of the greenbacks and adopt the national bank system of currency. It was started in the first place by Wall street brokers and their associates, the national bankers. They have, by the liberal use of money, corrupted Congress, bribed the press, controlled the platform politicians, and by this means gorged the people with lies so as to induce the voters of the country to sanction their swindling schemes. The destruction of greenbacks began with Hugh McCullough, who boasts of having destroyed over $265,000,000 of them within two years after the war closed. The warfare upon them has been kept up ever since by the banks, and the specie resumption act of 1877 was designed to accomplish their entire extinction. This act, which is called a sacred pledge of the Government, should have been entitled an ACT TO ROB AND SWINDLE THE PEOPLE.

All this has been carried out under the pretense of getting to a specie basis. We are prepared to show by facts and figures that will convince all but idiots, knaves, and lunatics that every step taken to bring the currency to a specie basis by destroying the greenbacks has only made that task the more difficult to accomplish, and put the day when it will be brought about further in the future. But the people, in spite of the infamous lies of the daily press, are beginning to see the truth, and when the masses discover what an infamous fraud has been forced upon them, these hard-money devils will have more anxiety about how they will save their necks from the halter than they will about a specie basis. Greenbacks could be brought to par within a week if the Government was disposed to bring them there, but it can't be done by their destruction. Every reader of this paper should immediately write to the member of Congress in his district and tell him if he don't vote for a repeal of that infamous resumption act that they will vote to repeal him and will make it hot for him when he returns home.

The Government must be taken out of the hands of this gang of hard-money men, and the people must take charge of it themselves. The daily press must be forced to hoist the greenback flag or lose their strongholds. A press that won't be free to tell the truth can't be free to tell lies. They have sold their birthright for a mess of pottage; now let them subsist on pottage for a time. We begin to see with the poet that

> "The darkness of night is fading now,
> For daylight is brightening the mountain's brow;
> The sun is rising from his ocean bed—
> His golden light o'er the land is spread."

Theological Inquiries.

BROTHER BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your quotation in THE TRUTH SEEKER (March 9) from an editorial in the New York Weekly Sun (Feb. 13) entitled "Will Religious Teachers Awake to the Danger of the Crisis?" has induced me to send you the following questions, which a review of that article suggested, but which were not answered by its religio-political editor when sent to him for a reply:

1. What danger is anticipated in an age of universal education by the decadence of religious sentiment adapted only to the devotional proclivity of the period that produced it, when ignorance among the populace was considered a moral necessity?

2. Does not the rapid progress, which you say Infidelity is making among educated minds, show its compatibility with an age of human advancement? and were not the heresies of Martin Luther, and his co-adjutants in inaugurating the so-called Reformation of the 16th century, as conducive to Infidelity as the heresies you say many of the early Christians allowed themselves to be seduced by?

3. Does not the indifference with which you say our divines view the present religious status, demonstrate the decline of sectarian dogmatism? and that superstition is melting away before the magic breath of science, showing that theology, to be of any benefit to man, or glory to God, must necessarily keep pace with the irresistible march of advancing civilization?

4. Does not the fact which you admit, that the clergy avoided Prof. Tyndall's "bold challenge" to submit the efficacy of prayer to the test of actual experience, furnish indubitable evidence that they have no faith in answer to prayer as a miraculous test to divinity?

5. Does not the denial of eternal punishment by the numerous educated ministers you acknowledge, plainly show that modern humanity is gradually triumphing over ancient barbarism, by annulling the belief in a fiery hell of physical torture, as a mere creation of the human mind, no longer available for the purpose for which it was contrived?

6. Does not the decline, which you say is everywhere noticed in the spread of religion, prove that ancient creeds and narrow systems of belief are becoming inadequate to meet the generous and philanthropic demands of a more enlightened age in which love is predominating over fear?

7. Does not the complaint you say preachers make concerning the languishing condition of missionary work abroad, go to show that the world is growing more cosmopolitan in religious feeling, and that a religion of humanity, embracing the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, is all-sufficient for the devotional purposes of mankind?

8. Was the general D. luge which you say once followed an extinction of religion, productive of any apparent moral result—considering that Noah so soon after got drunk and cursed a portion of his offspring, causing the race to retrograde into such idolatry and wickedness that they even killed the Son of God when he came to reform them?

9. You say, "The Jews repeatedly forsook Jehovah to follow after idols." Can it be shown that they were less moral or human when using symbols in worship like those who did not evince the hostility to other sects that was manifested in Jewish bigotry, than when they followed an imaginary "man of war," (Ex. xv. 3), and "god of battles," through greed to obtain plunder and possessions by human destruction?

10. Does not collateral testimony conclusively show that the fanaticism and intolerance enjoined by the Jewish law-giver caused all the religious wars, persecution, and bloodshed of the slaughtered millions that has stained the pages of ecclesiastical history from the Midianite massacre to that of St. Bartholomew's?

11. You say, "Ever since the revival of learning, the Church, or, at least, one or the other branch of it, has been yielding as untenable one dogma after another, until it has now reached a point where its very citadel is threatened." Would you have learning suppressed for this reason? and is it not clear to an unbiased mind that in abandoning those ungenerous dogmas through educational facilities, worshipers become more charitable and humane, conclusively showing that dogmatic systems of faith and selfish modes of worship should be consigned to oblivion?

12. You say, "Something must be done soon or the mischief may become serious indeed." Does not the freedom with which secular and political journals, like the Sun, now discuss theological questions of the day, prove that editors are doing all they possibly can to show the utility of thinking for ourselves on religion and divinity, instead of mentally yielding to the despotism of sectarian creeds that were excogitated under sacerdotal authority, in accordance with an intolerant and semi-barbarous age, when dissenters were zealously pelted to death with stones, and reformers cruelly nailed to the cross? M. B. CRAVEN.

A Letter from Dr. J. M. Peebles to the "Banner of Light."

THE RELIGION OF BUDDHA—ITS DOCTRINE AND ITS HOSTILITY TO CHRISTIANITY.

CEYLON, August, 1877.—Accompanied by Doncarolis, a well-to-do Buddhist gentleman, and Mr. C. Alwis, a teacher and translator of Singhalese and Pali, I went out to the Widyodaga College, established in 1873. There were over sixty priests in this educational institution as students, besides a number of youthful laymen in the preparatory classes for priests. While the natural sciences are not ignored in this college, they are considered of much less importance than morality or religion, and, accordingly, most of the time is devoted to the study of the Sanscrit, the Pali, and Oriental literature generally.

There are three high-priests in Ceylon, two at Kandy, and one at Colombo. The latter, Prof. H. Sumanqala, is the High-Priest of the Adams' Peak diocese, and the President of this Oriental College that I visited. The priests in this college are celibates. They eat but one meal a day, and that before 12 o'clock at noon. They take no life, not even that of a worm or insect. When going out upon religious duties they walk. They are not allowed to take any money for their services. They live by begging, or upon the alms given them.

Entering the college grounds through a broad gateway, a group of young priests, some thirty or forty in number, flocked around me, attired in their gracefully-fitting yellow robes, exposing their right shoulders. They own nothing but their robes and their rice bowls. They were barefooted, and their heads shaven, for the triple purpose of comfort, neatness, and uniformity.

Introduced to the high-priest, he pleasantly invited me into an outer portico of the temple, overshadowed by palms and tropical foliage. The seat was a sort of sofa, decidedly Oriental in conception and primitive in construction. After a good square look at each other, we were at once in the full flush of conversation. This priest spoke a little English but finding it difficult to clearly convey in another language the philosophy and metaphysical subtleties threading the whole system of Eastern Buddhism, we conversed and argued our various points through the two interpreters accompanying me.

My first inquiry, after a general conversation about America, Ceylon, and England, was, "Do you consider Gautama Buddha and his teachings, as embodied in your sacred scripture, infallible?"

"We do not. Infallibility pertains only to Infinity. Sakya Gautama was a man, a brother of humanity, who, by walking in the divine path, became a Buddha. All may become Buddhas and enter Nirvana."

"What do you and the Buddhists of different countries understand by the word Nirvana?"

"It is an open question. Priests and teachers among us differ upon the point, something as do Christians about the meaning, the duration, and the location of heaven. Some consider Nirvana to mean the complete cessation of existence. This is my opinion. Others consider it to mean a cessation from further incarnations, and a perfect yet conscious peace in the bosom of the Infinite."

"But men not only love existence, but they hunger for and desire a future conscious existence."

"Yes; and just so long as they desire existence—just so long as they lust after it for the gratification of what they denominate happiness, just so long will they have it by re-incarnations or re-births back from other worlds into bodies human or animal, the grade corresponding to the deeds and moral conduct of the person's life upon earth."

"Well, it seems to me that upon the principle of the conservation of forces, once in existence, always in existence. I certainly can have no conception of annihilation—no conception of the extinction of existence."

"But neither your conception nor non-conception proves anything. The desire for an endless conscious existence is based in selfishness, and selfishness is the root of all evil. . . . In approaching this building you first perceived or had a perception of it." "Yes." Sitting now within and examining its proportions, you have conception of it." "Yes." In leaving you will not take away the building; only the conception of it." "Yes." "But will you always carry with you the conception?"

"Doubtless; unless—unless I forget it." "Ay; but forgetfulness implies a loss of memory—extinction! Most certainly you have no memory now of your infantile notions. Youth even is to us all only a half-remembered dream. And if memory, if perception, if conception, and other attributes ascribed to the soul, may perish, i. e., become extinct, may they not all? And are not change and extinction of existence taking place around us every moment? Where is the hair that covered the baby head at birth? Fallen, perished, extinct—gone into the whirl of matter! Where are the glimmering thoughts of infancy? the dreamy memories of childhood? the dimmed perceptions of the past? That which is organized must become disorganized—that which is formed must enter the void again. Earthly existence is a shadow—an evil—a selfish, troubled dream! Who does not desire extinction from it—entrance into Nirvana?"

"But," said I, "the soul is immortal—being an emanating spark; a divine principle; a spiritual force!"

"How do you know?" was the calm, meditative remark. It was a stunner. He immediately added: "A certain combination of machinery produces a watch that keeps time; but destroy the combination, break the connection of the wheels, and the motion ceases—the force is gone."

"Granted," said I; "but because 'gone,' because it eludes your grasp, it is not logical to infer the annihilation or the extinction of the force itself. It has simply been transferred."

"Transferred where? or transferred to what?" Another stunner! And before I had gathered up my reply, he added, "You spoke of the thoughts of the soul; do you consider them attributes of the soul?"

"By no means; they are rather the effects of the soul's activities. They may be compared to the sparks resulting from striking steel against flints."

At this point it is but justice to say that this priest alone, out of the twelve or fifteen with whom I conversed while in Ceylon, took there extreme grounds of materialism, and he believed in a future conscious existence, and in the return and reincarnation of spirits. But far along in the measureless ages, the soul—the all of conscious man—will, so he thinks, return to its original principles.

"Is Christianity making any headway against Buddhism here in Ceylon?" I inquired.

"It has not produced so much as a ripple upon the great body of Buddhists. The few converts that Christians have made were either from the very lowest classes or a sort of policy men, who nominally gave adhesion to Christianity to secure clerkships and Government employ. The most of these return to Buddhism at death." . . . . .

"But what," I inquired, "is to you Buddhists the most unreasonable and distasteful doctrine connected with Western Christianity?" And without a moment's hesitation he replied: "The doctrine of sacrificial substitution, or salvation through atoning blood. To us, not only the life of man, but that of the insect is sacred and inviolate. Our first commandment is, 'Do not kill.' And then to ask us to believe that the God of all worlds could only save the human race by the killing, or the shedding of the blood of his innocent Son, is to me, and must be in the opinion of any Buddhist, abhorrent, if not really blasphemous. Our Savior, or rather our great exemplar, Gautama Buddha, discovered the path, walked in it, living a holy life, and peacefully died at a good old age under the sacred bo-tree. His constant command was, 'Follow me.' There is but one way to secure salvation—but one way to reach Nirvana—and that is to pursue the path, to keep the law, and to treasure up merit." J. M. Letter from O. B. Frothingham.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The charge of having forged my signature, brought against Mr. F. E. Abbot by Mr. Butts, in a letter printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 9th, rests on a partial apprehension of the facts of the case. My name was given to a circular, which made an appeal to the friends of the Index for support. The circular contained a financial statement for which Mr. Abbot made himself solely responsible, including assertions with regard to Mr. Butts, to which, from the start, I objected. The understanding was, to the best of my belief, clear, and a declaration to the same effect was made on the face of the circular, that the signature was affixed to the appeal, and not to the whole paper, expressly not to that part of the paper which reflected injuriously on Mr. Butts. This was my first ground of defense in the suit for libel, and it was valid ground. Nothing in my affidavit was designed to cast reproach or blame on Mr. Abbot, who did simply what he was authorized to do—namely: affix my name to an appeal in behalf of the Index.

The language of the affidavit referred to does I perceive on close examination, admit of a construction injurious to Mr. Abbot; but it was never intended, or suspected by me before. I repudiate it wholly, and declare, interpreted as it ought to be, the affidavit contains no reflection on him whatever. Yours truly, O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 42.

Great Jehovah: when all the authorities teaching what are called the four gospels are examined, are we not compelled to decide that they were not written by the persons by whom they are claimed to have been written and that they were not written at the time when it is claimed they were written?

Is it not most true that there is no record that the earliest Fathers of the Christian Church made any mention of those gospels till the latter part of the second century?

Is there any record in existence to show that Polycarp, one of the first bishops in the Christian Church (and who, by the bye, there are great reasons for believing was only a mythical character) ever made the slightest mention of either of the four gospels?

Is there the first particle of proof that Ignatius (another of the early Fathers and first bishops, who wrote epistles himself, and who is also regarded as mythical) once alluded to the writings of either Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John?

Is there any ground whatever for claiming that Justin Martyr, a prominent early Father and Christian writer, who gave up his life in the latter part of the second century, ever once spoke of either of the four gospels?

Can there be found any record to show that Hegesippus, a contemporary of Justin Martyr, who wrote extensively in the second century, made the least mention of the writings of the four evangelists?

Although the latter writer frequently spoke of writings called the "Memoirs of the Apostles," which have principally passed out of existence, is it not singular if the writings of Matthew and his three fabulous compeers were at hat time in existence that he did not mention them at all?

Is it not true that the early Fathers here mentioned deemed the traditions or unwritten history of their predecessors of far more consequence than anything that was written? and did they not allude to and quote the former far more than the latter?

Were not Papias of Hierapolis and Irenæus the first of the Christian Fathers who were known to have mentioned either of the four gospels—the first mentioning them very slightly, and the second more fully?

Is it not quite as probable that they were devised by the last two characters named or by some other inventive individual or individuals?

If, then, we repeat, neither Paul nor the apostles, nor the early Fathers and bishops, knew anything about the existence of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John till the latter part of the second century, is there not the strongest ground in the world for the belief that they had not an existence much prior to that time, and that they were not written by the parties claimed?

Is there not, then, proof that the Apocryphal New Testament is as old and genuine as the canonical New Testament?

Is there not a probability that the gospel according to Barnabas is as true and as much the work of divine inspiration as that according to St. Matthew?

Is not the Gospel of Nicodemus as reliable and as worthy of confidence as the Gospel of Luke?

Is not the book called the Protevangelion as sensible and as true as the insane melange called the book of Revelations?

Is not the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians nearly equal in truth and beauty to the Epistle of Paul to the same people?

Are not the writings ascribed to Hermas, which were approvingly alluded to and quoted by Irenæus and Origen and others of the early Fathers, entitled to as favorable consideration, and do they not possess as much inherent evidence of being dictated by thee, as the writings of the evangelists, the Acts, etc.?

Are not other books, which have been declared apocryphal, as ancient, as well written, as replete with divine unction; did they not receive recognition and approval from the first Fathers and bishops as early and as emphatic as did the other gospels and epistles which centuries afterwards by contentious and angry councils were declared to be "canonical," thy Holy Word?

In view of the fact that in the second century there were a great number of gospels and epistles by unknown writers pertaining to the advent of thy Son on the earth, and that these stood about equal in point of veracity, beauty, and authority, the ease with which they could have been gotten up by any person of fair, average ability, the crudities, imperfections, and contradictions with which they all abounded, the uncertainty of authorship that rested upon nearly all alike, the great diversity of copies and transcripts that existed, the additions and abstractions that have been made on this hand and on that, the disputations, quarrels, and contentions that were so often held over them, the uncertain means that existed to enable the councils or any other persons to decide which were genuine and written or dictated by thee, or whether any of them possessed those qualities, are we not left in great doubt whether subsequent councils of angry bishops and priests made the right selection, when the canon was finally decided upon, whether the right manuscripts were selected and the wrong ones rejected, and whether any of them really possessed the qualifications of having proceeded from thy hand or of having been dictated or inspired by thy mind?

Have not the quarrels and contentions which have taken place over those competing and uncertain manuscripts been productive of as much evil as all the good amounts to that has grown out of them?

Has not the doubt and uncertainty which the world has labored under in respect to these writings, and which exist to-day, and the total lack of proof that any of them are superior to human production, entirely counterbalanced the imaginary benefits that have accrued from them?

Is it not most true that in the period of the world when these gospels and epistles were written there was a great prevalence of ignorance and superstition and a blind belief in supernatural guidance? Were not miracles and unnatural phenomena implicitly believed in, and did not this quality of ignorant belief grow out of the great want of scientific and demonstrative knowledge which prevailed in the world at that time?

Was not every operation of nature at that period looked upon as inexplicable and mysterious? and was not thy direct interposition believed to take place on nearly all occasions?

When this kind of belief prevailed, is it at all strange that marvels, myths, and miracles should be the order of the day, and that many should claim to speak in thy name and to write the words dictated by thee?

Are not candid and intelligent people of the present time fully justified in looking with great care and suspicion upon the recitals of those ancient miracles and the claims set up that writings were penned by thy special aid and dictation?

Is it at all true that thou wert more engaged eighteen hundred or twenty-five hundred years ago in having ignorant and superstitious men employed to write thy mind and will, and to impart truth and knowledge to the world, than thou art at the present day?

Is it not far more sensible and correct to conclude that those writings of the first three centuries of the Christian era were mere legends and unauthorized narratives, and many of them absolute forgeries and impositions, than that the Architect of the universe devoted a moment of his time to devising them, dictating them, or sending them forth to the world as the will of heaven?

In fact, is there anything in the style, manner, matter, grandeur, intellectual ability, harmony, and reliability of those legends and recitals that warrants us in regarding them as superior to human production, and that thou necessarily must have gotten them up, or at least have given thy assistance in that direction?

When we find a piece of writing, or any other piece of workmanship which a human being of ordinary ability could have produced, are we justified in concluding that it is superhuman and must have been the work of a God?

Are not the views taken by modern writers and thinkers, that the Bible is simply made up of the writings of an average class of men for the times in which they lived, who gathered up the legends and traditions that were in existence, and transmitted them to parchment without any aid or dictation outside of themselves, far more consistent and truthful than the absurd claim that it was thou who wrote those narratives or employed certain obscure and unknown men to write them for thee?

Are we not quite correct in deciding that every piece of writing we see is the work of some human being, until we find something absolutely beyond the power of man to produce? So long as we find nothing that man could not easily write, shall we say God must have written this?

Is it not more correct to look for thy will and power in the realm of nature, which is decidedly above the power of man to produce or imitate, than to pore over any musty manuscripts and transcripts that almost any monk or priest could have written?

In the matter of sacred writings and sacred scriptures, has not the Christian world been greatly led astray, and has it not submitted to a gross system of assurance and imposition? Has not much been passed off as superhuman and as emanating from the divine mind which was solely the work of human minds, and a very ordinary class of minds at that?

MOSES HULL will hold one more meeting in Latham's Hall, on Ninth street, Williamsburg, next Sunday, at 2:30 P.M., and at the Harvard Rooms, Sixth avenue and Forty-second street, at 7:30. Subject in the evening, "Our Financial Troubles—their Cause; What will be their Cure?" Mattie Sawyer will probably furnish improvisations of poems and music for the occasion.

A Request.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Within the next six months there are to be held two very important Liberal gatherings. The first annual convention of the Free Thinker's Association of C. and W. N. Y., and the second annual Congress of the National Liberal League. I am confident that a greatly increased circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER would tend to augment the size and interest of those meetings. I therefore request that you send THE TRUTH SEEKER six months to any one who may subscribe for it during the month of April or May who have never taken it before, for one dollar. And if this request is granted, I urge every one who desires the spread of Liberal ideas and the advancement of the Liberal league movement to go to work in earnest and canvass their respective neighborhoods for six months' trial subscribers. H. L. GREEN.

Cor. Sec. F. A. of C. and W. N. Y. and Chair Ex. Com. N. L. L.

Salamanca, April 18, 1878.

REPLY.—We would be very glad to send THE TRUTH SEEKER broadcast over the land to every one who would read it, without money and without price, were we able to do so, but we are not. We were born poor; we were poor in our childhood and youth, and we are poor still. We do not see how we can publish a paper if those who read it do not send us the amount it costs, or unless some rich philanthropist gives us a good sum of money for the purpose, of which, by the by, there is not the slightest probability. We are now sending out the most reading matter, for the money, of any Liberal publisher in the world. We give nearly a third more for $3 than any others, and ask nothing for postage, while others add the sum of twenty cents a year for that item. We know we are furnishing our paper as low as we can possibly do so, unless our number of patrons is largely increased. But we will, nevertheless, yield to Brother Green's request to this extent: To all who order the paper within April and May, and who have not taken it before, we will send it THREE MONTHS FOR FIFTY CENTS. We do this with the hope that a large number may be induced to become readers of these pages for the fourth of a year at least. If they then approve of the work we are doing, we doubt not they will be willing to pay the regular price, twenty-five cents per month. We are often painfully impressed with the indifference and apathy of Liberals and Freethinkers in sustaining their own periodicals. There is probably not one in ten of them that think it any portion of their duty to patronize a Liberal paper. Could there be a more general disposition among unbelievers to help sustain the journals that are struggling to oppose the ruling creeds and the errors of the times Liberal papers would have a much wider circulation, and far greater good would be accomplished. Yes, we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER to new subscribers three months for fifty cents. How many will make an effort that one thousand or more new names may be sent us on this basis?

A Liberal Spirit.

D. M. BENNETT. Dear Sir: My former article was not addressed to you from a sense of intolerance; indeed, I should rather advocate the broadest liberality than the best-disguised intolerance of even the most absurd belief. Reason, like truth, will prevail. Those who, with you, believe in a future life, in intelligences other than human surrounding them, in having tête-à-têtes with dear departed and late lamented ones, are certainly at liberty to do so. I, for my part, believe with Mr. Winwood Reade: Man dies, but mankind is immortal. And, as we are all liable to changes, even the most ardent believers in occult manifestations may yet become convinced that it is nobler to spend a life without expecting to be rewarded for it than to do good merely because of the double compound interest. I do not say fraud, and, though not agreeing with you entirely, I find your paper and your services too valuable for the cause of Freethought to say, "Stop it!"

Liberally yours, LOUIS LANGE.

Memphis, Tenn., April 8, 1878.

REMARKS.—We thank brother Lange for the spirit of tolerance and liberalism that he manifests. There really is not so much difference between us as to make contention or unfriendliness worth while. We can respect him and fraternize with him and all unbelievers in a continued existence just as much as though their views conformed exactly to our own. If a person is in favor of mental freedom and human progress, we will freely accord to him the right to form his own conclusions upon every possible subject. None of us are really the architects or arbiters of what we believe. We simply take the proofs as they are presented to us, and we are compelled to accept the conclusion we arrive at. It is not a matter of choice. The human mind is so constituted, and our organizations are so dissimilar, that differences of opinion will always exist. Men will never all think alike on all subjects. The proofs that will satisfy one class of minds will be wholly inadequate to convince another class. The best thing we can do is to co-operate on such grounds as we can agree upon, and yield to each the right to diverge from the prescribed or beaten track when his best judgment thus impels him.

Our friend is quite right as to the nobleness of spending a life in doing good without hope of reward; and we think we can say in truth that that is the motive which actuates ourselves. We are trying to do what good we can to our fellow-mortals, and we do not expect to be paid for it, either with a crown of pearls or by living in a city with golden streets. The consciousness of doing our duty is a sufficient incentive to prompt us to make the exertions we do make. We are anxious, also, to win the approval of all liberal-minded persons, whether they believe in a continued life or not. We again thank our friend for his fraternal, liberal sentiments.

Another one Disappointed.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am not surprised to see the letters you published from Louis Lange and S. Sturm. Being a recent subscriber to your paper, I was simple enough to suppose it was what its name implies, a truth seeker, and not a marvel-hunter after "intelligences not dependent on visible organizations." I am sorry to say that I am disappointed, for I regard one superstition as much the same as another. I have examined the spiritualistic philosophy ever since the Fox family commenced their rappings and toe-snappings, and to me it is no less absurd than the ghost fooleries and witch romances of old. I do not say "stop my paper'" although it is not what I expected. You may continue your hunt until the day of your death, and if you can find anything in it that you can demonstrate to your readers, you will do more than has been accomplished thus far. But you have already received proofs that to you are satisfactory. If that be so, you are a fortunate man, and easily satisfied. Why should you be favored in this way more than others? Why should the spirits be so exclusive as to manifest themselves to such as make merchandise of their favors? Natural law is impartial, uniform, and universal. Thus far the spirits have done no good, that I am aware of, and have not exhibited that intelligence and decorum that we might naturally expect, or that characterized some of them while in the flesh.

You "are inclined to think this life is a rudimentary phase of existence, and that the ultimate will follow and be of longer continuance" You do not know this to be so, but are inclined to accept it, and to adopt a theory in keeping with it. Had you not better wait until you know this, before building your theory? A theory founded on an inclination, without knowledge, is of little value, and not what we look for in a truth seeker. In seeking the truth in any direction or on any subject, our first duty to ourselves is to banish our inclinations, and rely entirely on facts as we may find them, let them lead where they may, and be content with ignorance when knowledge is unattainable. What we do know to a positive certainty, that we may cling to, but mere fancies, about which no two are agreed, might as well be discarded. Our fidelity to truth imposes upon us the stern duty of purging our minds of all the rubbish which has come down from the old theologies.

If the Spiritualists will only read and calmly consider the fourth lecture of Prof. Lawrence in his "Comparative Anatomy, or The Natural History of man," they will see that the whole system is as "baseless as the fabric of a vision." Before reading that lecture, just fifty years ago, I was inclined to believe in mind or spirit independent of brain function, but from that day to this I have had no doubts on the subject. Now, Mr. Bennett, if you will only publish that fourth lecture—I cannot send you the book as I have loaned it to some Christian who is not disposed to return it—I will regard you as a brave friend to free discussion even when your most cherished inclinations are assailed. Publish that, and I will be satisfied to continue with you to the end. Refute it if you can, but be sure to do it to your own satisfaction, before you put the cap-stone to your theory. I think Lawrence's book was in your catalogue of books at one time, and if you have not a copy, I hope you will have no difficulty in obtaining one.

I perceive Jennie Butler Brown is giving "a materialistic view of Spiritualism," which is only an ingenious attempt to make something out of nothing. All we know of spirit or life as exhibited in vegetables or animals is only another word for motion, and is motion an entity, or something that exists independent of the thing that moves? From the peculiar motions of vegetables we have growth and decay, from the structure of nerve and musle we have force, from the glands we have various secretions, from the action of the stomach we have digestion, and from the workings of the brain we have thought, intelligence, and there is no more mystery or need for an entity that can act independent of material organs in one case than another. As well might she call gravitation an entity. Her spirit is decidedly corporeal. Does she not need a more ethereal entity inside of number one to set it in motion? and will not number two require a more sublimated entity to vivify its delicate organism? and so on and on beyond the reach of human imagination? S. STEBBINS.

Unionville, Chester Co., Pa.

REMARKS.—We have no doubt of the good sense and sincerity of Mr. Stebbins. If we do not equal him in the first quality, we think we do in the second. We have given some thought and attention to the subject considered by him, and we believe we are honest in the decision we have arrived at. Still we may be wrong. He and others, from one hundred to fifteen hundred miles away, may be better able to judge of the nature of the phenomena witnessed by us than we are ourselves, and those who have never witnessed anything of the kind may see exactly where we were deceived. But despite their opinions to the contrary, we feel sure that among what we have seen of the phenomena alluded to, much was not the result of fraud. We are as firmly convinced of this as we can be of anything. Those who have not witnessed the same may be better able to judge of it than ourselves, but we cannot see why they should be. They are doubtless very astute and know a great deal, but they cannot easily know so much but what others may know a little. We find all grades of opinions. We meet many eminent persons who stoutly deny the possibility of the existence of intelligences invisible to the eye or that we can live after death. We meet many others equally intelligent, who are certain they have received positive proofs that their departed friends still live, and that they have held communication with them. That both classes are honest we cannot doubt.

In many respects Mr. Stebbins and ourselves agree. As to the laws of animal life, and the process for the production of mind, we probably do not differ. We have looked over Dr. Lawrence's lecture he alludes to, and see nothing in it to disagree with. In fact, long before reading it we had arrived, practically, at the same conclusion. We, however, go somewhat further in our theory and accord to the universe powers and possibilities beyond what Dr. Lawrence does. We look to science and investigation to determine which is right. If we can make room for the lecture of Dr. Lawrence, we will cheerfully publish it. We certainly are not afraid to do so.

In publishing a paper as we do, for all classes of independent thinkers, and when we undisguisedly give utterance to our own settled convictions, we cannot expect to suit everybody. We look for criticism on the right and on the left. In fact, it is sometimes a little amusing to compare the criticisms made upon us. One man writes, "Stop my paper! You are too much of a Materialist to suit me." In a few days, perhaps, another letter will come, saying in the most indignant manner: "Don't send me your paper any longer. You are too much of a Spiritualist for me. I don't want any Spiritualism in mine." So we have to "catch it" on every hand." We wish our belief could be acceptable to all our readers. We would be glad to think exactly to order. But if we cannot succeed in thinking to please everybody, we will, at least, try to please ourselves and believe according to the best evidence we can procure. Perhaps if we occupy the medium ground between the two extremes, we are not wide of the truth. Truth is said to lie between extremes. We ask no one to accept our views unless they have grounds to do so. If we cannot all think alike, we can certainly cultivate a spirit of toleration and charity. If we cannot have a perfect unity of thought, we can at least have freedom in diversity.—[ED. T. S.]

The Great Battle for Free Thought, Free Press, and Free Mails.

We earnestly call the attention of every one of our readers to this appeal from one of the most devoted workers in the vineyard of Freethought. The representations he makes are strictly reliable, and the appeal he urges should not be disregarded. We hope that every one will respond in proportion to his ability. The needs are urgent, and should enlist the aid of every individual who signed the petition alluded to, and of thousands besides.

To the Sixty Thousand Petitioners, and All Others Interested in this Movement:

It is a very grave mistake to suppose that a law supported by the prejudices of a very large proportion of the people can be amended or repealed by the simple request of one or two hundred thousand petitioners. The procurement of signatures is hard work; the presentment of petitions to Congress is the "beginning of the end" to be accomplished; but all this is the very smallest part of the work. To get four hundred representatives and senators to read or listen to our arguments and examine our facts requires time, patience, labor, and vigilance, for each member has to be "labored with" personally.

This alone would employ ten active persons. We have the laborers, but no means of paying expenses. The prejudices of a large number of these men to overcome—this, with the indifference of many and the assumed dignity of others, makes a serious obstacle. The influence of certain pulpiteers, the "religious" press, and Comstock we have also to counteract; for the modern American Torquemada is on the ground, armed and equipped, backed by his hosts, his ill-gotten gains, and his hopes.

Our arguments should be printed and pressed upon every member of Congress, especially that of Col. R. G. Ingersoll, to be delivered before the Senate Committee, and that of J. B. Wolff, Esq., already delivered before the House Committee. We have the brains and eloquence here to meet anything the other side can possibly produce; but so far the whole work has fallen almost exclusively upon two persons here and two in New York city, who have to toil for their daily bread; and so it has been a "labor of love." Ten cents from each of the petitioners would be a small matter, and would enable us to do a big work. $250 will not pay nor reimburse those who have so far borne the burden. This is hardly fair, just, or generous.

The argument of Mr. Wolff was enthusiastically received by the House Committee, and should be circulated extensively as an educator among all classes of thinkers. He covers the whole ground, masses all the facts, and presents a state of affairs which will surprise even Liberals. How far ecclesiasticism has innovated and invaded the Constitution and laws is not known even to the religious public, and such a contest as ours is necessary to bring the whole subject to the front, where it may be seen.

It took us six weeks to get a single hearing. As yet we have not been able to get a hearing before the Senate Committee. We must dance attendance from day to day, whether there is a quorum or not. Unless the work is vigorously pushed, what has been done will be lost, and we shall have to do it over again. We have a number of persons here able and willing to work with us, but we cannot ask nor expect them to spend their time without at least paying their board bills. The two here who have stood at the helm will continue to work as best they can. We shall put the best arguments in print, and trust to our "providence," to come to our rescue and relief. If we fail now, Comstockism in less than a year will be more odious, insolent, and persecuting than it has ever dared to be. We cannot restore to life his dead victims, nor to hundreds their property and good names this monstrous Inquisition has destroyed; but it shall not be our fault if the Liberals of this country deem it the part of wisdom to supinely suffer these infamies to continue.

Any funds furnished will be faithfully applied and reported. No time should be lost. Societies and individuals should lend a helping hand. We are not working for any particular branch of the grand army of progress, but for the whole army of progressive humanity. Address

"The Council Fire."

This is the only paper published which is devoted entirely to Indians and matters connected with Indian affairs, and the first paper we ever saw which could boast of a staff of Indian contributors; it is therefore a genuine novelty. It is exceedingly interesting as well as instructive, for it is full of Indian history, legend, romance, tradition, etc., as well as able arguments in favor of justice to the red man It is really a "council fire," where white and red men mee and talk and compare notes. As a guarantee of its ability it is only necessary to say that it is edited by Hon. A. B. Meacham, formerly Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and widely known in connection with the Modoc war as th survivor of the Canby massacre. The paper is a handsome sixteen-page monthly, and costs only $1.00 a year. It is published at Washington city, having recently gone there from Philadelphia. Any subscriptions sent to this office will be promptly forwarded. We like the Council Fire, and wish it great success.

Mrs. Tilton's Confession.

One of the most exciting topics that has engaged the attention of the public within the last few days is the confession that Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton has been constrained to make, and which has been published in nearly all the papers of the country. The same was addressed to Mr. Ira B. Wheeler, a lawyer of Elizabeth New Jersey, cousin of Mrs. Tilton and her legal and confidential adviser. It reads as follows:

Mr. Ira B. Wheeler.

MY DEAR SIR: A few weeks since, after long months of mental anguish, I told, as you know, a few friends, whom I had bitterly deceived, that the charge brought by my husband of adultery between myself and the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher was true, and that the lie I had lived so well the last four years had become intolerable to me.

That statement I now solemnly reaffirm, and leave the truth with God, to whom also I commit myself, my children, and all who must suffer.

I know full well the explanations that will be sought by many for this acknowledgment; a desire to return to my husband, insanity, malice, everything save the true and only one—my quickened conscience, and the sense of what is due to the cause of truth and justice. During all the complications of these years you have been my confidential friend, and therefore I address this letter to you, authorizing and requesting you to secure its publication.

ELIZABETH R. TILTON.

Brooklyn, April 13, 1878.

This remarkable letter has called out a great variety of opinions and comments. Thousands believe that it confirms beyond a doubt the guilt of the Plymouth pastor, and see in it the only rational explanation of the conduct, admissions, and letters of Mr. Beecher himself. Others, again, claim to see in the letter the handiwork of Mr. Tilton, and that Mrs. Tilton was partially actuated by pique or a spirit of revenge because Mr. Beecher and his friends had become derelict in the matter of furnishing funds for her needs. Her mother, Mrs. Morse, is also credited with having much to do with the issuing of this regular thunderbolt. It is well known that Mrs. Tilton four years ago made an affidavit, sworn to before Judge McCue, of a directly opposite character, in which she called upon the Almighty to witness her oath that Henry Ward Beecher and herself had never been guilty of the act of adultery together, and from this fact the friends of Beecher insist that her word is not to be taken, that the other statement was true and this false. Mr. Beecher was telegraphed to in Waverly, N.Y., whither he had gone to deliver a lecture, and he immediately replied by telegraph that Mrs. Tilton's last statement is false, and that he is perfectly innocent of the crime of adultery. After all the denials he has made upon the subject for the last four years, after sitting in the witness chair for thirteen days and swearing repeatedly and persistently that he was innocent, it cannot be thought at all strange that he should reiterate the same denial.

The Sun of this city upon the morning of the publication of Mrs. Tilton's letter contained the following in its editorial columns:

MRS. TILTON'S CONFESSION.—We publish in to-day's Sun a brief but complete confession of Elizabeth Tilton of her guilt with Henry Ward Beecher.

This confession fully justifies the wisdom of Beecher's counsel in the scandal trial in taking care not to allow Mrs. Tilton to testify in court. At that time there is no doubt that she would have commenced her evidence by denying the whole story of guilt; but she must have broken down in the cross-examination and confessed the truth before she got through.

The statement she now makes is undoubtedly true. It agrees with all the evidence in the case, and furnishes the only satisfactory explanation of the otherwise marvelous and mysterious expressions of Beecher's letters. As a matter of positive testimony, its value is, of course, diminished by the fact that Mrs. Tilton has before contradicted herself respecting this subject; but no intelligent person can examine the whole case without coming to the conclusion that the facts are so.

Henry Ward Beecher is an adulterer, perjurer, and fraud; and his great genius and his Christian pretences only make his sin the more horrible and revolting.

For ourselves we must confess that we entertain very similar views. While we regard Mr. Beecher as a grand man in some of his characteristics, and one who has done much good, we have fully believed that he has been false to truth in this whole business. His greatest offense did not consist in any act committed with Mrs. Tilton, but in the persistent deception and lying he has practiced. Could he have had the nobility to acknowledge the truth in the beginning, he would stand far better before the world to-day. Doubtless he has seen the folly, as others have, of having liaisons, little intimacies, and love makings, with a woman who cannot keep a quiet tongue.

LINDSAY, ONT., April 12, 1878.

MY DEAR SIR: Will you please add my mite to the commendation of Mr. Bell's pamphlet on the Resurrection of Jesus. It is deserving of a most careful perusal. It contains powerful arguments to prove that the extraordinary narrative of the Resurrection of Christ is one of the grand myths of the religion he is said to have established.

BICKERINGS.—THE NARROW PATH.

Falls in with Papista.—Conversation with Papista. Simon and Papista fight.

1. And Simon rejoiced exceedingly, and accounted himself one of the saints, and was elate and lifted up, and skipped about like the colt of an ass.

2. And he composed himself a song, and sang melodiously, yea, like a raven did he sing, and poured out his soul in praise like an owl; and this is his song:

3. Praise ye our king, ye coral rooks; sing joyful hymns, ye wanton brooks; take up the song, ye tuneful swine; for now a kingdom shall be mine.

4. Praise ye our king, ye trembling trees; ye rocks go down upon your knees; come bellow praises all ye kine; for now a kingdom shall be mine.

5. Praise ye our king, ye verdant shrubs; and sing for joy, ye crawling grubs; prolong the hymn, each prickly vine; for now a kingdom shall be mine.

6. Praise ye our king, ye planets bright; and shout, thou moon, when out at night; ye stars come sing as well as shine; for now a kingdom shall be mine.

7. And when Simon had made an end of singing, and the listening angels had gone back to their duties, and nature had somewhat composed herself, he began to look about him and to converse with the other pilgrims.

8. For there were many pilgrims come into the city about this time.

9. And Simon fell in with one whose name was Papista. And Simon fell out with him also, yea, verily, they fell upon each other; and this was the occasion:

10. On the first day of the week Papista said unto Simon, Come with me into our temple; so Simon, nothing loth, went with him.

11. And in the temple was a lamb enthroned, and the people worshiped the lamb, and besought it to be their guide and helper, and sang innumerable hosannas to it, and magnified it, and extolled it, and called it their god.

12. But presently they seized upon it, and tore it to pieces, and divided it up, and may I die in a ditch if they devoured it not!

13. As I live, and am a lover of truth, they tore their god to pieces, and chewed him, and drank his blood; and may I die in two ditches if they let so much as a morsel of him escape.

14. And Simon was amazed, and had need.

15. And it came to pass that as Simon departed from the city, Papista went along with him; and Simon said unto him, Art thou not my brother, and are we not each alike bound for the glorious city? Come then, and we will hold sweet converse together and beguile away the time in brotherly discourse.

16. And Papista answered and said, with all my heart, brother; so they kissed each other.

17. And they departed out of the city of Conversion on their way to the House of Relics. And the way they went by was a filthy gutter called the Narrowway.

18. And Simon and Papista kissed each other, and shook each other by the hand.

19. And Simon said unto Papista, pray thee, brother, what meant ye, yesterday, in eating your god? Verily, brother, ye amazed me.

20. And Papista looked very hard at Simon, and said, What meanest thou, my brother, knowest thou not that if thou eatest not thy god thou hast no part in him?

21. And Simon answered and said, Nay, brother, I know not that, but pray thee tell me since thou hast eaten thy god, doth he remain god?

22. And Papista said, Verily, brother, I have eaten of the flesh, and drank of the blood of the lamb, and he liveth forever. Surely thou hast been but an ill listener to our holy guides.

23. And there was a deep voice as from one outside the gutter, and it said, Papista, thou art somewhat wolfish. And presently there came up the man whose name was Blunt. And the man, Blunt, looking towards Papista, said, Verily, friend, thou art well equipped for thy journey, seeing thou hast got thy god in thy belly; but prithee tell me, since thou hast eaten him, wilt thou also digest him?

24. And Papista answered and said, Be thou Anathema Maranatha; thou art one of the scoffers, and I am forbid to have speech with thee.

25. And Simon said unto Papista, Verily, my heart misgiveth me; by what gate enteredst thou?

26. And Papista said, Of a surety I came in by the only true gate, by the gate called Katholikos, and besides that, there is no other.

27. And Simon started back and said, What, then art thou one of the children of the Crimson Harlot, drunken with the blood of the saints.

28. Harlot! cried the other; harlot, saidst thou? As my soul liveth, thou shalt not escape punishment for that! and he smote Simon, so that he fell down.

29. And the deep voice, even the voice of the man Blunt, cried, If a man smite thee on one cheek, turn to him the other also.

30. But Simon heard not the voice, but leaped up, and faced the other, even Papista, and glared at him, even as a tigress bereft of her whelps glareth.

31. And the deep voice cried, Freely ye have received; freely give.

32. And Simon hearkened unto the deep voice upon this occasion, and he fell upon Papista like a whirlwind, and they pounded each other zealously, and rolled over into the mire of the gutter, and there they wallowed, and belabored, and bethumped, and bethwacked, and bemired, and bedeviled each other, with immeasurable good will.

33. And the deep voice cried, saying, Behold how these men love each other.

34. And there was a noise of fierce contention and terrifying strife, and an inconceivable splashing; and the beasts of the fields fled away to the everlasting forests; and the trees were forsaken of their strength, and bent down to the ground moaning pitifully; and the grass withered away; and the rocks burrowed into the ground like moles; and the waters of the rivers ran up the hills, and took refuge on the mountain tops, and froze with horror; and the moon hid herself in the dark caverns of the earth; and the stars came down like hail; and the lamps of the sun went out; and the heavens shriveled up; and the earth vomited up all that she had ever swallowed; and nature had a fit; and the gutter got drunken with the blood of battling saints.

35. And Simon was not dead but buried; yea he was buried in the mud and slime of the gutter, very deep was he buried, even to the depth of a furlong; and he was in great straits.

36. For Papista had thrust him down into the mud, and trampled upon him, and leaped upon him, and battered him piteously.

37. And Papista went his way singing triumphantly.

38. And when, after much searching, Simon found himself, he moaned in bitterness of spirit, and began to grope his way up out of the mud.

39. And after many days, and much toil, and hard labor, he emerged from the mud and the slime, and was plentifully bedaubed therewith. And when he saw not Papista, he began to glorify himself, and without doubt had great cause for it.

40. Saying, Ha, ha, he hath fled; he dared not stay: I would have torn him to pieces, and have scattered him to the winds of heaven.

41. And Simon was comforted and went on his way.

The Worst Thing you can Find in Hell.

FRIEND BENNETT: In a weekly paper published in 1859, called The Herald of Truth, and "devoted to the publication of sermons by the clergy of all the evangelical denominations," I find one by the prominent Rev. Mr. Spurgeon (Baptist) of London, England. He closes with the following delightful morsel:

"If there be one thing in hell worse than another, it will be seeing the saints in heaven. Oh, to think of seeing my mother in heaven, while I am cast out! Oh, sinner, only think to see thy brother in heaven—he who was rocked in the self-same cradle, and played beneath the same roof-tree—yet thou art cast out. And, husband, there is thy wife in heaven, and thou art among the damned! And seest thou, father! thy child is before the throne, and thou, accursed of God and accursed of man, art in hell! Oh, the hell of hells will be to see our friends in heaven and ourselves lost! I beseech you, my hearers, by the death of Christ, by his agony and bloody sweat, by his cross and passion, by all that is holy, by all that is sacred in Heaven and earth, by all that is solemn in time or eternity, by all that is horrible in hell, or glorious in heaven, by that awful thought, 'forever,' I beseech you to lay these things to heart, and remember that if you are damned, it will be unbelief that damns you. If you are lost, it will be because you believed not in Christ; and if you perish, this shall be the bitterest drop of gall—that you did not trust in the Saviour."

It seems Mr. Spurgeon thinks, or did at the time, that it is unbelief that damns us. If he and the Scriptures should teach us that it is the shape of our nose, or the color of our eyes, that will damn us, would there be any sense in believing it? He might just as well damn us for one as the other. If the worst thing in hell is for a son to see his mother in heaven, then the worst thing in heaven would naturally be for a mother to see her son in hell.

Very truly yours, JAY CHAAPEL.

The Financial Problem.

MR. EDITOR: Noticing an article with this caption by Mr. J. Petty, I would like to give my reasons for dissenting from nearly or quite every position he takes in the article. I would have the money of the country based upon the property of the individual, government only to regulate the issuing thereof, guaranteeing the public against over issue in proportion to property. Then no matter how often government is changed, the money is still good. Money based upon government makes mammon instead of justice the mainspring to stability of governments, I believe in individual sovereignty. What right have we to expect to bequeath to our children forever a certain government. I believe in just as little government as possible, consistent with the rights and liberties of all. The only business of government is to give protection of life, property, and liberty, to the citizen. Government cannot do business as economically as the individual.

In attending to business for government, self-interest is so remotely interested in economy that the government generally suffers in waste or fraud. In private enterprise self-interest will do the work at the least cost, and competition furnish to the public goods at a minimum price. If government sells at cost, it is but taxing the few for the sake of the many. And it is unjust, unless collected per capita. So I oppose government going into the railroad business.

As for usury on money, it is as legitimate as the profits of the merchant; and the law of supply and demand, in foods and money, should govern as in every other trade. It cannot be effectually prohibited or regulated. It takes two to make a contract, and if those two are satisfied everybody else should be.

Although it is an unpopular position, I must protest against public schools. Government has no business going into the school business. They are more costly and less satisfactory than private schools. Besides, taxing all for the benefit of those who have children is unjust. Instead of free schools, let us have a free soil, free trade. Secular government, free government, impartial laws, just laws, cheap government, free money, perfect protection of life, liberty, and property. Then, let every tub stand on its own bottom. Then labor being more evenly distributed, the laboring man can spare his children from the field and workshops to go to school. O. JONES.

Mr. Macdonald and One of his Critics.

Mr. Macdonald's very able article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 5th must have cut close and touched some open sores, or why do so many critics appear on the field, and each try so hard to break down his arguments? I read that article with no small degree of interest, and pronounced it very good, nor have I altered my opinion since. I do not agree with the able writer in some of his views, but thank him for so forcibly presenting his honest convictions, let them cut where they will.

When he says, "The prosperity of the nation lies in the prosperity of the individual," he states an undeniable fact, and one which I think no one will try to deny. Next he shows up our "learned political economists" in their true light, for they are nearly all frauds seeking fat offices, and Mr. Chapman can make but poor defense of them. I do not believe in granting public lands to railroads, but I do believe in giving them to actual settlers. I am a "land reformer" if that constitutes one. I do not believe in the "ten-acre cabbage-patch theory," as I should judge our friend Chapman does.

Many of our young men are extravagant, spending their hard-earned money for liquor, cigars, tobacco, etc. While some treat and spend their cash at the bar, others gamble—laboring men, many of them. Can they afford it? In this way they keep themselves so poor that they cannot raise money to cultivate land when it is given them for five years' residence, or under the "Forest tree law." Then they whine and become extreme "labor reformers," and are ready to quit work because the poor farmer cannot give them higher wages, when if they did but know it, that poor farmer has toiled from daylight until darkness, the whole year, for less than they have received, working early and late, with all the care and anxiety of the farm on his hands, to make both ends meet and pay his interest. Farmers, as a rule, in this section, at least, are not intemperate or extravagant, but have to practice the most rigid economy to live. As my neighbor "Central New Yorker" says, they bought their farms when gold was very high, and now with gold so low those that are in debt can but barely keep up, and many are being sold out. With low prices for all their produce, interest is the same, and wages are nearly the same as in better times.

Mr. Chapman criticises Macdonald for saying, "The rich man has learned to take care of himself and the poor man must learn the same lesson." The poor men are a very large majority of the voting population of this country. Why can they not take care of themselves? Does Mr. Chapman expect the rich man to take care of us? If he does, he will be disappointed. Can he possibly think that we have not brains enough to take care of ourselves, but must call in our rich neighbor (I do not know who else it can be) to be our guardian and protector?

Again, "Until our legislative bodies become honest the poor man must help himself." Now, really, Mr. Chapman, would you have us believe that the poor man can help himself in a monarchial government, any more than in this form of republic where he has a full right of suffrage, or would you have us believe that the "gamblers" and "thieves" predominate to such an extent as to "manipulate" the government and "wring from the poor man his subsistance." Are gamblers and thieves, then, the rich men, or what relation do they sustain to the rich?

Now, Mr. Chapman, be candid: Would it not be better for the working men of this country not to raise so many children? for we well know that a laboring man cannot support a family of from seven to ten, and clothe them decently at present wages, to say nothing about educating them. The rich have learned this lesson, why not the poor also? But few of the rich men of the present age have a family of over one to three children, but still they have money to support more and do not. Why should the poor man who has not the means? I say from ignorance.

Mr. Chapman, can you see no difference between necessity and luxury? Now be honest, Has a man a moral right to deprive his family of bread to purchase "rum and tobacco"? Are rum and tobacco luxuries anyway, for, as Mr. Macdonald truly says, they "not only take his money but his manhood." The poor man has no business to get drunk, nor the rich one either, as to that matter. But the poor man has the same privilege of paying his fine, but he does not have the money. Then I say he cannot afford it. If it is a great luxury in your estimation to get drunk, then the rich man has the advantage, otherwise neither can really afford it, which makes them equal.

My ideas about over-population are materially different from Mr. Macdonald's. I believe that the ignorant emigrants—the men who do not understand our laws and customs, the stock from which rioters and "tramps," are made—are the over population rather than the children of American birth. I think you do not understand Mr. Macdonald as well as J. B. does, or you would not have said, "For the stigma of the working people will follow him and his name will sink into disgraceful oblivion."

From a Chippewa Indian.

D. M. BENNETT: Me learn to read and write, and me read TRUTH SEEKER little, and like it much; and like your big letters that say old Jew book not much tell the truth. Big preacher say Bible tell much truth for Great Good Spirit write it, but me no believe him. Preacher buy me musk-rat and mink skin, and pay me much tobacco, heap whiskey, and little money. He tell me to no read TRUTH SEEKER, for bad white man write that paper, and devil help him. Indian have no devil so bad as the preacher that sell Indian much firewater. Me think Indian much good when white man let him alone, and white man much good when he let big old fool-book be.

TRUTH SEEKER say much big fool Comstock try to take your scalp for writing letters, and say Bible tell too many big things for Good Spirit to say. Indian think white man much fool for believing such talk. The squaw papoose say snake no talk to white squaw, and tell her to eat big good apples, and Good Spirit no get mad and go on war path. When squaw eat apples, Indian squaw eat heap apples, and no Good Spirit drive her out of garden. Comstock think Good Spirit go mad for squaw eat him big apples.

Indian Good Spirit no get sorry that he make Indian. No send big rain and drown him, and cover top of the big hill and pine trees. Indian don't think Good Spirit get much mad, and put Jonah in big fish's belly three days, and Jonah no die. He no like books to talk mean thing about Good Spirit. Indian not believe that Samson much strong in hair, or catch so many foxes, or that three Hebrew white men go into fire and not get himself cooked much dead. He not think that Good Spirit like to smell ox burn. He think Him like better to smell Comstock cook. He think it better. He think Good Spirit not like Solomon to have seven hundred good squaws, and three hundred bad squaws, and heap papoose. Maybe Comstock like some them squaws. He no think Lot's squaw turn to pillar of salt. Only fool white man think squaw go to make much salt. Indian Good Spirit no get papoose when he go to see little white Jew squaw, and no let bad white Jew nepo him only good boy, and then say boy, much father, big son, and heap big ghost. Indian no believe such thing—too much like snake talk to squaw. Comstock believe that? Then him heap big fool. The squaw no fool like that. Him say one Good Spirit; Big Book and much preacher say three Big Spirit in one Big Spirit, and one Big Spirit in three Big Spirit. Preacher, and all who think not much, believe much, and know not much, think them things. He no think bad man go to hell when him die. The fire burn hell, devil, and white man, and devil's wagon all heap up. Indian Good Spirit no burn Indian. May burn Comstock—me don't know.

Indian no believe John eat much firewater, and then go sleep, and see much big beast come up out of the sea, and have much heads, and ten horns, and eyes in head, and head where tail ought to be. He no see him, and me no believe him. He think John drink heap whiskey when him see them kind of beasts.

Bad preacher swap Indian too much fire-water. Indian drink heap fire-water, then see John's heap-headed beast, and heap snakes, but snakes no talk, him head no good to talk. Him head like Comstock's—brain no good—bad like some squaw brain, believe many big fool things.

Me must stop. Me wish me have heap money. Me like to send some to good white brother, but money not much plenty.

Don't smoke pipe of peace with him much fool Comstock, and me like you heap.

Advice to Writers.

The Observer gives the following good advice to writers:

"Omit the beginning of your essay. Most writers, not accustomed to the press, imagine that a newspaper article, like an oration, should have an exordium, an argument, and conclusion. Not at all. The argument is all that is wanted. That is, state your case, say your say, and stop. Do not take time and space to get into the subject, and more to get out of it; but come to it instantly, and stop when you are done.

"Be short. The time is short, the world is very fast now, and readers of newspapers do not want long articles. Pack your thoughts into short words, sentences, and short essays. If you never do a great thing, never do a long thing.

"Come to the point. If you have no point, lay down the pen, and do something else, rather than write for edification, and you may not be one who can.

"Write the article two or three times over carefully, making it shorter each time. Write on one side only of the paper. Write legibly. Keep a copy of what you send to the press. Editors do not return manuscripts. We cannot undertake to, and we so state every week, but are every week asked to. It is impossible to make the reasons plain to writers; but it is out of the question.

"Be very modest in your estimate of your own productions, and do not fret if others esteem them even less than you do."

Letters from Friends.

DALLAS, TEXAS, March 25, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I send you this correspondence, that you may know there has been a mighty outpouring of the spirit of Freethought in our city during the past week. We have been favored with a course of ten lectures by an able Liberal and Spiritualist lecturer. I refer to Capt. H. H. Brown, who is the most liberal Spiritualist I have ever heard talk. In his lecture on "Evolution, and its Lessons of Immortality and Individuality," he seems to accept all our scientific or materialistic theories, and for the doctrine of Spiritualism he seems to go beyond our realm, and accounts for spirit individuality by, what he terms, the law of chrysalisation, which is altogether a new idea to me, and I must say that whether his theory is true or untrue, it certainly is beautiful, and, to my mind, comes nearer answering all objections to Spiritualism than anything I have yet heard or read. Certainly no Liberal man or woman can find anything obnoxious in the belief in an immortal existence "beyond this vale of tears," and I for one, although at present a stern Materialist, still hold myself open to conviction, and will only be too glad to accept Spiritualism as a science whenever I have satisfied myself as to the proof. But I started out to say that under the auspices of our lecturer, we have founded the first Liberal society ever organized in this place. The name of our society is "The Dallas Truth Seekers," and our principal objects are, to unite the Liberal element, establish a library, and build a hall of science; all of which, at this time, seem formidable undertakings, but we hope by the help of God (reason) to overcome every obstacle and establish our library, and build our hall, although it may take a year or two to accomplish the task. We are few in number yet, but we trust we have got the right kind of material, and that we will draw to our standard those of a like nature. Please do what you can for us in the way of literature for our library. I will write again when we receive the report of our Committee on Finance. Yours fraternally,

M. A. COLLINS,
Cor. Sec. Dallas Truth Seekers.

JOLIET, ILL., March 26, 1878.

GOOD BROTHER: It was at first a matter of surprise to me as to the manner of Seth Wilbur Payne's obtaining the address of both Mr. M. and myself. At three different times have we received circulars from the office of Payne's Age of Reason, and the last time a paper was sent with the circulars. Our name is one that every one cannot spell correctly, unless they are familiar with it. But from the fact that your numbers were the same, I concluded it was all right, but when the paper came we sent it back home, feeling that that was the best place for it. Quite frequently we are made the recipients of circulars, pamphlets, and papers, and have not the least idea of where our address had been obtained. Now good brother, as every person has his way of treating just such persons as S. W. P., I have mine, and it is the Irishman's way with the skunk: "Lave him alone and he will stink himself to death." And may the success that ever attends the faithful laborer for truth be yours. Very respectfully, MARY L. MILLSPAUGH.

KIPTON, OHIO, April 2, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: An honest man is the grandest work of evolution!

How long will the tripod of the Age of Reason man, Payne, bear him up? What is his capital, or who are his backers? One would suppose he would soon exhaust a small fortune sending waste paper gratis to your subscribers, and, thus exhausted, go to join the host of savings bank defaulters where the woodbine twineth not—the place of common falsifiers and swindlers that Swedenborg describes as inhabited by owls and bats. I have received three lots sent by him, and I guess he's tired of it and has quit. He could have got my address in no other convenient way than through your office. I thought at first, like others, that I would encourage him with my subscription and influence. But oh! and oh! What can the poor fool think about to undertake to trifle with a class of those close discriminators whose sole resources are integrity without guile. From his own mental demoralization, he must hold the term Infidelity in its lowest term as vagabondism. If he had to flee from a blackmailing enterprise at Duluth, how could he hope to succeed with falsehood and "damphool" craft of the shallowest kind practiced upon the keenest investigators after real genuine unalloyed truth that the world affords? With the hope that he will soon get out and learn to do better, I will say good-bye to him, and turn my attention to our own TRUTH SEEKER, and to its editor. Thousands will thank you sir, for your honest report of what you witnessed at Mrs. Maud Lord's Spiritual seance, although I still think her a professional. Your "Interrogatories to Jehovah" are always good. Your selections, astronomical, are well timed and very acceptable. All that Mrs. Slenker writes about the "Darwins," and everything else is admirable. Prof. Haeckel's articles are intricate, scientific, and excellent. The "Will of Meslier," is searching and beneficial. The "Chronicles of Simon Christianus" are tip top! and to sum up in brief, the paper is brim full of good things every issue. Knick-knacks and great live coals from off the altar of truth, all spiced and made readable by pens that lead on and on to the end of each paper. Fraternally, DR. ANDREWS.

POLK PATCH, IND., March 25, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In your issue of March 9 you stated that your mail list had been stolen, and ask all persons who had received circulars, etc., from persons who had no means of obtaining their address save from your mail list to inform you of the fact. David Whittinghill, one of my neighbors, and a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, authorizes me to say that he has received several copies of Payne's Age of Reason, and that he is certain that he could have got his name only through your office, as his name has not been in public print anywhere; he has not even written a letter to any one East for years. I am afraid that man Seth Wilbur Payne is a sorry chap. I subscribed for his paper for three months, and also obtained for him one other subscriber; but I soon smelt a large-sized mouse, and ordered him to strike my name from his list. He continues to send the paper, although the time for which I subscribed has expired. It would not surprise me if some one is called upon to chronicle the demise of that delectable sheet at the close of Vol. I.

I am well pleased with the enlarged TRUTH SEEKER. "The Darwins" promises to be a pleasing story. Old Lucifer is a jolly, good-natured sort of an individual, and appears to be willing to tell all about the creation of the universe; which is far more than his Brother Jah has ever done for us. Frothingham's sermons are worth ten cents each—amounting, in the run of the year, to more than the price of the paper. Who would not take THE TRUTH SEEKER? Fraternally thine, T. A. CAPEHART.

P. S.—I will try to send you some money from your delinquent subscribers here by the first of May; also renew my own. T. A. C.

LOGANSPORT, IND.

FRIEND BENNETT: The last issue of your paper is tip top, and I am getting to like it better every number I receive. I am thankful that a number of your TRUTH SEEKER fell into my hands last winter when I was a church member, for it converted me to a higher standard of thought, and I am going to work for it all or a part of my spare time. J. C. BEATTY.

SPRINGFIELD, MO., March 23, 1878.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: The debate here between Elder W. R. Cunningham, Christian, and Professor W. F. Jamieson, Liberal, has just closed. The subjects for discussion were: First, "Is Spiritualism the work of the Devil?" Cunningham affirmed, Jamieson denied. Second, "Is the Bible of human origin?" Jamiesom affirmed and Cunningham denied.

Each defended his position quite ably, considering the entire lack of positive proof favoring Cunningham's position.

The dissension elicited much interest with the thinkers, and those of the Church who rebelled against the prohibitory edicts which went forth from its authorities, and were in attendance.

The disputants also manifested gentlemanly courtesy towards each other, save in a few instances when the elder became a little unduly excited, exhibiting some of the characteristics of his God, causing him afterward to feel the necessity of publicly apologizing for his "earnestness of speech, as it was his style of preaching."

His efforts to prove there is or ever was a personal devil, much less that he was the author of Spiritualism, was futile, as was also his attempt under the second proposition to show the Bible to be of super-human origin.

Professor Jamieson's remarks were clear and logical and directly to the point, and in his exposition of the Bible's defects, he showed its author to be more fiendish even than his Satanic Majesty. The almost innumerable mistakes and interpolations contained therein forced the elder to make the statement that "the Bible we now have, i. e., King James' translation, is not the Bible, but that Queen Victoria is now having it revised, and when completed we will have a correct rendering of the original word."

Professor Jamieson asked to know how much of it would then be God's word, and how much man's, or, rather, would it not all be man's?

The professor was unwilling to accept the statement that King James' version was not the Bible. It was the subject of this debate. The clergy endorsed and so represented it to the world, and if it was not the Bible then they were simply deceiving the people, while in fact it is all the claim the Christian world has for a "Revealed Word."

A condensed report of the debate was given through our city daily, whose editor, being a Christian, gave it in Cunningham's favor, while the repeated applause and expression from the large audiences in Jamieson's favor was almost unanimous.

Professor Jamieson has made many warm friends here, both in and out of the Church. His worth as a scientist and exponent of Liberal thought is incalculable.

The disputants went from here to Joplin, in this State, where they are at present engaged in the debate to large houses, after which they are to meet in Carthage, Mo., and resume the subjects.

I think the way is now prepared for the introduction here of a few of your "Open letters to Jesus Christ," which please send me for that purpose. Fraternally yours,

J. S. LYON, M. D.

VICTORIA, B.C., Feb. 23, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Thanks for sending me the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" and tracts. I did not think of it at the time I wrote, or I would have asked if you have all the tracts bound in book form. If you have, please send them any time, and I will advance the price when I renew my subscription for your paper. I am so pleased with them that I would like to have them all. Inclosed you will find $2.00—price of book, tracts, and the balance of subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I admire your paper's liberal sentiments, and I am glad to think that such a channel is open for the diffusion of useful knowledge through the land. I wish you every success, hoping that the sunshine of prosperity may fall upon you until the last moment of your earthly pilgrimage is over, and that you may live to a good old age before crossing that well-known river—life's weary bound. The world cannot well spare such as you at the present time. I wish there were thousands more like you in the world, who would have the boldness and manliness to declare their inward convictions concerning that hideous monster called Religion and Priestcraft, which mars the progress of man, and keeps him in darkness and ignorance, a slave to superstition and vice, closing all the avenues of the mind against knowledge; keeping this earth, which is calling aloud for man everywhere to acquire knowledge, and demand their right, and take possession of the land, and by art and science beautify it and make it blossom like the rose—wrench it from those robbers and usurpers of man's rights that go by the name of Church and State, who play into each other's hands and keep the very class that supports them in absolute slavery from the oradle to the grave, without their knowing it. I look upon the clergy as the only devil that man has to guard against—casting their accursed and baneful influence over men's minds by bringing them up in a belief so absurd and gross and devilish; causing so much discord and inharmony in the world; each viewing the others as fit subjects for eternal punishment in a shoreless ocean of fire and brimstone, such as no one but a fiend could conceive of.

But with all this, it is gratifying to see that the dawn of a better day is approaching; that the night of ignorance, darkness, and superstition is passing away; and that the people's advent is coming. Your paper merits a wide circulation. I will do my best to find as many subscribers as I can. O. B. Frothingham's Liberal sermons and the discussions alone are worth more than the money.

Yours respectfully, ARCH. TURNER.

PENTWATER, MICH., April 7, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I admire the unflinching course you have taken to expose the dogmas of old theology in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Of course I can't indorse all I read, but believe the world will be better for your living in it. I do not wish to bring you down to my belief, for I am a full-blooded Spiritualist. No, indeed, brother Bennett; go on, do your duty, and stand fearless, and proclaim the truth as you see it; and if all the demons (Comstocks) of the lower regions assail you, fear not, for truth is immortal, and will live. Inclosed find one dollar more for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Fraternally yours,

A. TINKLEPAUGH.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., April 1, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I have intended writing a few lines to you before this, but business has deterred me; but now I have something that will elate Liberals, so I cannot refrain from writing. We had our city election to-day, and one of our liberal-minded men, and a subscriber to your paper, was elected mayor, by the largest majority ever given to any man in our city; and he does not fly under false colors, for every one that knows him knows his religious opinions. We carried him through regardless of his political opinions.

I have received two copies of that paper, or that fraud, the Age of Reason, and was so disgusted with it that I burned it without reading all the dirty scandal and lies he was trying to heap on you—one that has done so much for the cause as you have. His paper will never be patronized in this locality if it is in my power to prevent it.

Yours for truth and liberty, JOHN G. HATELE.

"IN-TOWN SUBSCRIBERS are hereby notified that the Banner of Light for next week (on account of Fast-Day coming on Thursday, 11th) will be delivered on Wednesday morning, April 10th. Our bookstore will not be open on Thursday."—Banner of Light.

Is it not ominous that a Spiritual paper should close its doors in veneration of a pagan fast? As long as such acts are performed by leading Spiritualists, the Church need not be alarmed, for the weak and superficial ones will soon return to her bosom again. A class of Spiritualists have already adopted the name of "Christian Spiritualists," to make their return from the wash to wallowing in the mire less conspicuous. * * *

COLLEGE HILL, OHIO.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: If I were not an unbeliever in the especial interposition of God's Providence in answering our prayers, by sending us the thing most prayed for, I should be inclined to attribute my late marvelous good fortune in receiving a copy of the excellent TRUTH SEEKER to his great condescension and willingness to oblige us poor, sinful mortals. But, as I have never seen cause to thank his Supreme Majesty for any streak of good luck that has fallen in my way, I very naturally incline to the belief that some good, kind, fellow-mortal is now most deserving my gratitude for so great a favor. I am the more overjoyed that the paper has come direct from the publisher, which indicates that other copies may follow. Whoever my good Samaritan may be has my sincere thanks for so kind a favor, for I am truly among strangers as concerns my religious belief, and famishing for sympathy and congenial fellowship with those who can understand and respect my belief. THE TRUTH SEEKER should be termed the truth sower as well. And it seems almost humiliating to scatter such pearls of truth among the bigoted swine of superstition. It has seldom been my good fortune to meet one who has advanced into realms of independent thought, or to read any of its literature, and I am surprised, on reading over your list of books to find that so many persons have had the temerity to publish their opinions to the world and become—in the eyes of the many—reprobates therefor. MRS. P. FARMER.

WILMINGTON, DEL., April 5, 1878.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: I do hope you will continue to express your thoughts through THE TRUTH SEEKER, though all the narrow-minded subscribers may say, "Stop my paper!" If your subscribers were to ask you to permit them to express so much of truth as seemed clear to them in contradistinction to your thought, and they should find you bigoted and narrow-minded, then they would have cause to complain.

It is unaccountable to me how a man claiming to be a Liberal, and subscribing for THE TRUTH SEEKER, can be so void of reason as to refuse to seek truth in all directions. Then let us have truth on finance, truth on Atheism, truth on capital and labor, truth on Spiritualism; and those who can not bear the light of truth, let them get their eyes anointed. S. MARSHALL.

EUREKA, WIS., March 8, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: As the "bloody shirt" is folded up and laid away, and can never again be made a political issue, it is now evident that the next struggle will be over the financial question. And now the first thing to be settled is, what shall be the basis of the Government's credit, and what shall the currency consist of? In my humble opinion, the Government's credit should not be based on gold and silver, neither should it be coined into money as a circulating medium of exchange. What is the use of money? It is never wanted for its own sake. It is only wanted for its purchasing power as a medium of exchange. And for this purpose paper is better than coin.

If I give you a note, you do not require any intrinsic value in the paper on which the note is written. Neither do you care to know that I possess anything in the shape of money. All you want to know is that I am the owner of sufficient property that is convertible into currency, so that you can get your pay without being obliged to take my property for your pay. Therefore, property and not money is the basis of my credit. So with the Government. It has a lien, so to speak, on all the property of the country, and this is a much firmer basis of credit than gold and silver alone. When gold and silver is used as a basis of credit, or coined into money, it is just so much real property taken from its legitimate use—mechanical and ornamental purposes mostly—lying idle, in no way benefiting the people or the Government. But when the Government's credit is based on the property of the country, and its currency is in paper, the property is not lying idle, but is in constant use, supplying all the people's wants, and at the same time adding to the wealth of the nation. E. B. R.

DON'T STOP MY PAPER.

VALLEYFIELD, CANADA, April 10, 1878.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT; I read your reply to J. Newell in your issue of March 16th, and now I see you are being taken to task for giving your honest opinion. I have no confidence in the theory of Spiritualism, but at the same time I have no objections to your attending seances in your spare hours, and then giving your readers your candid opinion on the subject, as well as Comstockism or any other ism. Let us keep our anchor on deck, and spread every inch of canvas to the breeze, for who knoweth the name of the port we sailed from, or the port we are bound for. Spiritualism is liberal; and being so, should warrant it a corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER, when you have got anything to say about it, whether in favor of it or against it. If it is true it will flourish, if it is a fraud it won't live long these days. But keep on giving orthodoxy hell, for there is nothing righfully belonging to that system that deserves a decent funeral. But now I would like to ask you a question from your reply to J Newell. I shall pass over the extinguishing of the lights (still I don't like that part of the performance), guitar and music-box playing, various sizes of lights at various altitudes, the taking of handkerchiefs, keys, knives, etc.; last of all you say that, in close proximity to yourself, the name John Bennett (your father's) was distinctly spoken, and what appeared like a man's hand slapped yours vigorously; an arm, or what appeared like an arm, was placed around your neck, and you were firmly embraced. Now the question I am going to ask you is this: If you didn't, why did you not grasp hold of that arm that embraced you, and hang right on to it, and take it and everything else that would come along with it, home with you and have it thoroughly examined? I wish I were in New York City where they are so plentiful. I never heard of any being around here, so you see I have no chance to bird's-lime half a dozen of them, but I will be on hand at once should one come round this way some dark night. Yours in the Liberal cause, ARTHUR A. FORBES.

REPLY.—We will inform our friend that the rule at Mrs. Lord's seances is for every person to grasp with his left hand the right wrist of his neighbor, leaving the hand itself free. We tried to catch the hands or fingers that seemed to be toying with ours or touching them, but they eluded our grasp to the extent that we could not catch them. They did not feel quite natural, but more soft, velvety, and elastic. When what appeared like an arm was felt around our neck, it came so suddenly that we did not think of trying to catch it, besides our hands were occupied in the way we have described. The lights varied in size from near the size of a person's face, down to a mere speck. The larger lights were more dim than the smaller ones.—[ED.]

THE FREETHINKER'S CONVENTION.

The Freethinkers Association of central and western New York, organized at the Wolcott meeting last year, will hold its first annual convention at the village of Watkins, N. Y., on the 22nd, 23d, 24th and 25th days of August next. Watkins lies at the head of Seneca Lake, and adjacent to Watkin's Glen, of national reputation as a popular summer resort. This glen presents rugged and picturesque natural scenery, not surpassed in grandeur and beauty on this continent. Watkins is centrally located in the State, and as it is proposed at this meeting to extend the bounds of the association over the whole State, it will be desirable that the Liberals of the whole State attend.

And, in fact, it will be a national convention, as the Freethinkers of all the States and of the Province of Canada are to be invited, and it is proposed to make it the largest and most important Freethought gathering ever held in this or any other country.

Liberals as a general thing are poor, and therefore the time and place of the meeting is thus early announced to give every one who may desire to attend an opportunity to make the necessary arrangements for that purpose. Most Liberals can afford to take one short vacation from business and a pleasure trip during the Summer season, and they should take that vacation and trip to attend this meeting. Arrangements will be made with railroads and hotels for reduced fare. The best Liberal speakers of this country representing the various schools of Liberal thought will be engaged. All the Liberal editors will be invited and requested to put on exhibition and for sale their publications, and everything will be done to make this a meeting that shall advance humanity and better the world. We earnestly invite every Freethinker to do all in his or her power to make the meeting a grand success.

SANDY P. O., OREGON, March 29, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: According to your request, I notify you that the Age of Reason with pamphlets are sent to my address. I know not how S. W. Payne could have got my address but through the way indicated in your article. I do not desire it after I know how S. W. Payne falsified you. Yours truly, G. WILDPRET.

SALEM, COLUMBIAN CO., OHIO, April 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have felt for weeks that I was helping embarass you by withholding my subscription, but really, money matters are so close with me that I could not, as I thought, spare it sooner, and even now I can send it only by the closest scraping. I have many leaks to supply that keeps me watching the corners closely. But, by the hole in my old shirt, THE TRUTH SEEKER has got to live, perish what may! I cannot for a moment think of doing without it. I, too, like most of your subscribers received circulars from S. W. Payne. I was at a loss to know how he obtained my address, but when you announced the disappearance of your mail list, the mist began clearing away, and it is now evident to me that he has had access to it in some way. He is but the scum of Liberalism, and judging by the commotion in the cauldron, will soon slop over and disappear. Enclosed find P. O. order for three dollars which will pay my subscription until Jan. 1, 1879.

Fraternally yours, D. H. HISE.

FALSE CAPE, CAL., March 31, 1878.

MUCH ESTEEMED FRIEND: I saw in your paper of the 9th an article asking for information. I have received several copies of the Age of Reason, with circulars enclosed, addressed to your subscribers at my office, and to none but your subscribers. I supposed you had kindly furnished Mr. Payne with your list of names. One of the papers was sent to Joseph Enoch, one to Dr. O. B. Payne, and one to Charlton & Bragdon. Joseph Enoch says that S. W. P. had better keep his paper, and if he has any more than he can use he may divide with his friend Comstock. I got Payne one subscriber, but I will not be guilty of the like again.

I tell you, friend Bennett, we are proud of our leader. No man has ever accomplished the amount of good to his fellow-man in so short a time as you have done. We regard you as a rock that cannot be battered down. Let Payne, Comstock, and all the Christians club together and hurl their venom at you, they cannot shake you nor the structure you are building up.

I would rejoice to see Robert G. Ingersoll elected President of the United States, and you rewarded for your labor. I want to see scientific and Freethought books in all our schools. A. SWEET, Postmaster.

BURR OAK, MICH., April 7, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I sent for a copy of the Age of Reason, and almost the first thing I saw was a charge derogatory to what you represent, or what I believe to be your financial condition. If this man Payne entertains Liberal principles he certainly must have some object in view, and that I believe a very selfish one, or he never would have tried to have divided the Liberal minds, which he has done to a greater or less extent, for he must know that a house divided against itself cannot stand. A man that will defend such a character as this man Comstock must be ignorant of the principle that a Liberal man should entertain in defense of a character who has laid snares and set traps through his confederates and tools to prevent honest men and women from following their legitimate business; and any man that will vindicate such a character as Comstock's has no Liberal principles whatever. I believe in principle, and not advocating one principle and publishing another. I am a Liberal, and have entertained that principle ever since I came to years of understanding, although I stood alone for some time. There are quite a number of free-thinking minds that are shaking off the shackles of bigotry and superstition, and are willing to think for themselves, and not be carried through this world through fear by some dogmatical creed. We are trying to increase our number of Liberal minds and think we have got the ball rolling by circulating your publications. Yours respectfully,

E. E. CAMPANY.

ABBEVILLE CO., S. C., March 22, 1878.

BROTHER D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just finished reading your discussion with the Rev. Mr. Humphrey, and congratulate you for having conquered. It is not only in your favor, but of all human beings.

I am an old man, born in North Carolina, in the last century, but have been living in this State about seventy-five years. Mr. Humphrey has shown about the same want of sense that an old neighbor of mine did, who, about sixty years ago, cleared a piece of ground and had a log-rolling. After the neighbors had met, they found the task too great for them to do for that day, so the old farmer sent his son, a young man, to summon a few more neighbors to come and help. In the meantime, whilst rolling a log over, the old man turned over a rattlesnake, and in the scuffle at killing it, the snake touched the old man's leg, but did not bite him, but the old man thought it did; so he began to groan most bitterly, he put on his vest which he had hung on a bush, and found it did not reach around his body by six inches. He started for home with all his company; got home and went to bed, sent for a doctor six miles off, tried his vest on again, he was wonderfully swelled, it would not meet by seven inches (poor old man). In the mean time, the son returned to the field and not finding the company, concluded they had gone to dinner, so he put on the vest he had hung on a bush and went home in a hurry; he ran into the room not knowing that his father had been snake bitten, saying, "Father, you have on my vest! look here!" running one hand up his breast under the vest.

The old man looked at his son and jumped out of the bed exclaiming, "Lord! what a fool I am!" The old lady had made two new homespun vests for the father and son to wear at log rolling. Now, if Mr. Humphrey will only say, "Lord! what a fool I am!" I will think more of him than I now do. You are right about the Jews being an ignorant people. They did not know the use of letters until after they returned from the Babylonian captivity. They then borrowed their alphabet from the Phœnicians, as did the Greeks. They are all hieroglyphics. The Hebrews call their letters by the same old names, but have altered their figures in some instances. Very few persons know why the letter i is dotted. The letter i in Hebrew is yod, and means a nail. Instead of a dot there was formerly a small ring over it, to denote a hole made by a carpenter with a gimlet. The letter m mem, means a wave or billow of the ocean. The lower part of our State, and no doubt of all the Southern States, was once covered by the ocean, as the round water-worn rocks show; but when I see a hill fifty or one hundred feet high with round rocks of all sizes, from the small pebble to a foot in diameter, I conclude that that hill was raised by an upheaval caused by an earthquake. There is a good joke going on, of old Father Noah building his ark at Wilmington, (and why not? where can you get better timber and where can you get more tar than in my native town?) and as the Cape Fear river was not deep enough for the big boat to navigate when loaded, he took it around to Charleston harbor, where the passengers could come down the Ashly, Stone, and Edisto rivers; and so they did, but as Father Noah could only take in a certain number, the rest remained and were drowned, as Mr. Humphrey could prove, by the millions and millions of tons of phosphate bones to be seen there.

I have been reading "L'Allemagne," of Madame de Staël, and have translated a small piece from page twelve for the benefit of Mr. Humphrey. "The opinions that differ from the prevailing belief, no matter what they are, are always considered as scandalous by the vulgar. Study and examination only can cause that liberality of judgment, without which it is impossible to acquire new lights or to preserve those we possess, for we submit to certain received ideas, 'not as truths' but as from authority." It is thus that human reason gets habituated to servitude, even in the field of literature and of philosophy.

A few weeks ago I was reading "The Cassique of Kiawah," by William Gilmore Simms, and remember this piece. "Soon as I found that Joe Sylvester had got religion and had turned preacher, I regilarly attended service p'rticlarly if I knowed he was gwine to preach, for when a man's a rogue, or I thinks him so, to find him out, I just wants to see the whites of his eyes, and to hear how he brings out his sentiments. Ef he's slow, I knows he's calkilating and a rogue; for a new convert in his old age, is bound to be fast if he's honest, and he won't think of rolling up the whites of his eyes, when all the time he's thinking of searching you to the very soul through your daylights." My principal reason in writing you this letter, is, to not mention anything about Southern slavery in any future discussion. The slaves are now all free, and if it was left to the Southern people to restore them to slavery, ninety-five out of one hundred would vote against it. You can form no idea how the South was wronged; the slaves were treated so well that they increased rapidly. They were well clothed, well fed, and well attended to in sickness. It is quite different now. They are half starved, not attended to in sickness, and are dying out very rapidly. I do not expect to live to see the census of 1880, but you will find no increase in the number of the blacks in the United States. The mortality in Charleston, in 1877, was, whites 555, colored 125 ; population, whites 21,000, colored 26,000. The average deaths in ten Southern cities, counting Washington and Baltimore, was as two colored to one white. Slavery lasted from the time the first twenty Africans were brought to Jamestown, Virginia, in a Dutch vessel, until they were made free, about 250 years; it was wrong ever to have made slaves of them, but it was forced on the South by the North. It is all over now; like the Indians, in 250 years more, there will not one be left.

Southern men are thinkers. Very few believe in a burning hell and a devil, and thousands are rejoiced that Deacon Farrar has knocked the bottom out of hell. I am afraid of tiring you out, as I am but an illiterate mechanic and will conclude by wishing you health, prosperity, and happiness.

C. NORTH.

The Power of Saving Faith.

A SHORT SERMON BY REV. THEOLOGICUS, D.D. DELIVERED BEFORE THE HIGHCOCKALORUM MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION OF DIVINITY PLACE, NEW JERUSALEM, ON THEIR SECOND QUARTERLY MEETING OCCASION, MAR, 17, 1878.

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow [or, as in the original, accompany] them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover" (Mark xvi, 16-18).

My brethren, it is gratifying to know that my former discourse, upon self-righteousness vs. sin, was sufficiently appreciated by your honorable body to induce you, through your committee, to invite me to address you upon this, your second coming together. As is my custom, I shall handle the subject without gloves, and try, by the help of God, through his holy word, to give an honest exposition of the sacred text, and so fortify my position by other portions of divine inspiration as to make it impregnable.

Let us notice first the sublime declaration of the Savior, namely, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

This, my, brethren, is so pointed that it seems almost superfluous to add a word of explanation. Some there have been in all the past of the Church that have tried to explain it away or in some way to break its force; but they have only served to wrest it, as they have other portions of the Scriptures, to their own destruction; and some of the present, among whom are the translators of the new and coming version, who, not being able to get around it, over it, or under it, are pronouncing it an interpolation. To all such I would say, "They are taking from the words of this book, and God shall take away their part out of the book of life and out of the holy city."

My brethren, I warn you in time, don't touch this new translation. For is not "the partaker as bad as the thief"? Has not God, through a living ministry, of which we of this association form no mean part, declared this holy Bible infallible in its every word and line? And can one improve upon infallibility? Can you add to or take from an infallible document without making it fallible? Come, my brethren, place your hands upon your hearts, and tell me—Can an almighty, all-wise, and infallible God make for his creature, man, a fallible book? Or can an omnipresent and almighty being, "who is too wise to err, and too just to do wrong," let errors creep into it? Hark! listen! and as you catch the word, echo and reecho it "this spacious earth around," that, if this holy Bible is in the least jot or tittle erroneous, then it is not God's word, and we, his ministers, are deceivers of the people, "and, being crafty, have caught them with guile."

"Let God be true but every man a liar," say I; and I contend that in this word God said just what he meant and meant just what he said. Of course, we, his ministers, may enlarge upon it, by way of explanation, without adding thereto; but we can't detract from it without taking therefrom. For instance, we can make hell hotter, but we mustn't throw cold water on it. We can make heaven brighter, but we must not deprive the angels of their wings. We can make the way to heaven very straight, narrow, and contracted, but if we undertake to broaden the way, we will all land in hell together.

Then, my brethren, heed well the declaration, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Don't preach that works can save, for works at most are only a proof of saving faith in the heart. Don't preach that morality can be a passport to heaven. Is not "hell paved with good intentions"? And who has done this paving unless it is the moralist? No; preach that "by faith are ye saved through grace, and that not of yourselves, for it is the gift of God."

Secondly: Let us inquire what constitutes true, evangelical, saving faith. Faith is always a gift, and is of two kinds, namely, of the heart and of the head. The former is the gift of God; the latter, the gift of Satan. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness;" with the head man believeth unto the damnation of his soul! Of the former "Jesus is the author and finisher." And when he has it finished, he goes out in search of a suitable subject to whom he may give it. The subject must be one with a heart of stone, hard, obdurate, and flinty. Sinner, if you have not that kind of a heart, you need not apply, none other can stand the melting test of saving faith. This heart God either changes by the application of this faith, or "he takes away the stony heart and gives a heart of flesh" in the place thereof; either is correct; you can believe whichever you choose.

In this new heart, God, or Christ, takes up his abode and directs affairs. Blessed is the man that is thus renewed. He can believe everything that God, through his Word and holy priesthood, tells him, without a doubt or trouble of a thought. If God tells him that there was a man with this faith in his heart who stretched a rod over the sea, and a roadway was opened through its proud waves, that God's chosen might pass over dryshod, he doesn't doubt it in the least; for how can he doubt, with pure, finished faith in his heart, and he a "new creature," a "babe in Christ Jesus"? (One of the mysteries of Godliness.) If God, through his Word, tells him that a man with this faith in his heart stopped the sun and moon in their course, he doesn't question it. If God tells him that men with this faith walked in the midst of a fiery furnace, it seems the easiest thing in the world to him. If he reads in the Bible that a disobedient prophet, with this faith in his heart, spent three days and three nights in the depths of the sea, safely housed in a whale's belly, after which, acting as an emetic on the whale's stomach, he was safely landed on shore, he doesn't doubt it in the least; for has he not discarded thought, and taken in its place trust? If one of these "new creatures" is told that a holy ghost overshadowed a Jewish maiden, and God was begotten, born into the world, "grew in stature and in wisdom," became a carpenter and afterward a preacher, and stormed the citadel of Jewish theology, and got hung for it, he sees naught but beauty and sublimity in it; it seems so natural to him that his only wonder is that he didn't know it without being told. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whomsoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life." He never asks the absurd question how God can be his own son, or the Son can be his own father, or how a god, a ghost, and a son can all be one; his only wonder is how it could be any other way. Isn't he a babe in Christ—and fed on the sincere milk of the Word! And doesn't he take the milk in its purity, without straining!

Hands off, ye sinners! Touch not this suckling! He shall rest in the bosom of the Church, die in peace, go to Abraham's bosom, see the rich and those of the other faith in hell begging for water, and then enter through the gate into the city, and have a palm-leaf fan! Amen! So mote it be! So much for a right faith with God in the heart.

Now, my brethren, we must take a glance at the other faith.

Satan, with his faith, does not enter the heart, but the brain, of man; and when he is fairly enthroned, he sets up a "devil of a thinking." He makes one ask more questions in a minute than this ministerial association could answer in a day. Tell that man that there is a God, and he asks, Where is he? Tell him he lives in the sky, and he searches the vast expanse with his telescope to find him—and finds naught but suns, planets, and systems of worlds. In his searching he finds that this great flat earth, whose foundations and corner-stones were laid by God himself at its creation, is comparatively a small ball in space, which with its sister planets is revolving upon its own axis and around its central sun. He learns the properties of a triangle, and, taking the two extremes of the earth's orbit as his base, he measures the distances to the mighty suns and worlds that revolve in space. He finds the universe everywhere, but God nowhere. He finds all things governed by fixed, eternal, unchangeable laws; but of a mysterious overruling Providence he knows nothing. He believes in the powers of man, but has no faith in gods. If he wishes to travel towards the sky, he has no faith that, by asking, God will send a chariot and horses of fire to convey him thither; but he searches out a gas of great elasticity and lighter than air, confines it in a huge bag, hitches it to his car, and travels heavenward by his own omnipotence. If he wishes to explore the depths of the sea, he does not ask God for a whale to convey him thither, but manufactures a sea armor, and goes exploring on his own hook. If a mountain is in his way, he does not ask for a grain of heavenly faith of the dimensions of a mustard-seed, that he may thereby "remove it to yonder place;" but he goes at it with steam drill, gunpowder, dynamite, and nitro-glycerine, and tunnels a road through it.

And thus it is, in his blindness, he travels towards hell all his days. Poor fool? "He hath said in his heart, There is no God," and all because he has the devil in his head. This is the kind of man, my brethren, that has "paved hell with good intentions." Poor soul! "He is a goner, you bet!" "He is taken captive by the devil at his will," and "where there is weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth," you will find him at last, with soothing-sirups in his pockets and bread in his basket. "Ephraim is joined to his idols. Let him alone."

This brings us to the last and most important part of my text, namely, the evidence and power of our faith. "And these signs shall accompany them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." I have emphasized the word "shall" because it is the most positive word in the English language; and when wielded by omnipotence there is no escaping the conclusion. It is not probably, or perhaps, or possibly, or try to, or do it if you can, or you will have the power, to cast out devils, take up serpents, speak with new tongues, and recover the sick; but it is shall do it. Are you listening, my brethren? If you have the faith, you shall do these things; and if you don't do them, you haven't got the faith, and shall most surely be damned. It leaves you no option, no choice in the matter. It is useless for you to wince, for I am not going to mince this matter, but "declare the whole council of God, whether men will hear or forbear." When God says shall, there is heaven or hell to pay, you may be sure. In all these nine "shalls" there is but one qualified; the little if comes in but just once. The blessed Savior despised a hypocrite, and he was determined the world should have the evidence that our faith was the true blue. He was determined that we should have no chance to profess it without possessing it. He says the believers shall cast out devils, they shall speak with new tongues, they shall take up serpents, they shall lay their hands on the sick, and the sick shall recover. And if you do these things, you have got the faith, and shall be saved; and if you do not do these things, you have not got the faith, and shall be damned.

I said there was one "shall" qualified, to wit: "If they drink any deadly thing." It doesn't say you shall drink a deadly thing; but the blessed Savior expected that some fool of the other faith might ask for more evidence, after he had seen the before-mentioned signs done, and Jesus left it optional with you whether you would let the poor fool go in his blindness, or tell him to bring four ounces of prussic acid, and then drink it in his presence, as a further evidence. And Jesus says positively if you do, it shall not hurt you. But, brethren, you must have the faith, or it will land you in hell in five minutes. Neither is there any use in trying to get away from the force of this text by saying that the age of miracles is past, and that signs were to cease. Who told you so? and where did you get it? No use in quoting Paul, 1 Cor. xiii, 8, to get yourselves out of the difficulty, for it will only sink you deeper in the mud.

Let us examine it and see "whether there be prophecies, they shall fail." What has the failing of prophecies to do with casting out devils? Let them fail; it don't lessen your duties. "Whether there be tongues, they shall cease." What has that to do with new speaking tongues? When does a tongue cease till it lies cold and silent in death?

But listen again to the inspired and prophetic apostle: "Whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away;" and, my brethren, it did. It did vanish away in all the Christian world for a thousand or more long, dismal years. But what has that to do with laying hands on the sick or picking up serpents or drinking prussic acid? Nothing; absolutely nothing. To claim that it is, is only cunning, hypocrisy, and the cropping out of a damning faith, such as devils have when they "believe and tremble." Is not God the same yesterday, to-day, and forever? And is not his faith the same? Think you that he has diluted it till it has become worthless? Nay, verily the Church has lost the faith, and "counted it an unholy thing." Jesus on earth was our pattern in all things. While here he said, "The things that I do shall ye do also, and greater things than these shall ye do, because I go to the father." At his word devils got up and howled, and hied themselves away, and sickness vanished at his touch. He walked upon the water, raised the dead, burst the bars of the tomb, and went up through the air without a balloon. If you have the faith, "all these things shall ye do, and greater." Ah, what can be greater? Why, moving a mountain with faith as a grain of mustard-seed. "Ah, he didn't mean mountains," says a poor, sniveling, hypocritical priest, "but great difficulties." Away! ye blind leaders of the blind. There is no use in trying to make this mountain anything but a mountain. Go to the seventeenth chapter of Matthew. In the beginning of this chapter it says Jesus took Peter, James, and John, and went up into a high mountain, and was transfigured before them. And when they had come down from the mountain, Jesus found the other disciples with the multitude, trying to cast out a dumb devil, and they couldn't do it, as they lacked faith. And Jesus said, "O faithless and perverse generation! how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him hither to me." Jesus cast the devil out in short metre, and then said to his disciples: "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall say to this mountain"—What mountain? Why, the high mountain that he had just come down from—"Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you." It was not Jesus' intention that his followers should do anything but pray. Should they want bread, ask for it, and the ravens would bring it; or they could say a blessing over a crust, and it would become a cart-load, steaming hot, right from the oven, and buttered on both sides. Should they want clothing, ask for it; for "if he clothe the grass of the field shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" (Only requires a little faith.) If you want to go to yonder place, ask for it, and the Lord will carry you through the air, as he did Philip. If the sea is in your way, ask, and there shall be a road made through it, and you shall go through dry shod. Oh, my brethren, how have we become degenerated! L-O-R-D, increase our faith, or we will all be damned.

If you have not cast out devils; if you have not got new tongues; if you have not taken up serpents, and if you have not by the interposition of hands recovered the sick, then you are none of Christ's; you can have no part or lot with him. Do you ask if I have the faith? Well, my brethren, I will be honest with you. I think I could make a devil get up and git; but they are scarce in my place, and I have never come across one. I hope the Lord will pardon my want of opportunity. I tried my hand on a devilish bad man, once, and got worsted. But I am of the impression that it was the man, and not the devil, that overcame me. I think I have a new tongue; anyhow, it don't talk like it used to; wouldn't swap it for a newer. I have laid hands on the sick and they didn't die; I guess that fills the bill. I have taken up lots of small snakes, and would have taken up a serpent, but the showman wouldn't give his consent. I hope the Lord will pardon this opportunity. But, brethren, excuse me, if you please, from taking prussic acid, for I—I fear—I shall be damned if I take it.

The Hope of Immortality.

BY S. P. PUTNAM.

I have not pierced beyond the tomb,
And caught the secrets there;
I cannot see a shining world,
And blessed angels fair;
The oracles of Nature still
To farthest star are dumb;
Its flashing wonders give no voice
Of any life to come.

We know death only as a sleep;
What may be is untold;
From its wide blankness not a beam
Hath o'er our pathway rolled.
We know this life; we know no more;
Beside the falling sod
Our vision fails; it sees no soul
Upspringing to its God.

Yet, when we press the silent lips,
And shroud the form so dear,
We do it with a wondrous hope,
And not in pain and fear;
We lay the body in the dust,
Yet still our love proclaims
That what in love is beautiful,
In deathless glory flames.

Our heart is greater than our sight,
Our reason than our sense;
For thought is first, and thought is last,
Its own bright evidence.
It makes the world where science toils;
And shall that world still bound
The height and breadth of its vast fire
Whose secret is not found?

From realms of thought our life aspires,
The glowing deeps within;
And all the amplitude of stars
Shines with a light akin.
The music of the sea but throws
An echo to the mind,
Of what its very nature prompts
That it is unconfined.

Thus knowledge fails; but faith is winged
With hope and love divine;
And force and matter, sweeping on,
Give no destroying sign;
So still affection's wealth of joy
And conscience' fervor bright,
Beyond the grave exultant flow,
Unchecked by its brief night.

The Index.

Burying the Scarecrow.

BY MRS. MARY D. FINCH.

Come, neighbor! there's work to be done to-day—
To fill that sink-hole over the way.
Canon Farrar and Beecher, too,
Are going to help, and why can't you?
We want every one who can lift a hand,
Every Liberal over the land,
To come and bring his strongest team,
And close this mighty underground stream.

Any sort of rubbish will do—
Rubbish of creeds and doctrines blue,
Worn-out dogmas of original sin,
And confessions of faith we'll tumble in,
And every old book of priestly lore,
Full of the mischief that's gone before.
Dash them into the boiling thunder!
Hide them down the black waves under!

Untaxed churches for hundreds of years
Have ruled the world through its craven fears.
Their arches have echoed the pious groan,
While heard afar was the orphan's moan.
From the "amen" seat deacons still mutter,
While men pay taxes and live in the gutter.
Let them shelter the poor their walls within,
Or into this hole we'll "gather them in."

Ages ago 'twas a dangerous spot,
With sulphurous fumes and gases hot.
The bridge that was built on Salvation's plan
Was never quite safe for a sensible man.
While preachers hammered and patched and prayed,
The whole world finally grew afraid.
Paine came to the front with the "Age of Reason,"
And boldly affirmed they'd all be in season.

Professor David Swing, of Chicago,
Declared this sort of thing was no go;
He had stood near the craterous stream
To learn if infants went down, with a scream.
The Presbytery said, "David, what's there?
Do you catch the gleam of our babies' hair?"
And Swing, who was honest, brave, and true,
Said, "Never a gleam—no more can you!"

They had a trial, and drew it so fine
David said, "If you please, I'll resign."
Then they smiled a smile ungodly and bold,
And their "brother in Christ" was left in the cold.
They cut his acquaintance in Christian style,
Saying, "Avaunt, thou heathen! no more beguile!"
This proves what Harriet Beecher said long ago,
That ministers and laymen didn't know,
And never could they quite agree
'Twixt "tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee."

Collyer and Patton, to their shame be it said,
Would roast their children after they're dead;
Not enough for them that woman and man
Should be fried in Satan's frying-pan,
With lovely angels smiling down
To see them so nicely growing brown!
A conglomerate thing religion has grown,
That makes villainous saints with hearts of stone;
But going to heaven does change them so!
Up there they do things different, you know.

Thomas and Stanley, though coming later,
Are throwing cold water into the crater—
Are quenching with Science the horrible fires:
And the old light dies in the costly spires.
But Talmage comes with a barrel of pitch,
And says, "Go slow! we need devils and sich,
A pretty hullabaloo and splutter,
Whereby we'll lose our bread and butter!

"Then no more prayers, with saintly smile
(Settling financial schemes the while).
There'll be no awe for the white cravat,
And never a dime for the passing hat.
No more we'll share the sacred spoil,
But earn our grub by honest toil.
This holy fable we've guarded well—
This mythological, pagan hell!

"Our stock-in-trade has passed away—
Yet many dogs have had their day.
No more are strategic bugbears found;
The tables turn, the wheel goes round;
Our fires are out, our landmarks fall,
While omnipresent is Ingersoll;
And who dares meet the Infidel?
Alas! not one. Farewell! farewell!"

(Exit Talmage, weeping.)

The Taxation of Church Property.

The value of church property in the State of New York, as stated in the National census of 1870, amounted to $66,055,755, and the number of church organizations was 5,625. The State census of 1875 places the value of this property at $117,597,150, and the number of church organizations at 6,320. This shows, supposing each of these censuses to be proximately correct, that the increase of church property in five years was $51,941,395, which is almost double the whole amount in 1870. This certainly appears to be a most remarkable increase, especially when we remember the pressure upon the country during the last two of the five years. We do not by any means suppose that there are too many churches in the State, with the exception of those cases in which one church could just as well serve the purposes of two or three. But we do suppose that there are far too many extravagantly expensive church edifices. Church structures, for all taxable purposes, are absolutely dead capital to the State. The corporations owning them enjoy the protection of law, and the cost is levied upon other property by an increased rate of taxation beyond what would be necessary if these structures, in common with other property, were taxed. Nearly one hundred and twenty millions of dollars are by the law of exemption made perfectly useless to the State for the purposes of taxation. This we regard as alike impolitic and unjust. Exemption in its practical effect is indirect appropriation. It compels taxpayers to contribute toward the support of religious organizations, and this is contrary to the general principles on which our political institutions are based.—Independent,

The Wonders of Electricity.

A MAN WHO PROPOSES TO LIGHT STREETS AND DWELLINGS WITH A WIRE.

About two years ago Mr. J. B. Fuller invented and exhibited an electric machine for telegraphic purposes. It then occurred to him that the same apparatus might, with some changes, be made to produce an electric light, and, after considerable labor, he perfected his invention. It was in operation on a recent evening in the rear of Maltby's oyster depot, at 11 Greenwich avenue. A small steam engine furnishes the motive power for the machine, which is very simple, consisting of an armature revolving between the poles of a powerful electro magnet. A strong current of electricity is thus generated. Two electric wires are attached to the machine, and they convey the electricity to the various burners. Each of these burners consists of two sticks of carbon, separated by a piece of glass, which are attached in an upright position to the wires. The electricity is ignited by the application of an ordinary piece of metal to the burners. The light thus produced is dazzlingly brilliant and very beautiful, so far surpassing the ordinary gaslight that the latter looks yellow and dirty beside it. Any number of lights may be supplied by the same wires, and Mr. Fuller has succeeded in so subdividing the current of electricity that any one of the lights can be extinguished without affecting in the slightest degree the other lights on the same circuit. This had not been accomplished before. Mr. Fuller says he can light buildings in any part of the city by extending his wires to them through the streets. He also says he can light the streets with electricity, and to prove this he has stretched his wires to a post on the sidewalk in front of the building, where he keeps a light burning every evening. This light is far more brilliant than any calcium light, and illuminates the street for a block. One of the lights would illuminate a whole block, and far better, too, than a dozen or more of street lamps. In lighting up a house, porcelain or ground-glass shades are used for softening the glare of the light. The cost of production is very slight, much less than that of the ordinary gas.

The Rev. Charles McCarthy on Mme. Restell and her Persecutor.

Rev. Charles McCarthy preached to a large congregation in the University building, Washington square, on a text taken from the sixth chapter of Romans, twenty-third verse: "The wages of sin is death." The preacher, having expounded this text, went on to say that the word "wages" signified here the daily pay which the Roman soldier received, and the thought thus conveyed was that the sinner received daily the result of his misdeeds. It was a regular, continuous process, and the result was death of some sort.

"Be sure thy sins will find thee out" is true alike, he said, of individuals and nations. "The case of Mme. Restell," said he, "which we have to consider now, and which has been the leading topic of the past week, is an illustration of a great truth, underlying the lives of nations as well as individuals; one which is true of the unfortunate woman whose suicide has been, correctly or otherwise, legally determined; one in whose career there is very much which deserves the strongest censure, and not a little which despite this censure exacts commendation and praise. Few will doubt that she had been in early life a frugal, industrious, and faithful wife and mother. Her husband, who died last year, gave by his last will and testament a convincing testimony of his confidence in her judgment, faithfulness, and prudence. And her own will is an evidence that this confidence was not misplaced. In my opinion, in the matter in which she was entrapped, she was more sinned against than sinning. The fraud and falsehood by which she was made amenable to a law that is universally violated by the medical profession of this city cannot be too strongly condemned. When in the Great Assize the question is asked, By what means was this misguided woman driven in her old age to self-slaughter? and the answer is given, She was hunted down by miserable subterfuge, by cunning and heartless fabrications, by open and mean lying, and by specious arguments which were carefully devised to work upon her better nature, what will the Judge of all the earth say to this pretended suppression of vice and crime by means in themselves the most appropriate to promote vice and crime? This strange tragedy is calculated to call attention not only to the degrading methods by which crime is detected, but also to that condition of social degradation which fosters the crime, while in a few isolated cases it seeks to punish the criminal. The crime for which this unfortunate woman was to be tried is one that is openly avowed and in high social circles advocated as a proper method for evading the duties and anxieties of maternity. I make this statement not only because I know it to be true in a general sense, but also upon intimate personal acquaintance of particular facts, which form a part of my ministerial experience in this city. It is not going too far to say that Mme. Restell was prosecuted for supplying medicines which a large number of medical practitioners provide for their patients, and among them family physicians of reputation and skill. But, alas! my ministerial experience goes still further. I am acquainted with one case in which a Christian minister, now in good standing, actually engaged a doctor for such a purpose, and subsequently defended his conduct on moral grounds before the trustees of his church. I consider this one of the most fatal agencies actively at work, producing race deterioration to-day in America."

The Congregationalist is uneasy about the ministers who preach funeral sermons in which they say that thoroughly worldly men have passed into heaven. But it would be interesting to know exactly what would be the result if the pastor of a fashionable church were to say in his obituary remarks over the remains of the heaviest pew-holder that he was a mean man, who shaved too closely, made bargains too shrewdly, and oppressed the poor too tyrannically, and that, furthermore, if there was a hell he had probably gone to it. Rather does the funeral sermonizer say, "My brethren, while our deceased fellow-laborer's life was not at all times and in all respects up to that standard of perfect holiness and moral rectitude which some of us, I am happy to say, have been enjoying in our own Christian experience, yet we must admit that we all have our faults, and that it becomes us to draw the mantle of charity over those of others. The amiable character of our departed brother, and his constant kindness to the poor, give us ground to hope," etc., etc.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT. Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

Chap. VII. John, the son of Zebedee, never in Asia Minor. John, the Presbyter, substituted. The work of Irenæus and Usebius. John the disciple has served to create an enigma in history. John of Ephesus a myth.

Chap. VIII. The Gnostics. Irenæus makes war on them. His mode of warfare. The Apostolic succession and the object. No church in Rome to the time of Adrian. Peter never in Rome, nor Paul in Britain, Gaul or Spain. Forgeries of Irenæus.

Chap. IX. The claim of Irenæus, that Mark was the interpreter of Peter, and Luke the author of the third Gospel, considered. Luke and Marie both put to death with Paul in Rome.

Chap. X. Acts of the Apostles. Schemes to exalt Peter at the expense of Paul.

Chap. XI. Matthew the author of the only genuine Gospel. Rejected, because it did not contain the first two chapters of the present Greek version.

Chap. XII. The character of Irenæus, and probable time of his birth. His partiality for traditions. The claim of the Gnostics that Christ did not suffer, the origin of the fourth Gospel, Irenæus the writer.

Chap. XIII. Why Irenæus wrote the fourth Gospel in the name of John. He shows that the Gospels could not be less than four, and proves the doctrine of the incarnation by the Old Testament, and the Synoptics. The author of the Epistles attributed to St. John.

Chap. XIV. Four distinct eras in Christianity from Paul to the Council of Nice. The Epistles of Paul and the works of the Fathers changed to suit each era. The dishonesty of the times.

Chap. XV. The Trinity, or fourth period of Christianity.

Chap. XVI. The Catholic Epistles.

Chap. XVII. No Christians in Rome from A. D. 66 to A. D. 117.

Chap. XVIII. The office of Bishop foreign to churches established by Paul, which were too poor and too few in number to support the Order. Third chapter of the second Epistle to Timothy, and the one to Titus, forgeries. The writings of the Fathers corrupted.

Chap. XIX. Linus never Bishop of Rome. Clement, third Bishop, and his successors to the time of Anicetus, myths. Chronology of Eusebius exposed; also that of Irenæus.

Chap. XX. The prophetic period. The fourteenth verse of the seventh chapter of Isaiah explained.

Chap. XXI. Bethlehem the birthplace of Christ, as foretold by the prophets. Cyrus the deliverer and ruler referred to by Micah the prophet. The passage from the Lamentations of Jeremiah quoted by Matthew, chapter ii, verse 18, refers to the Jews, and not to the massacre of the infants by Herod.

Chap. XXII. Christ and John the Baptist.

Chap. XXIII. The miracle of the Cloven Tongues. Misapplication of a prophecy of Joel.

Chap. XXIV. Miracles.

Chap. XXV. Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews.

Chap. XXVI. The controversy between Ptolemæus and Irenæus as to the length of Christ's ministry. Christ was in Jerusalem but once after he began to preach, according to the first three Gospels, but three times according to John. If the statements made in the first three are true, everything stated in the fourth could only happen after the death of Christ.

Chap. XXVII. The phase assumed by Christianity in the fourth Gospel demanded a new class of miracles from those given in the first three. A labored effort in this Gospel to sink the humanity of Christ. His address to Mary. The temptation in the wilderness ignored, and the last supper between him and his disciples suppressed. Interview between Christ and the women and men of Samaria. A labored effort to connect Christ with Moses exposed.

Chap. XXVII. The first two chapters of Matthew not in existence during the time of Paul and Apollos. A compromise was made between their followers at the council of Smyrna, A.D. 107. The creed of the Church as it existed at that day determined, and how Christ was made manifest. Catholics of the second century repudiate this creed and abuse Paul. Further proof that Irenæus never saw Polycarp. Injuries inflicted upon the world by the fourth Gospel.

Appendix.

The purpose of this book is to convince the world that the greater part of the New Testament, as at present received by Christians, was fabricated by the dogmatists of the second century, to enforce doctrines which were not warranted by the original teachings of Christ and the Apostles. According to the author, Paul was a thorough Unitarian, believing and preaching everywhere the human origin of Christ, whose pedigree he traces through Joseph, and never alluding to the immaculate conception, or the resurrection, or other evidences of the Saviour's divinity, which are alleged to have been interpolated in later times.....It is due to justice to admit that the author displays a vast amount of research and complete familiarity with the Scriptures in the development of his argument. —N. NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.

THE

Great Magnetic Remedy.

DO YOU SMOKE?

DO YOU CHEW?

DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective, Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed we warrant the REMEDY to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.

Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. Gems of Thought.

IGNORANCE has no light; error follows a false one.

THOSE who think the least of others think the most of themselves.

TAKE from a Christian his belief in hell, and you will take from him his belief.—Diderot.

PEOPLE who do wrong seldom have any difficulty in finding excuses and justification for it.

THE true secret of living at peace with all the world is to have an humble opinion of ourselves.

HE who receives a good turn should never forget it; he who does one should never remember it.

WE are not merely working, intellectual machines, but social puzzles, whose solution is the work of a life.

GLORY is well enough for a rich man; but it is of very little consequence to a poor man with a large family.

THE God of the Christians is a father who is very careful of his apples, but very careless of his children.—Diderot.

WE learn to climb by keeping our eyes, not on the hills that lie behind, but on the mountains that rise before us.

THE human heart is made for love, as the household hearth for fire; and for truth, as the household lamp for light.

BUT what will God do with all those who have never heard of his son? Will he punish the deaf for not having heard?—Diderot.

PERSEVERANCE is a Roman virtue that wins each godlike act and plucks success from the spear-proof crest of rugged danger.

OUT of one hundred men you run against, you will find ninety-five worrying themselves into low spirits and indigestion about troubles that never come.

WITH love the heart becomes a fair and fertile garden, glowing with sunshine and warm hues, and exhaling sweet odors; but without it, it is a bleak desert covered with ashes.

A TRUE religion, interesting all men in all times and in all places, should of necessity be eternal, universal, and evident. Not one has these three characteristics. Thus they are thrice proven false.—Diderot.

NO CEREMONY that to great ones belongs, not the king's crown nor the deputed sword, the marshal's truncheon nor the judge's robe, becomes them with one-half so good grace as mercy does.—Shakspere.

A DAUGHTER is almost always right when she endeavors to imitate her mother; but we do not think the mother is equally right when, at a certain period, she tries all she can to imitate her daughter.

MEN'S lives should be like the days, more beautiful in the evening; or like the spring, aglow with promises; and like the autumn, rich with golden sheaves, where good works and deeds have ripened on the field.

THERE is no art or science that is too difficult for industry to attain to. Industry makes a man understood and valued in all countries and by all nations; it is the philosopher's stone that turns almost everything into gold.

BE not ashamed to confess that you have been in the wrong. It is but owning what you need not be ashamed of, that you now have more sense than you had before, to see your error, more humility to acknowledge it, and more grace to correct it.—Anon.

I HAVE great hope of a wicked man, slender hope of a mean one. A wicked man may be converted and become a prominent saint. A mean man ought to be converted six or seven times, one right after the other, to give him a fair start and put him on an equality with a bold wicked man.—Beecher.

"TO-DAY shalt thou be with me in Paradise." The Apostle's Creed declares that he "suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried. He descended into hell. The third day he rose again from the dead." Now, if Jesus did not go to heaven that day, as he said, then the thief did not go. But if Jesus went to hell, and the thief accompanied him, then we have a new sort of salvation. Excuse me, if you please. —W. S. Bell.

I ONCE gave a lady two-and-twenty recipes against melancholy: one was a bright fire; another, to remember all the pleasant things said to her: another, to keep a box of sugar-plums on the chimney-piece, and a kettle simmering on the hob. I thought this mere trifling at the moment, but have in after life discovered how true it is that these little pleasures often banish melancholy better than higher and more exalted objects; and that no means ought to be thought too trifling which can oppose it either in ourselves or in others.—Sydney Smith.

IT is impossible to live out a new creed or system of belief so as to escape persecution and receive even a tolerant judgment from those around you who cling to the old faiths of their forefathers: and greater still is the task of changing any of them so that they will be willing to abjure the old and accept the new. The mere fact that you refuse to believe what they call their holy religion is enough to condemn you as unworthy even of social toleration; and the presumption of your attempting to teach a new system, ignoring all the old, and then showing by your actions that the fruits of the new "tree of life" exceed by far that of any tree in all the theological gardens of the past, from the Christian mythology on back through all the other mythologies of the ages, is to them as "Pelion piled on Ossa and Ossa rolled on the leafy Olympus."—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

THE SAD PAST AND GONE.

There's a gal that's as fair as the day,
And when near she is not very far,
And her father waits over the way
With a club when I chance to go there.

Chorus.

When we meet, with his feet
He'll assist me along to the door,
And I sigh for my eye,
And my nose that is mashed up and sore.

When I stretch out my limbs on the shore,
I will oftentimes think of the pain
That I had as I left the front door
When I called there to see Mary Jane.

Chorus.

When we meet, with his feet
He'll assist me along to the door,
And I sigh for my eye,
And my nose that is mashed up and sore.

To her father in using his boot
I will render my tribute of praise,
And his excellent aim at my snoot
I'll extol to the end of my days.

Chorus.

When we meet, with his feet
He'll assist me along to the door,
And I sigh for my eye,
And my nose that is mashed up and sore.

NOT A MARRYING GIRL.—They were seated together, side by side on the sofa, in the most approved lover fashion—his arm encircling her taper waist, &c.

"Lizzie," he said, "you must have read my heart ere this; you must know how dearly I love you."

"Yes, Fred; you have certainly been very attentive," said Lizzie.

"But, Lizzie darling, do you love me? Will you be my wife?"

"Your wife, Fred! Of all things, no! No, indeed, nor any one else's."

"Lizzie, what do you mean?"

"Just what I say, Fred. I've two married sisters."

"Certainly! and Mrs. Hopkins and Mrs. Skinner have very good husbands I believe."

"So people say; but I wouldn't like to stand in either May's or Nell's shoes; that's all."

"Lizzie, you astonish me."

"Look here, Fred; I've had over twenty-five sleighrides this winter, thanks to you and my other gentlemen friends."

Fred winced a little here, whether at the remembrance of that unpaid livery bill, or the idea of Lizzie's sleighing with her other gentlemen friends, I cannot positively answer.

"How many do you think my sisters have had? Not the sign of one, either of them. Such pretty girls as May and Nellie were, too, and so much attention they used to have!"

"Now, Lizzie—"

"I am fond of going to the theatre occasionally as well as a lecture or concert sometimes, and I should'nt like it if I proposed attending any such entertainment to be invariably told that times were hard and my husband couldn't afford it, and then to have him sneak off alone."

"Lizzie, Lizzie—"

"And then if once in a dog's age he did condescend to go with me anywhere in the evening, I shouldn't like to be left to pick my way along the slippery places, at the risk of breaking my neck, he walking along unconsciously by my side. I'm of a dependent, clinging nature, and I need the protection of a strong arm."

"Lizzie, this is all nonsense."

"I'm the youngest in our family, and perhaps I've been spoiled. At all events, I know it would break my heart to have my husband vent all the ill temper which he conceals from the world on my defenseless head."

"But, Lizzie, I promise you that I—"

"Oh, yes, Fred; I know what you are going to say—that you will be different; but Mary and Nell have told me time and again that no better husbands than theirs ever lived; no, Fred; as a lover, you are just perfect, and I shall hate awfully to give you up. Still, if you are bent on marrying, there are plenty of girls who have not married sisters, or who are not wise enough to profit by their example, if they have. And don't fret about me, for I've no doubt I can find some one to fill your place—"

But before Lizzie had concluded, Fred made for the door, muttering something "unmentionable to ears polite."

"There!" exclaimed Lizzie, as the door closed with a bang. "I knew he was no better than the rest. That's the way John and Aleck swear and slam doors, when things don't go just right. He'd make a perfect bear of a husband, but I'm sorry he came to the point so soon, for he was just a splendid beau."

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE MORALS FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 17. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, April 27, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

AUSTRALIAN mining is bringing to light the relics of a flora which has long since passed away.

THE Presbyterian quarrels with the Independent. The Independent says the Presbyterian does not know what it is talking about. What ignorance, to be sure!

THE Christian Standard says that the Christian Advocate evades the question of sanctification. That is bad—a most serious case. What can be done about it?

THUS reads the obituary of a deacon's wife, who recently died: "She lived with her husband fifty-nine years, and died in the confident hope of a better life."

REV. GEO. B. VOSBURGH has been indicted by the Hudson County, N. J., Grand Jury for attempting to poison his wife. He gave bail in $5,000. The trial is set for May 13th.

A CENTURY ago the state of the clergy in the Lake District in England was odd indeed. The curate was usually the village publican, and it was not an uncommon sight to see the reverend host playing cards and drinking beer on a Sunday morning with his customers until the church bell tolled.

OYSTERS have always been considered as forbidden food by the Jews, the law of Moses prohibiting the eating of fish without scales. In consequence, however, of Mr. Darwin's theories, a learned rabbi has arrived at the conclusion that oysters are plants, and may therefore be eaten by Jews. An English paper reports that the problem will be submitted to a grand council.

SHALL women preach to the Methodists? In the New York Methodist Conference recently, Bishop Andrews decided that the license to preach granted to Miss Katie Lent in the Poughkeepsie district was null and void. The discipline of the Church did not sanction women preaching. An appeal from the bishop's decision will be carried to the General Conference.

THE expenses incurred at the late Conclave amounted to $220,000, as provisions of all kinds had to be made for a possibly lengthy session. Salaries, wages, etc., had also to be expressly paid for the occasion. The bulk of the provisions has already been sold, although it was found that a large hole had been made in them, notwithstanding the fact that the Conclave lasted only thirty-six hours.

THE Baptist ministers of Chicago have been discussing "The Spiritual Temptations of the Ministry." It proved to be a fruitful subject. The leading essayist said that the principal temptations are over self-exaltation, excessive depression, a mechanicality in the performance of service, and too great censoriousness. If he had added, also, an undue fondness for the ewe lambs of the fold, he would not have gone far astray.

PRIMITIVE SIMPLICITY.—Marquis Antinori, now at the head of an exploring expedition in equatorial Africa, writes to his brother from Mahal-Nonza, in the kingdom of Shoa: "I am very happily residing among this raw-flesh-eating people. The king, as well as the lowest of his subjects, goes barefoot, dresses like the rest, uses his fingers for knife and fork, and wears only a gold pin in his greasy, curly hair as the sign of his royal rank."

As a man was recently digging a well at Mertin, in Alsace, his pickaxe, at the depth of seven feet, struck the remnants of a wall. Further search revealed the foundations of an extensive building, thought to have been an ancient Roman temple. The entire ruin has not been revealed, but a number of interesting objects have been exhumed, including Corinthian columns, busts, coins, arms, and the remnants of the statue of a horse.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Western paper in this city says that Edison, the inventor of the phonograph, stays in his laboratory for days and nights together when absorbed in his work. Twenty-five men are employed to materialize his ideas. Though only thirty-one, he is worth $50,000, derived from his inventions, and is in receipt of a large annual revenue from the same source. He cares little about dress, disregards politics entirely, and never trusts to guesswork.

"A MAN stepped upon a woman's trailing dress, and apologized." Such was the little origin of a terrible tragedy in a Methodist church in Jacksonville, Illinois, on Sunday last. An altercation followed, the man who stepped upon the dress was shot dead, as was also another man who interfered, and the murderer will probably be hanged in due time. Two lives already taken, and one more likely to be taken, and all on account of a careless tread upon a woman's dress. Thus two men have already lost their lives, and another will be hanged for the absurd trail of one dress.

NINETY-SIX Presbyterian ministers died last year. Nine theological seminaries graduated 148 theologues, thus putting that many newly-fledged ministers into the field. With such an overstocking of the minister market it is not a matter of surprise that many of our clergy are idly standing with hands in empty pockets, or looking to secular work as a means of escaping starvation. The brethren ought, in self-defense, to choke off for a few years the means of supply. Of course, the supply ought to be graduated by the demand. But should not more saviors be able to produce more salvation?

THE Rev. Dr. Bartol, of Boston, went thus far toward defending suicide in a recent sermon: "When life ceases to be a pleasure, and when through long months and years much is endured and nothing enjoyed, should life be maintained? I, for one, would not thank any person to preserve my life under such conditions; to smear my body with ointment, as is sometimes done, to hold for a little time soul and body together, when death is sure to come." These remarks are quite as sensible as much that has been said on the subject, but they might be amended by saying that so long as a man can be of use to himself or somebody else he has no moral right to shorten his days.

"IF OUR happy friends desire to annoy us let them tell the things of us that are true. Let them remind us of the fact that we disobeyed and neglected a poor old mother, that we once struck a helpless child, and that we heeded not the supplications of a sister for protection from a brutal husband. Let them remind us of the many, many opportunities to allay the sufferings and promote the happiness of our fellow-kind which we have neglected. Let them tell of the many times that the hungry have been haughtily turned from our door when we have had food in plenty and to spare, Let them accuse us of ingratitude, the want of charity, the love of self, and the disregard for others."—Payne's Age of Reason.

DR. EGGLESTON'S Sunday-school in Brooklyn, is liberal in its distribution of chromos to new comers. The inducement is highly prized by the children, and some of the other Sunday-schools in the neighborhood are alarmed lest they shall lose all their pupils. One superintendent advocates the distribution of plug tops, and another is talking of buying a few barrels of marbles. These things will do for the boys, while the attraction best suited to the girls will be a gayly lithographed fan with Scripture mottoes upon it. With these aids to religious instruction, there is no reason why the rising race should lapse into Infidelity or paganism. A reasonable number of first-class dolls would be a winning card for the girls.

A REMARKABLE religious revival is under way in Richmond, Va., among the negroes. The preachers have not dodged the question of hell, but have vied with one another in picturing the torments of the damned. The Rev. John Jasper's assault upon the theory that the world moves was only one of the incidents of this awakening. A correspondent says of one of brother Jasper's sermons: "Nothing could exceed the vividness with which he pictured the torments of eternal punishment, and he scathingly denounced Beecher and those other preachers who attempt to show that there is no hell. Some of his congregation groveled upon the floor in very agony when he told that 'same as a head of cabbage in a bilin' pot will de sinner be for everlastin' in hell. The pot will keep on bilin' and de cabbage will burn, but never burn up. You all will be like dat cabbage if you don't repent.'" All the employees in a tobacco factory gave up work one day and went through the streets shouting, singing, and urging everybody whom they met to seek salvation. Many of the converts say that they have visions of heaven. Here is another incident: "To-night, at supper in one of the hotels, a waiter suddenly became converted as he was entering the dining-room with a dish of stewed oysters, and, throwing the dish and contents to the floor, he raised his hands and began to tell how he was converted on the spot, and to proclaim the visions of glory that had been revealed to him and were passing before him."

THE Nihilists of Russia, whose principles resemble in many respects those of the Communists of France and the Social Democrats of Germany, are giving trouble to the Russian Government, even in these days of trial. There have been Nihilist riots in the streets of Moscow and elsewhere; and many of the students of the Russian universities, who are imbued with the spirit of Nihilism, have got into hot water. Hundreds of these students have been arrested, and a St. Petersburg despatch says that the number of persons killed in the riots is greater than the police will admit. The Moscow riots were brought about by the arrival there of a body of fifteen students from the University of Kieff, who had been condemned to Siberia for their Nihilism, and who were surrounded by crowds of Muscovites, who cried, "These young men suffer for the truth." We have no account of the method of their dispersion, but no doubt it was the Russian method. There has also been great rejoicing at St. Petersburg for some days, among the Nihilists, on account of the acquittal of Madame Sussulitch, the Nihilist, who attempted to assassinate the Chief of Police, and who confessed that her act was one of vengeance for his cruelty to Nihilist prisoners. The Czar's Government has been so alarmed at the way in which the press and people applauded her acquittal that it has proposed to change the method of trying Nihilists; and this, doubtless, means that they are hereafter to be tried so as to be convicted. Nihilism has grown very formidable in Russia during the last few years; and as it proposes, among other things, to overthrow the imperial and ecclesiastical system of Russia, the authorities are sure to continue to deal with it mercilessly.

A BILL was introduced into the legislature of this State, on Wednesday, the 16th, by Senator Wendover, to incorporate a society for the suppression of crime, naming among the corporators Peter Cooper, ex-Mayor Wickham, and many other leading citizens of this city. The society would in all respects be a counterpart to the one for the suppression of vice now run by the miserable Comstock. In the discussion which followed the introduction of the bill some exceedingly sensible remarks were made. Mr. Ecclesine offered a strong argument against it on the ground that it usurped powers and duties properly belonging to the legally-constituted authorities. Mr. Raines also opposed it, and in the course of his argument made the statement that his experience as prosecuting attorney for Monroe county had convinced him that it was an impossibility for any man to enter upon the work of informer against law-breakers, as contemplated for the agent of this proposed society, without ultimately falling into the grade of a blackmailer and a scoundrel—deserving to be prosecuted himself instead of aiding in the prosecution of others. His remarks will fit Comstock's case remarkably close. Mr. Edick opposed the measure, and said his theory of such bills was that they were not the conception of such men as Peter Cooper, but of a class of men who merely made use of their names. Their object might be worthy and honest, but there was no need of such a society, and it might and probably would be made use of by its agents for unworthy purposes. Mr. Pomeroy also spoke in strong condemnation of the bill. Let us hope that such wise counsel will prevail. We have seen enough of such societies in the operations of the one for the suppression of vice. If the police of this city cannot suppress its crime, what hope is there of a society, whose work is done by spies and informers, ten times more deserving of punishment than the criminals upon whom their spying is done, accomplishing any permanent or even transient good? When nearly twenty-five hundred trained officers and nearly as many professional detectives cannot take care of the criminals of this city, there is very little hope of a half-dozen contemptible intriguers doing anything beyond drawing large salaries and committing worse crimes than they expose.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"Well, Mr. Darwin," said Dr. Scott, "I begin now to understand very well how it is that you see no need for a God or Creator. If all is but one continual round of cause and effect, of development and decay—no beginning, no end; no creation, no annihilation—why try to go back to what has no back to it?"

"You reason correctly, my friend; and if you would like to read them, I will lend you Darwin's works," said his companion.

"I shall be glad to do so," replied the doctor; "and by the time Myra and I shall have read them I presume we shall be Darwinians;" and the old man laughed the happy, contented laugh of a philosopher and an honest man—one who feels that life is full of good, and who means to make out of it all that he can, both for himself and for others about him.

"And you, Myra; do you think you will like to read the books?" asked Mr. Darwin.

"I always feel interested in anything father does," said she, looking at the old man with affectionate reverence. "We always read together, you see, so that we can get all the good out of whatever we are interested in by talking it over as we go along."

"Then, I'll send the books the first chance," said Mr. Darwin, as he rose to go.

"Thank you; but please don't trouble yourself to send them; Myra can run down after them. She is always glad of an excuse to go to your house. She has quite fallen in love with your wife, and thinks there never was another such woman as she is."

Myra laughed, and said she had never known what it was to have a mother of her own, and that Mrs. Darwin seemed so motherly that no one could help loving her. "And, indeed, I do wish she was my own mother," said she, in her quick, impulsive way.

"I don't see how that can be brought about," said her father, with an arch smile, "unless you marry Willie, Mr. Darwin's son. He is a fine-looking young fellow, too, and very agreeable. I brought him home with me from S—— yesterday, and the twelve-mile ride never seemed so short to me before; so I don't think I will object if you wish to make his mother your own."

Myra, all blushes and confusion, stammered out a sort of an apology for her unfortunate impromptu speech; for to be taken up in this manner, and before Mr. Darwin, too, was more than she had bargained for.

"Well! well!" said the doctor; "if the girl isn't blushing!"

"Never mind your father's jokes, Myra, but you just come and see Mrs. Darwin as often as you please," said Mr. Darwin, who pitied her confusion and sought to alleviate it by taking it all as a matter of course. "I am proud to think you like my wife so well. Every mark of affection given her is precious to me, for she is my better half, you know; so of course I value praise given to her more than I should even if bestowed upon myself. But I must go, for I've two patients yet to visit before bedtime."

CHAPTER VII.

"Why, Jennie, what has come over you that you look so anxious and flustered this evening," said Edith, as she met that usually quiet, dignified young lady walking very rapidly towards her. "Your tears are falling fast as an April shower that is dropping from the skies! Come right in the house with me, and let us see if there is a balm in Gilead for your afflictions." And, linking her arm within that of her friend, she led the way up the pleasant garden walk to Rose Hill Mansion, and, going at once to her own little sitting-room, she seated Jennie in an easy-chair while she drew another close to her side, and, sitting in a listening attitude, said, "Now, dear, just open your mind and tell me all about your trouble. You know that I will do all I can to assist you and that your secrets will be as safe with me as in your own breast; and even if I cannot help you, it will be a relief for you to share your burden or sorrow with a true friend."

"Yes, Edith; I know that, and I know that you are a 'friend in need' to all your acquaintances, and, moreover, your advice is good and safe to follow. It is no personal affliction that is now troubling me," said Jennie, wiping her eyes, and speaking in low, earnest tones. "I come to you concerning my dear, darling Sue. You know she and I have always been more than sisters to each other, and have shared every joy and pleasure together. Where one went, the other went too, if possible. I love you and Myra, but Sue is my one special friend, and is dear to me as the apple of my eye. I have been away several days, and on returning last evening I inquired for her, and was told that she was in Baltimore, on a visit to her aunt. Well, this afternoon I passed through the back yard of their house as I and was going across lots to Mrs. Barnes', and as I went through I cast a glance up at Sue's window, as I always do, and to my surprise saw her standing there, with her finger on her lips in token of silence. A moment more and she had pushed a roll of paper through a broken pane of glass, and, motioning me to pick it up, she disappeared. I hurried home, and, seeking the quiet sanctuary of my room, I hastily read the letter, which I now want you to read for yourself, and then we will consult as to what can be done for the poor thing."

Edith took the roll and read as follows:

"Dear, darling Jennie: My best beloved friend, I don't know how I shall get this to you, but will write it and have it ready for the first chance. About a week ago I received a letter from Charlie Flowers, telling me that his new house was completed and nicely furnished, and now that the nest was prepared he was ready for the bird. He said it was of no use to wait longer for father's consent, for it would never be given, and as I was now twenty-one, I ought to feel free to seek my own best and highest happiness; that I had sacrificed myself long enough on the altar of filial duty, considering the parent I had to do with, and that he would meet me at Maple Grove the next day, and we would ride to Squire Floyd's and be married at once. 'I can safely promise,' said he, 'to give you a happier and more pleasant home than you have ever had beneath your father's roof, and as for him, he has money and means, and can hire all done that he needs; and, Sue, even you, darling, he doesn't seem to care for.' Oh! it is all true, Jennie, for I don't think father would miss me much, and I know Charlie would; so don't blame me for listening to his pleadings. He is a pretty fair lawyer, and his father is well off; all my father objects to is his, or their, religion. Old Mr. Flowers is a Universalist, and Charlie himself is nearly an Infidel. He never was pious, and since the Darwins came he has been reading their books and papers and talking with them till he is almost as liberal as they are. He is so frank and open that he talks to every one and in all places, and father heard him arguing in the store with Deacon Moss one day, and as Charlie beat the deacon on every point, father came home tearing mad, and said I should never speak to him again; and for two months past he has been trying to get me to marry old Elder Hobbs. 'What!' I hear you say, 'that canting old hypocrite?' Yes, Jennie, that disgusting old tobacco-box—you know he is forever chewing and spitting. I have never said a word to you about him, for I knew I'd soon be twenty-one, and hoped then that Charlie and I could marry and put an end to all such schemes; and, really, Jennie dear, I was ashamed to have you know that such a horrid old object was wanting to marry me. You see, the boys having run off, and I being the only child at home, he thought I would come in for all the property some day, and it's that, more than any love for me, that induces the elder to persevere in his efforts, after all the repulses I've given him. I tell you, Jennie, I've had my own time with those two old men. But the stolen interviews with Charlie kept hope alive in my heart, and made such gloriously sunny spots in my life that its clouds all had silver linings, and I've been enabled to weather it along tolerably pleasantly till the following incident occurred and upset all our hopes and plans, for the present at least:

"The night of the same day in which I received Charlie's letter I was awakened by a voice in my room. It was bright moonlight. I raised my head and looked about me, and was surprised and startled at seeing father just drawing the letter from the pocket of my dress. I sprang from the bed and endeavored to gain possession of it, but he rudely pushed me away, saying he had seen Bob Smith give it to me, and, knowing he was Charlie's errand-boy, he was determined to know for himself what clandestine operations were going on. Putting the letter in his pocket, he left the room, locking the door after him. I waited in trembling anxiety for what was to follow, and in a short time heard his returning footsteps; and as he unlocked the door and entered the room, I knew, by his white lips and the trembling nervousness of his walk, that he was awfully angry. He had the terrible whip in his hand, and, appalled at the thought that he meant to use it upon me, I exclaimed, 'Oh, father! you surely will not whip me. Don't strike me, I pray, or you will murder me, as you did mother and Allie, for I am sure one stroke of that cruel lash will kill me.' 'Spare the rod and spoil the child,' said he, in solemn tones; 'honor thy father and thy mother; obey your elders, is the advice of God's holy book; and I intend you shall honor me, vile baggage that you are! You would run off, would you? and with an Infidel, too! which is not only disobeying me, but the Bible itself, which bids us to have no fellowship with the ungodly. You need not bawl, or wring your hands, or plead to me. I know my duty, and shall do it now.' And he raised the whip as he spoke, and drew it heavily across my face, neck, and shoulders, cutting clear into the quivering flesh. I screamed and fainted; and when I came to, all was still and silent as the grave. I went back to bed and lay there, trembling and crying with pain and over my outraged feelings, all morning.

Value of the Higher Sentiments.—Concluded.

A SERMON BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

A few years ago people spoke of flowers as if they were something thrown into the world, created by God to please himself, made for the fun of the thing.

But we know now that the rose owes its bloom, the lily its whiteness, the heliotrope its fragrance, to the necessity that they should continue to do their part in the conduct of nature. The color of birds' wings, the gloss of birds' feathers, is all necessary, is all useful, is all indispensable. There is not a hue, there is not a line, there is not a thing, there is not a blending of colors on the wing of a bird, or of an insect, that does not work out the economics of the world; it is there, as well as anything else might be there, for a purpose; and if all the flowers were destroyed, if all the plants lost their beauty, then something more would vanish than loveliness; we should begin to breathe foul air and live in a pestilential atmosphere, to droop and to die. So I claim for these higher sentiments, make them as delicate, as evanescent, as you please, I claim for these, practical uses in the education of man; and I say, without them life would not be worth having, nay, life would not long continue to be life; the intellectual vigor, the moral force, would abate and cease. See how important these things are for the education of character, of personal character; consider their uses as preventives of evil. Many years ago an enterprising gentleman who lived on an arm of the sea where his dwelling was exposed, on all sides, to the breath of the ocean conceived the idea of raising the most delicious fruits on his trees. After much thought and many experiments, all of which failed, he surrounded his domain with a fine, wicker fence, very light, and apparently very weak; but that fence sifted the air that blew upon it from the sea, took away its harshness, and softened its quality. On the outside of the fence you would see crusts formed of flakes of sleet; on the other side, hardly an inch away, were blooming flowers, were ripening peaches and pears, apricots and grapes and plums, which were of the very finest quality. The atmosphere on one side of the fence was cold, bleak, and biting, nothing would grow there, not even a tree; on the other side of the fence, it was perpetual summer, which was all owing to the fact of that fine lattice-work. The same effect is found to be produced by trees, herbage, and shrubbery. Do you know that whole tracts have been laid waste and devastated, made sterile and unproductive, made utterly useless for human habitations, by cutting down the trees? Do you know that whole lands have been reduced from fertility to barrenness simply by removing the trees from the hillside? and also that by planting a line of herbage and shrubbery the fault of these districts may be remedied, and the desert may be made to bloom like a rose? The same effect that these fine, subtle, delicate agents will have upon the utilities of the actual life of man, these fine moral sentiments will have upon their character. I heard a story the other day of the war. In one of the Southern camps the officers were carousing; they were far away from home in a strange country, the enemy surrounding them, and they were reckless and rude; their revel partook of the qualities of their life, and it was loud and indecent; songs were sung, stories were told, and jests were made, to which no modest ear could listen. In the company sat a young man, an officer, who went there in spite of himself, not wishing to go; he came from a New England town, and he sat silent not joining in the revel, and making no response to the songs or toasts, until, late in the evening when the revelry had reached its height, he was observed sitting by himself quietly, apparently taking no interest in what was going on, he was called upon for a sentiment. He sat silent for a few moments, then rose: "Gentlemen, I give you 'Our Mothers.'"

There was an end to the revelry—no more indecent stories, no more ribald songs, no more unseemly jests; more and more it began to ebb out; and one after another of the men went home, with something in their hearts that had not been there before; and one after another came to that young man and thanked him for his courage, for his heroism, in proposing that one sentiment.

Consider the power of inspiration that there is in any sentiment—the power of quickening the purpose, to nerve, to elevate the will. Some years ago, in the city of Dresden, wandering about the town, in a dark, narrow street, and lifting my eyes high up, I beheld an open window, and a pot of roses standing there. Presently a woman came to the window, and seeing a stranger standing in the street below looking up, she retired and brought another one, put it by the side of the first, and sat down, with her sewing, by the window. She was a poor woman, or she would not have lived up so high there, in a large town; and imagine the poor woman slaving day by day, week by week, year in, year out, at her poor, servile toil, scarcely earning money enough, by all her labor, to keep herself alive; and I thought how much comfort, how much real benefit, how much sublime influence, aye, how much inspiration, she owed to that little plant and the care she took of it. That little flower carried her out into fields associated with endless beauty; told her of gardens where such things bloomed all the year; aye, did they not tell of that wonderful nature whose chemistry draws out of the sod a multitude of the loveliest of all created things? Was not the poor woman, sitting by her pot of roses, brought into intimate communion with the loveliness, the great beauty, the creative power, of the world? And was she not assisted in her daily toil, in her patient self-denial, simply by these weak creations of nature? I love to think of that charming story where the village youth sees a face carved on the mountain side, but as increasing years beheld him growing into manhood, there was no face there after all; it was only a heap of stones. Everything depended upon the point of view; one must stand at that particular spot, at this particular hour, and see the light falling upon the rocks at that particular inclination. The image was in his imagination; but that was enough. It is enough to have an image in his imagination, no matter whether there is one there or not; sit and dream of it, have the vision of it, catch the imagination of it, and it will work upon you with its fine chisel with the power of a sculptor—as Michael Angelo sculptured the "David" out of what seemed to be a useless block of stone. The whole problem is whether people can ever become any better than they are; whether they can ever do anything for themselves; whether they would ever elevate, lift themselves up into any higher realm of purpose. They may, and some few can by dint of hard work. Some few prosaic, some few homely people, without imagination, without fancy, go to work faithfully, year in and year out, putting stone upon stone, until the structure of goodness is erected; so very few, those who can do that, so very few, that their example counts for nothing. Yet there is not one of us who cannot become transformed, transfigured, illuminated, by an idea, by a thought, by a vision, by a sentiment. Then learn of some noble person. Learn to admire some heroic deed. Fall under the influence of some man or woman who is the incarnation, to your imagination, of nobleness and grace, of serenity and purity; no matter whether the qualities are there or not, if you think they are there they are there for you. Cling to what you think is there. Worship your ideal, though it be nothing but an ideal. If you give it the attributes, you admire these, whether the ideal is caused by the imagination or not, whether the form pass away or not. Cling to your ideal, worship your dream, follow your vision, and gradually you will find that your natural qualities are changing, your life is becoming ennobled, your purposes are becoming firm and serene, and you yourself are gradually following up in the way. These finest, most delicate, aromatic sentiments have their predicted power.

Every age that is truly utilitarian must be traded for an age that is not utilitarian. An age that does not study to use, that does not aim at performing, that does not show what it will do by gradual achievement, that does not seek to benefit the world in some way, is an age of hypocrisy and pretension. The mere fact that ours is a utilitarian age does not condemn it; and when we use the word "utilitarian," we do not mean utilitarian in a low sense, set a low standard of use, like most of those who criticise our age as being utilitarian, and condemn it with subjecting everything to the money sentiment. What is it good for? Can we eat it? Can we wear it? Can we drink it? This lowering the standard of utility lowers beauty. What is the use of the finest expression of the mind? What is the use of poetry? If a man has anything to say, why don't he say it as plainly as possible in prose, so that we can understand it? The critic forgets that poetry is prose idealized, is thought lifted up into the realms of imagination, is intellectuality turned into harmony and melody. The poet associates feeling with thought in the rhythm and flow of his verse. Thus, we see of these fine things that they are useful simply because they communicate aroma and fragrance to the senses and sensibility to the mind. What is the use of pictures? they will not bring as much as we paid for them. What is the use of statuary? it costs a vast deal of money, and after all, it is so heavy that it may break through your floor. What is the use of the charming tapestry which we hang up in our windows and spread on our floors?

What would life be without them? True, they cost money, they make none for us, they take money from our purse and put none in it; but they put something in our mind. It is a sensibility of infiniteness, and teaches that which is worth more than gold or silver; and it is the process that refines, that sanctifies, the world.

Criticism forgets how much religion should stand for these higher sentiments of the soul. In our endeavor to make everything plain about our superstition, to dash the idols, to expose hypocrisy and fraud, to drag divineness out of the dark, and show precisely what to convict; in our endeavor to do this—an endeavor which must be persevered in to the very end, though that end be exceedingly bitter—are we not prone to forget that, after all, the real influence of religion must depend upon the power to give a higher aim to the mind of man. These ethereal, these evanescent sentiments, reverence and aspiration, should be the means of lifting men above the level of their prosaic lives. Science is not religion, philosophy is not religion, common sense is not religion, morality is not religion. Religion is that fine aromatic which stimulates us when we are faint, and solaces us when we are hopeless, instills into our minds when they are vacant and distrustful. This is the reason why no prosaic form of religion has ever held its place in the world. This is the reason why what we call Unitarianism has never flourished—never will; because it is prose and not poetry, because it is prose easy to understand. We want something that nobody can understand; not because it is out of the reach of intelligence, but because it is to subtle, like music, for the intelligence to lay hold; something to be caught on the wing; something for the heart to love; something for a life to worship; and it is man's hope and it is man's endeavor. It is all my endeavor to drag the mystic out of religion, to expose it for the sham that it so often is, to show how all these symbols and forms are these lovely things of beauty, sublime truths which play so sweetly upon the refined man's sensibility, clear it of the heavy old orthodoxy that clings to it, show it as a dream of perfection to humanity, show it as a symbol, that which humanity in its best moments has looked forward to with the hope that it may be realized, and believing that it could be realized. How lovely that symbol! and I, for one, never can be reconciled to take it entirely out of the world; for if we did, then the world would become hard and toiling and coarse, and we should go stumbling along, groping and crawling. The new religion, the religion of the future, will be simply religion purified and cleared—religion able to communicate, to keep alive and make abiding these subtle, transforming, transfiguring influences which are the life of our life, which are the soul of our soul.

LAWS OF ADAPTATION.

All the phenomena of sexual, monstrous, and individual adaptation, which we may comprise under the name of the laws of indirect or potential adaptation, are as yet very little known to us in their real nature and in their deeper causal connection. Only this much we can at present maintain with certainty, that numerous and important transformations in organic forms owe their existence to this process. Many and striking variations of form solely depend on causes which at first only affect the nutrition of the parental organism, and specially its organs of propagation. Evidently the relations in which the sexual organs stand to other parts of the body are of the greatest importance. We shall have more to say of these presently, when we speak of the law of correlative adaptation. How powerfully the variations in the conditions of life and nutrition affect the propagation of organisms is rendered obvious by the remarkable fact that numerous wild animals which we keep in our zoological gardens, and exotic plants which are grown in our botanical gardens, are no longer able to reproduce themselves. This is the case, for example, with most birds of prey, parrots, and monkeys. The elephant, also, and the animals of prey of the bear genus, in captivity hardly ever produce young ones. In like manner many plants in a cultivated state become sterile. The two sexes may indeed unite, but no fructification, or no development of the fructified germ, takes place. From this it follows with certainty that the changed mode of nutrition in the cultivated state is able completely to destroy the capability of reproduction, and therefore to exercise the greatest influence upon the sexual organs. In like manner other adaptations or variations of nutrition in the parental organism may cause, not indeed a complete want of descendants, but still important changes in their form.

DIRECT ADAPTATION.

Much better known than the phenomena of indirect or potential adaptation are those of direct or actual adaptation, to the consideration of which we now turn our attention. To them belong all those changes of organisms which are generally considered to be the results of practice, habit, training, education, etc.; also those changes of organic forms which are effected directly by the influence of nutrition, of climate, and other external conditions of existence. As has already been remarked in direct or actual adaptation, the transforming influence of the external cause affects the form of the organism itself, and does not only manifest itself in that of the descendants (Gen. Morph. II. 207).

We may place the law of universal adaptation at the head of the different laws of direct or actual adaptation, because it is the chief and most comprehensive among them. It may be briefly explained in the following proposition: "All organic individuals become unequal to one another in the course of their life by adaptation to different conditions of life, although the individuals of one and the same species remain mostly very much alike." A certain inequality of organic individuals, as we have seen, was already to be assumed in virtue of the law of individual (indirect) adaptation. But, beyond this, the original inequality of individuals is afterwards increased by the fact that every individual, during its own independent life, subjects and adapts itself to its own peculiar conditions of existence. All different individuals of every species, however like they may be in their first stages of life, become in the further course of their existence less like to one another. They deviate from one another in more or less important peculiarities, and this is a natural consequence of the different conditions under which the individuals live. There are no two single individuals of any species which can complete their life under exactly the same external circumstances. The vital conditions of nutrition, of moisture, air, light; further, the vital conditions of society, the inter-relations with surrounding individuals of the same or other species, are different in every individual being; and this difference first affects the functions, and later changes the form, of every individual organism. If the children of a human family show, even at the beginning, certain individual inequalities which we may consider as the consequence of individual (indirect) adaptation, they will appear still more different at a later period of life, when each child has passed through different experiences, and has adapted itself to different conditions of life. The original difference of the individual processes of development evidently becomes greater the longer the life lasts and the more various the external conditions which influence the separate individuals. This may be demonstrated in the simplest manner in man, as well as in domestic animals and cultivated plants, in which the vital conditions may be arbitrarily modified. Two brothers, of whom one is brought up as a workman and the other as a priest, develop quite differently in body as well as in mind; in like manner, two dogs of one and the same birth, of which one is trained as a sporting dog and the other chained up as a watch dog. The same observation may also readily be made as to organic individuals in a natural state. If, for instance, one carefully compares all the trees in a fir or beech forest, which consists of trees of a single species, one finds that among all the hundreds or thousands of trees there are not two individual trees completely agreeing in size of trunk and other parts, in the number of branches, leaves, etc. Everywhere we find individual inequalities which, in part at least, are merely the consequences of the different conditions of life under which the trees have developed. It is true we can never say with certainty how much of this dissimilarity in all the individuals of every species may have originally been caused by indirect individual adaptation, and how much of it acquired under the influence of direct or universal adaptation.

A second series of phenomena of direct adaptation, which we may comprise under the law of cumulative adaptation, is no less important and general than universal adaptation. Under this name I include a great number of very important phenomena, which are usually divided into two quite distinct groups. Naturalists, as a rule, have distinguished, first, those variations of organisms which are produced directly by the permanent influence of external conditions (by the constant action of nutrition, of climate, of surroundings, etc.), and, secondly, those variations which arise from habit and practice, from accustoming themselves to definite conditions of life, and from the use and non-use of organs. The latter influences have been set forth especially by Lamarck as important causes of the change of organic forms, while the former have for a very long time been recognized as such more generally.

The sharp distinction usually made between these two groups of cumulative adaptation, and which even Darwin still maintains, disappears as soon as we reflect more accurately and deeply upon the real nature and causal foundation of these two apparently very different series of adaptations. We then arrive at the conviction that in both cases there are always two different active causes to be dealt with: on the one hand the external influence or action of adaptative conditions of life, and on the other hand the internal reaction of the organism which subjects and adapts itself to that condition of life. If cumulative adaptation is considered from the first point of view alone, and the transforming actions of the permanent external conditions of life are traced to those conditions solely, then the principal stress is laid unduly upon the external factor, and the necessary internal reaction of the organism is not taken into proper consideration. If, on the other hand, cumulative adaptation is unjustly regarded solely in relation to its second factor and the transforming action of the organism itself, its reaction against the external influences, its change by practice, habit, use, or non-use of organs, is put into the foreground, then we forget that this reaction is first called into play by the action of external conditions of existence. Hence it seems that the distinction made between these two groups lies only in the different manner of viewing them, and I believe that they can, with full justice, be considered as one. The most essential fact in these phenomena of cumulative adaptation is that the change of the organism which manifests itself first in the functions, and at a later period in the form, is the result either of long-enduring, or of often-repeated, influences of an external cause. The smallest cause, by cumulation of its action, can attain the greatest results.

NO. XIII.

PLANETARY SECESSION AND ORGANIC LIFE.

My Dear Readers: Before I proceed with the subject of this letter—the production of the phenomenon of life—allow me to correct an error I almost unconsciously led you into, and which arose from a lack of definiteness. You would be led, from my sixth letter, in which I gave you some little idea how suns, stars, and planets were started as such, to think each sun, each planet, and each asteroid and satellite was started separately by itself, and I notice my language will bear that construction, and I wish to be a little more explicit on that point.

Let me tell you, then, that when Jah and I traversed over space through the thin and aeriform matter we had brought into existence in the manner I have described to you, to establish foci or centers for grand systems and constellations, we did not start each planet or each globe separately and independently, but we laid the vast expanse of the universe off in great areas for systems. Then it was we set the magnetic, electric—positive and negative—attractive, and affinitive forces which we had evolved from the matter in active operation, and in this way it was the thin matter began to aggregate into vast bodies and assume a circular regular motion. This aggregating and attracting process had of course to be continued great eras of time, as the bodies become denser and more and more compact.

Thus we had all through our vast domain endless numbers of thin revolving masses of accumulating matter, growing more and more heated as they became more dense; and these were the systems which are still in existence, and of which your own solar system is a fair sample. When it had arrived to a certain degree of condensation, and had become a vast mass of seething, heated matter, with the various forces of increased power permeating it and ramifying in every direction, then the process of separation was adopted, or was the result of the condition that had been produced.

You must understand, then, that the material composing the solar system was once all in one vast body, and filled the present orbit of Neptune. It was then, of course, comparatively light and thin; but as it gradually became more dense, the forces within it became more intensified and powerful, and, by being confined in the mass, a tendency arose to burst the bonds and to eject and throw off certain portions of the vast mass; which masses, in keeping with the laws which govern matter, assumed a spherical form, and retained the same revolving motion which it received from the parent body, and at the same time commenced an orbital motion around the grand central sphere. In this way all the planets of your system were thrown off from the sun, and the satellites, or moons, were, in a similar manner, thrown off from the planet which are able to sustain such a retinue.

This power of separation or ejectment, which makes the formation of new worlds possible, is one of the grandest laws of the universe, and has been brought into active operation, in a greater or lesser degree, in all the systems that Jah and your humble servant originated. It did not operate at the same time in all the systems, nor at the same time in our own system, but at long intervals of time. The outer planets were the first ones thrown off, and their motions are much slower than those ejected at a later date, when the sun had condensed to smaller proportions and the forces which impelled its entire substance existed in increased potency. The nearer the planets are to the sun, the more rapid the movements in their orbits around the parental orb.

When these ejectments were made, the matter was in such a soft and plastic condition that it was as easy for the planets, large as they are, to assume the sperical form as for a single drop of water to assume the same globular form when suspended by a thread. They not only very readily became spherical, but the heavier materials of which they are composed pressed gradually to the center, leaving the lighter substances on the outside, as I have already explained to you. This, of course, was a grand movement, and was not accomplished in a day nor in a year. It took ages to accomplish it.

You will understand, of course, that the sun and planets are essentially of the same elements or forms of substance. The same metals and primates that exist in your world exist also in the sun, and in all the other planets that revolve around it. If my word is not sufficient to cause you to accept this as a fact, I will call your attention to the grand discoveries recently made by your learned scientists, by which they have discovered upon the sun's disc precisely the same metals, and nearly all of them, that are so well known to be component parts of your own globe. Iron, lead, copper, iodine, and lots of other metals are found to exist there the same as with you.

When these ejectments took place from the sun, the events were of the most magnificent character, I assure you. You can easily understand that Jah and I were on hand, and gave our particluar attention to the grand events. It was not exactly the "wreck of matter and the crush of worlds," but it was greater and grander—the sublime birth or secession of worlds; the declaration of independent planetary existence.

I fear I can hardly make you comprehend the magnificence of those wonderful events. To see vast portions of the sun, thousands of miles in diameter, of highly fused matter, thrown with the velocity of a meteor for millions upon millions of miles out into space were indeed the most magnificent displays that the universe has ever produced. Nothing, perhaps, has ever more fully absorbed the attention of that Brother of mine than did those most interesting and stupendous events. I so well know that your minds cannot easily take in the grandeur of these operations that I am constrained to leave them to your own fertile imaginations while I busy myself in fulfilling the promise I made you in my last letter, and that is, how animal and vegetable organization was originated on your globe.

You must understand, then, that after vast ages had elapsed from the time of which I have just been speaking, after the earth had got cooled down, as I have already described to you, so that water could remain in fluid form upon its surface, vast oceans covered as large portions of it as now, or larger. It will be readily comprehended that at that early age the earth and the surrounding atmosphere was materially warmer than now. The humidity, or steamy condition of the atmosphere, had so far subsided that the rays of the sun fell in positive force upon the surface of the earth and infused the waters that surrounded it with the vivifying principles that made an absence of a low form of animal life almost an impossibility.

I tell you, my friends, when the conditions are right, when the electric and magnetic fluids are seconded by the proper amount of warmth and the vivifying property of light, with a due amount of moisture and other essential qualities to the production of animal life, it is no more difficult for life to then be engendered than for almost any other phenomena in the universe to take place. I assure you there are fixed laws governing every possible condition that may arise, and the origin of animal life is really but little more marvelous than all the rest that pertains to the universe. Every department of it is wonderful, and it is very unjust to exalt some of its operations to the skies, and turn from others of its results as commonplace and unworthy of attention. Everything about the universe is grand; everything is worthy of your profoundest regard; everything in it deserves your closest investigation and your most attentive study.

It is hardly necessary for me to tell you that Jah and I were deeply interested in the important experiment, if it may be so called, of producing animal life, however humble it might be in its incipiency, for on that result depended, we knew, the success of the grand enterprise we had undertaken. If we did not understand it originally, we had by this time learned to have all the conditions right before the experiment was put to the test. We understood that if we attempted to produce living forms, though ever to simple, the experiment would prove a failure if we did not have all the surroundings and conditions in the most favorable state.

It had been immense eras since matter had been in existence; it had been vast ages since the earth had commenced an independent existence; it was some little time after the earth had been so cooled that water could remain in a fluid state in oceans, seas, lakes, and rivers, and yet not so hot that the lowest forms of animal life could be possible, before we really saw that the time had come for our grand enterprise to take another step in the path of progress. The simplicity of the production of the incipient forms of life was one of the most striking features in the entire programme. When everything was ready, everything was accomplished.

It is this day a vexed question with your most learned scientists whether any forms of life are capable of being produced by a spontaneous operation of nature. Some argue that it is, and cite proofs of numerous cases where experiments, under various circumstances and conditions, have resulted in the production of minute forms of animal life. Others, again, stoutly deny the entire theory, and maintain with persistent arguments that life is never produced spontaneously, and that it must be the result of pre-existing germs; and they again bring us many tests and experiments to prove their positions to be correct.

Now, I must assure you that the first class are correct. The powers of the universe are capable of producing every result that has yet been produced; and it is no more difficult for nature to produce life germs than to produce suns, worlds, mountains, oceans, and rivers. Life germs are not a supernatural production, but a simple result of the operations of the universe. The combination of oxygen and hydrogen so as to form water—though it may be regarded as one of the simplest that ever took place—was really just as difficult, and almost as marvelous as the production of low forms of animal life.

Next to light, moisture, and warmth, electricity and magnetism are important life-giving qualities. There can be no life without them. They give the qualities of which nerve force is produced, and without this there can be no life, no sensation. It is the harmonization of all the life forces, and the proper blending of them together upon the form of matter called protoplasm, that constitutes animal life. Protoplasm, your own scientists inform you, is a condition of matter containing essential elements to the production of life, and it is but a step from that condition to the lower forms of life; and all that was necessary to be done to complete that step was simply to apply the vital forces to which I have called your attention.

But this subject is so vast, and yet so intricate, that I see I will not be able to do it justice in this letter, which has already reached prescribed limits; so I will now bid you good-by till next time, when, with your pleasure, I will recur to this subject and endeavor to impart to you further information upon this vitally interesting subject. In taking my leave for these seven days, let me again assure you of my continued friendship and good will.

I am your own Lucifer,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

TYCHO BRAHE.

"No great advance could be made upon the Copernican system without either a better knowledge of the laws of motion or more exact observations of the positions of the heavenly bodies. It was in the latter direction that the advance was first made. The leader was Tycho Brahe, who was born in 1546, three years after the death of Copernicus. His attention was first directed to the study of astronomy by an eclipse of the sun on August 21, 1560, which was total in some parts of Europe. Astonished that such a phenomenon could be predicted, he devoted himself to a study of the methods of observation and calculation by which the prediction was made. In 1576 the king of Denmark founded the celebrated Observatory of Uraniberg, at which Tycho spent twenty years assiduously engaged in observations of the positions of the heavenly bodies with the best instruments that could then be made. This was just before the invention of the telescope, so that the astronomer could not avail himself of that powerful instrument. Consequently his observations were superseded by the improved ones of the centuries following, and their celebrity and importance are principally due to their having afforded Kepler the means of discovering his celebrated laws of planetary motion.

"As a theoretical astronomer Tycho was unfortunate. He rejected the Copernican system, for a reason which in his day had some force, namely, the incredible distance at which it was necessary to suppose the fixed stars to be situated if that system were accepted. It has been shown how, on the Copernican system, the outer planets seem to describe an annual revolution in an epicycle, in consequence of the annual revolution of the earth around the sun. The fixed stars, which are situated outside of the solar system, must appear to move in the same way if the system be correct. But no observations, either of Tycho or of his predecessors, had shown any such motion. To this the friends of Copernicus could only reply that the distance of the fixed stars must be so great that the motion could not be seen. Since the vibration of three or four minutes of arc might have been detected by Tycho, it would be necessary to suppose the stellar sphere at least a thousand times the distance of the sun, and a hundred times that of Saturn, then the outermost known planet. That a space so vast should intervene between the orbit of Saturn and the fixed stars seemed entirely incredible. To the philosophers of the day it was an axiom that nature would not permit the waste of space here implied. At the same time, the proofs given by Copernicus that the sun was the center of the planetary motions were too strong to be overthrown. Tycho, therefore, adopted a system which was a compound of the Ptolemaic and the Copernican. He supposed the five planets to move around the sun as the center of their motions, while the sun itself was in motion, describing an annual orbit around the earth, which remained at rest in the center of the universe.

"Perhaps it is fortunate for the reception of the Copernican system that the astronomical instruments of Tycho were not equal to those of the beginning of the present century. Had he found that there was no annual parallax among the stars amounting to a second of arc, and therefore that, if Copernicus was right, the stars must be at least two hundred thousand times the distance of the sun, the astronomical world might have stood aghast at the idea, and concluded that, after all, Ptolemy must be right and Copernicus wrong.

"Tycho never elaborated his system, and it is hard to say how he would have answered the numerous objections to it. He never had any disciples of eminence except among the ecclesiastics; in fact, the invention of the telescope did away with the last remaining doubts of the correctness of the Copernican system before a new one would have had time to gain a foothold."

KEPLER.

This noted astronomer was born in 1571, in Wurtemburg. For a time he served as an assistant of Tycho Brahe in his calculations, but he was altogether too clear-sighted to adopt the curious system of his master. Being satisfied of the truth of the Copernican system he set himself to determine the true laws of the motion of the planets around the sun. Copernicus had adopted the ancient theory that all the celestial motions are compounded of circular motions and was thus obliged to introduce an epicycle to account for the irregularities of the motion. The observations of Tycho were so much more accurate than those of his predecessors that they showed Kepler the insufficiency of this theory to represent the true motions of the planets around the sun. The planet most favorable for this investigation was Mars, being at the same time one of the nearest to the earth, and one of which the orbit was the most eccentric. The only way in which Kepler could proceed in his investigation was to make various hypotheses respecting the orbit in which the planet moved, and its velocity in various points of its orbit, and from these hypotheses to calculate the positions and motions of the planet as seen from the earth, and then compare with observations, to see whether the observed and calculated positions agreed. As modern tables of logarithms by which such calculations are immensely abridged were not then in existence, each trial on hypotheses cost Kepler an immense amount of labor. Finding that the form of the orbit was certainly not circular, but elliptical, he was led to try the effect of placing the sun in the focus of the ellipse. Then, the motion of the planet would be satisfied if its velocity were made variable, being greater the nearer it was to the sun. Thus he was at length led to his three celebrated laws of planetary motion which are as follows:

1. The orbit of each planet is an ellipse, having the sun in one focus.

2. The planet moves around the sun, its radius-vector (or the line joining it to the sun) passes over equal areas in equal times.

3. To understand this second law of Kepler it must be remembered that the planet moves not in a circle, but in an ellipse, and that the sun is not in the center but in one focus or nearer one extreme of the ellipse than the other. When the planet is at the point nearest the sun it is called the perihelion. As it passes round to the opposite part of the ellipse when it is farthest from the sun, this point is called the aphelion. Then it begins to approach the sun again, and continues to do so till it again reaches the perihelion, when it again begins to repeat the same orbit, the same circuit round the ellipse, with unerring certainty thousands and millions of times.

If in a diagram of an ellipse we mark the planet in its orbit at the end of any equal intervals of time, say thirty days, sixty days, ninety days, one hundred and twenty days, and mark these places, a, b, c d; between each two of which the planet requires thirty days to move. Draw a line to the sun from each of the positions, beginning at the perihelion (with the sun twenty-five per cent nearer that part of the ellipse than the opposite position or aphelion). We will thus have four triangular spaces, over each of which the radius-vector of the planet has swept in thirty days. The first of Kepler's laws means that the areas of all these spaces will be equal.

The old theory, that motions of the heavenly bodies must be circular and uniform, or, at least, composed of circular and uniform motions, was thus done away with forever. The ellipse took the place of the circle, and a variable motion the place of a uniform one.

Another law of planetary motion—not less important than these two—was afterwards discovered by Kepler. Copernicus knew what had been surmised by ancient astronomers; that the more distant the planet, the longer it took it to perform its course around the sun, and this not merely because it had further to go, but because its motion was really slower. For instance, Saturn is about nine and a half times as far from the sun as the earth, and if it moved as fast as the earth it would perform its revolution in nine and a half years; but it actually requires between twenty-nine and thirty years. It does not, therefore, move one-third so fast as the earth, although it has nine times as far to go. Copernicus, however, never detected any relation between the distances and the periods of revolution. Kepler found it to be as follows:

Third law of planetary motion. The square of the time of revolution of each planet is proportional to the cube of its mean distance from the sun.

This law is shown in the following table, which gives (1) the mean distance of each planet known to Kepler, expressed in astronomical units, each unit being the mean distance of the earth from the sun; (2) the cube of its quantity; (3) the time of its revolution in years; and (4) the square of this time:

Planets.	Distances.	Cube of Distances	Period (Years.)	Square of Period.
Mercury.....	0.387	0 058	0.241	0.058
Venus.....	0.723	0.378	0.615	0.378
Earth.....	1.000	1.000	1.000	1.000
Mars.....	1.524	3.340	1.881	3.538
Jupiter.....	5.203	140.8	11 86	140 66
Saturn.....	9.539	868.0	29.46	867.9

The remarkable agreement between the second and fourth columns will be observed.

Answers to Inquirers.

C. S.—What were the religious views of Gerrit Smith? Ans.—He was a moderate Infidel. He was an unbeliever in supernaturalism and revelation.

CLENTOMAN.—Is the following quotation in the Bible? and where can it be found? "If a man be circumcised, Christ shall avail him nothing." Ans.—Galatians v, 2, reads nearly in those words.

C. S.—Is James Parton, the historian, an Infidel? Ans.—He is an unbeliever in the Christian system of salvation, an unbeliever in the divinity of the Bible; hence he is an Infidel, although he is not in favor of the use of that term?

J. H. L.—What denomination does the Rev. O. B. Frothingham belong to? Ans.—He is what is called a Free Religionist. He discards all creeds and all superstitions. He disbelieves in supernaturalism, and is strictly a Rationalist.

INQUIRER.—Where is the following passage of Scripture to be found? "Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them also he justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified." Ans.—Romans viii, 30.

E. D. B.—When did the Rosicrucians originate as a class? Ans.—There was a society by that name in the thirteenth century—a religious organization. The Rosicrucians of the seventeenth century are said to have been a fraudulent organization. The account of them published by Adreas is not entitled to credit.

J. B.—Who and what was Comus, and what does the word mean? Ans.—Comus is a character in mythology; he was held to be the god of revelry, feasting, and nocturnal entertainments. He is represented as a youth flushed with drinking and crowned with roses.

E. E. B.—What are the estimated numbers of Catholics, Protestants, Mohammedans, and Buddhists in the world? Ans.—Different estimates are made by different writers. The usual estimate by Christian authorities is as follows: Catholics, 200,000,000; Protestants, 100,000,000; Greek and Oriental churches, 80,000,000; total, 380,000,000; Mohammedans, 200,000,000; Buddhists, 400,000,000; Brahmins, 150,000,000. The number of Christians is probably exaggerated.

H. H. M.—What were the dimensions of Noah's Ark? Ans.—Genesis vi, 15, represents God as instructing Noah to make the ark 300 cubits in length, 50 in breadth, and 30 in height. The cubit is by some stated to be 18 inches, and by others 22 inches. If the former, it would follow that the ark was, if instructions were followed, 450 feet long, 75 broad, and 45 high. A small place, indeed, to stow away pairs and sevens of all forms of animal life aside from those that live in water, with food enough to sustain them for over a year. The ark story, however, is not believed in as strongly as a few hundred years ago.

G. W. A.—What is the date of the oldest MS., or MSS. of the Old Testament, that is now extant? Ans. We cannot give much information on this subject. It is quite probable that there are no Old Testament manuscripts in existence older than the New. It is the fate of manuscripts to perish with the mutations of time. The Jewish sacred writings are no exception to this rule. The canon of the Old Testament is supposed to have been closed by Simon the Just, 292 B. C. The oldest translation of the Old Testament is the Septuagint and is claimed to have been put in Greek about 270 B. C. There is no probability that a copy of the original Septuagint is now in existence. It is the old state of things—only copies of copies.

Useful Recipes.

YORKSHIRE PUDDING.—One pint and a half of milk, seven tablespoonfuls of flour, three eggs, and a little salt; put the flour into a basin with the salt and sufficient milk to make it into a stiff, smooth batter; add the remainder of the milk and the eggs well beaten; beat all together and pour into a shallow tin which has been previously rubbed with butter; bake an hour, then place it under the meat for half an hour to catch a little of the gravy that flows from it; cut into small, square pieces, and serve on a hot folded napkin with the roast beef.

GATEAU DE RIZ.—Eight ounces rice, one quart milk, yolks of five eggs, peel of one large lemon, four ounces butter, four ounces sugar, bread crumbs; wash the rice well, put it into a farina-kettle with the milk and the lemon peel, grated; let it cook slowly till the rice is very tender and all the milk absorbed; if it becomes too dry add a little more milk; when quite cooked add the butter, sugar, and yolks of eggs; stir for one minute, remove it from the fire, and let it stand five minutes. Butter a plain mold or pan, thickly strew over the sides and bottom a thick layer of bread crumbs made by drying bread in the oven and then pounding it in a mortar; pour the rice into it, and bake in a moderate oven one-half hour; then turn it carefully out upon a flat dish; lay around it any kind of preserved fruit, and serve it with a boiled custard sauce.

TO BOIL RICE.—This is a Louisiana receipe and the only one I ever saw with which failure was impossible. Wash the rice well; put it on a quick fire with plenty of cold water; let it come to a boil, then pour off the water and add fresh cold water; do this a second time and then let it boil four or five minutes until the rice is tender, but not soft; then pour it into a colander and throw over it a quart of cold water in which you have dissolved one teaspoonful of salt; drain it thoroughly, and set the colander over a saucepan of boiling water to steam uncovered for 20 or 25 minutes; each grain will be separate and thoroughly cooked.

GRAHAM BREAD I.—First prepare a sponge according to the following receipe: One quart warm water, half yeast cake, two tablespoonfuls lard, two tablespoonfuls white sugar, one teaspoonful soda, one quart and pint wheat flour; melt the lard in the warm water, add the sugar, then the flour by degrees, stirring it smoothly; next comes the yeast (dissolved in a little warm water), lastly the soda; beat up hard for several minutes, and set to rise in a warm place over night; in the morning, add two quarts graham flour, two teaspoonfuls of salt, two handfuls of yellow Indian-meal, and one large cupful of molasses (not syrup); the dough should be very soft; knead it diligently and long; work the dough into a shapely ball, and set it to rise in a warm place; it should come up steadily until it trebles its original bulk and the surface cracks all over; knead again upon a floured board, put it in pans in a warm place, and set it to rise for an hour longer, and bake one hour and a half; will make two loaves.

GRAHAM BREAD. II.—Dissolve two tablespoonfuls of yeast in a pint of luke-warm water; add one quart wheat flour, (or one quart white Indian-meal); mix thoroughly and let stand in a warm place until light, when light add one quart luke-warm water in which dissolve one tablespoonful salt and one of sugar; mix in sufficient quantity graham flour to form soft dough (about four quarts); let rise, knead, and bake in moderate oven.

GRAHAM BISCUIT.—Three cupfuls graham flour, one cupful white flour, one teaspoonful soda, two of cream of tartar, rub the soda and cream of tartar into the flour, and sift all together before they are wet; then add one saltspoonful of salt; next, two tablespoonfuls of lard, rubbed into the prepared flour quickly and lightly; lastly, three cupfuls sweet milk, containing one tablespoonful of white sugar. Work the dough rapidly, as handling too much injures the biscuit. The dough should have a rough surface, and the biscuits be flaky. Roll out lightly, cut into cakes about half an inch thick, and bake in a quick oven.

TEA BISCUIT.—One quart of sifted flour, one heaping teaspoonful lard, one level teaspoonful salt; milk and water mixed, half each, about two-thirds of a pint; two teaspoonfuls Dooley yeast powder. Mix the flour and salt and powder together, then rub the lard well in until no lard can be seen; add the mixed milk and water, stirring all together with a spoon; knead until smooth, roll out about half an inch thick, cut with a cutter and bake in a quick oven.

POTATO PIE.—Peel and boil six good-sized potatoes; when quite soft drain and smash through a colander; stir to a cream one-fourth pound of butter and three-quarters of sugar; add the potatoes and beaten yolks of five eggs; beat the mixture until very light; flavor with one grated nutmeg, a wine-glassful of brandy, and one of wine; stir in the whites of the eggs, having whipped them to a stiff froth; line the pie-pans with a rich pastry, and bake it a very light brown; then fill them with the mixture and bake until the tops are quite brown; serve cold.

VEGETABLE SALMAGUNDI.—Take an equal quantity of carrots and turnips, cut them the size of almonds; peel a dozen small white onions, and put all in a saucepan with a lump of butter; let them brown gently; add a little gravy and some mushrooms, French peas, haricots, tops of cauliflower, salt and pepper, and a teaspoonful of sugar; let them all boil gently, and, just before serving, thicken the sauce with a little flour.

CHOCOLATE CREAM.—Two cupfuls of powdered sugar to half a cupful boiling water; put on the stove, boil ten minutes; grate a quarter of a square of Baker's chocolate; place this on the top of a steaming kettle; leave it there until soft; meanwhile take off the cream and beat it until perfectly white; roll into little round balls, and dip them in the melted chocolate; flavor with vanilla.

A Talk with the Evangelists.

In the following remarks I propose to investigate the claims which the Christian churches generally set up in favor of the direct and truthful testimony of the four evangelists in regard to the birth, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, whom they claim to be the Son of God. They also claim that the four Evangelists were inspired of God to tell the truth, and that their writings are God's holy word, spoken directly through them as perfect instruments in his hand for that purpose. If this be so, and if God cannot lie, he will of course make the statements of the same facts, in substance at least, just alike. I therefore propose to arrange Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John in a class before me, and catechise them in succession on this most important subject, for the purpose of having them show in a clear light the harmony of their assertions, as we find them in the various transactions, in regard to this all-important matter. Believing that that which God has written will stand the strictest test in regard to its harmony, or as a statute of truth, and cannot by any means be thrown into confusion, I approach my task in the hope that many contradictions which appear in the writings of the so-called evangelists may be explained away.

We are commanded in this book to try all things, and prove all things, and hold fast to that which is good; and that by so doing truth may the more freely abound, is the humble desire of the writer.

To more fully comprehend my design, the reader is now requested to imagine in his or her own mind that the four evangelists are arranged in a class to answer in turn the following questions, as they occur in the gospels (in substance at least, if not in their own words) that we may the more clearly note the harmony of their replies. We will, therefore, lay aside all further preliminaries, and proceed with the first question.

Q.—How many days before the passover did Jesus finish his sayings to the Jews and go to Bethany?

Matthew (xxvi, 2.)—Two days.

Mark (xiv, 1.)—Two days.

Luke being mute on the subject, may be presumed not to know.

John (xii, 1.)—Six days. [An error of four days.]

Q.—Was John the "Elias," which was to come?

Matthew (xi, 14.)—Jesus says John was the Elias which was to come.

John (i, 21.)—I am not Elias, neither that Prophet which was to come.

Q.—At what time did King Herod die?

Matthew (ii, 13-15.) — Jesus, when a young babe, was taken to Egypt by request of an angel, and kept there a short time, until the death of Herod; and Archelaus, his son, did reign in his father Herod's stead. (ii, 22.)—Then by the request of an angel his parents brought him back to the land of Israel.

Luke (xxiii, 7-8.)—Why! Herod was alive thirty-three years after that, and talked with Jesus on the day of his crucifixion.

Q.—Who was Jesus' father?

Matthew (i, 19-20.)—The angel claimed it was the Holy Ghost. But I said it was Joseph of the seed of David, and gave the lineage to prove it.

Luke (iii, 23.)—He was the son of Joseph. The "supposed" part is an interpolation to my writings, and enclosed in brackets in the older Bibles, and should be now. I never wrote that. Mary his mother (ii, 48.) says Joseph was his father, and she ought to know.

John (i, 45.)—He was the son of Joseph.

Q.—What were the facts about Jesus' riding into Jerusalem on an ass colt?

Matthew (xxi, 2.)—Jesus sent two disciples, saying unto them, "Go into the village over against you, and straightway ye shall find an ass tied, and a colt with her. Loose them and bring them unto me."

Mark (xi, 2.)—Jesus sent two disciples, and said unto them "Go your way into the village over against you, and as soon as ye be entered into it, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon never man sat; loose him and bring him." Here only one colt is mentioned.

Luke (xix, 30.) Says the same, stating that two disciples found one colt.

John (xii, 14.)—"And Jesus, when he had found a young ass, sat thereon, as it is written." [No sending of two disciples in this case, but Jesus found it himself. So we find that Matthew claims that there were two colts found by two disciples. Mark and Luke claim one colt found by two disciples, while John claims that Jesus found it himself.]

Q.—Where was the ointment put on Jesus? and by whom?

Matthew (xxvi, 7.)—It was poured on his head by a woman, as he sat at meat.

Mark says the same.

Luke (vii, 38.)—By a woman who was a sinner, who stood behind him, and anointed his feet while he sat at meat, and ceased not to kiss them from the time that he first came into the house.

John (xii, 3.)—It was Mary the sister of Lazarus and Martha. She put a pound of ointment on his feet, and wiped them with the hair of her head.

Well, John, this looks like a liberal application to a man's feet, when a half an ounce will anoint the whole body twice over. But inasmuch as we find the statement in the Bible we will let it pass, as "all things are possible with God." Now Matthew and Mark say it was poured on his head, while Luke and John say on his feet. Luke says she was a sinner, while John says it was no less than Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, who was one of the most loving and endeared friends which Jesus had while here on earth. If Victoria C. Woodhull should do the same thing now on any of her friends, it would be considered the most ridiculous and vulgar trick of her life.

Q.—What and how did Judas do when he betrayed Jesus?

Matthew (xxvi, 49.)—Forthwith he came to Jesus and said: "Hail master," and kissed him.

Mark (xiv, 45.)—He goeth straight to him and said: "Master, Master," and kissed him.

Luke (xxii, 48.)—He drew near to Jesus to kiss him, but Jesus said unto him "Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" [From Luke we must infer that he did not kiss him.]

John (xviii, 3-6.)—Judas with a band of men came with lanterns, torches, and weapons. And Jesus went forth, and said unto them: "Whom seek ye?" And they said, "Jesus of Nazareth." And Jesus said unto them, "I am he;" and as he said so, they [Judas being with them] went backward and fell to the ground. No kissing here, and it does not appear that Judas came forth from the multitude at all. But on the contrary he says that Judas stood with them, and they fell to the ground. From John's statement it was not necessary for Judas to identify him to the crowd by a kiss, for Jesus went forth and inquired who they were looking for, and told them himself that he was the man.

Q.—What did Jesus say first after he was betrayed?

Matthew (xxvi, 50.)—And Jesus said unto him, "Friend, wherefore art thou come?"

Mark (xiv, 48.)—And Jesus answered and said unto them, "Are ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and with staves to take me?"

Luke (xxii, 48.)—But Jesus said unto him, "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?"

John (xviii, 4-8.)—Jesus said, "Whom seek ye? I am he. If therefore ye seek me, let these go their way." [Here all have a different reply from Jesus.]

Q.—What was Jesus' first reply after the servant's ear was cut off?

Matthew (xxvi, 52.)—Then said Jesus unto him, "Put up thy sword again into its place, for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

Mark (xiv, 48.)—And Jesus answered and said unto them: "Are ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and with staves to take me?"

Luke (xxii, 51.)—And Jesus answered and said: "Suffer ye thus far," and touched his ear and healed him.

John (xviii, 11.)—Then said Jesus unto Peter: "Put up again thy sword into the sheath. The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" [Ah! God, how forgetful you are!]

Q.—Who was Jesus taken before first, after his arrest?

Matthew (xxvi, 57.)—Before Caiaphas the high priest

Mark (xiv, 53.)—They led him away to the high priest.

Luke (xxiii, 54.)—They first took him to the high priest's house.

John (xviii, 13-14.)—They led him to Annas, first, for Caiaphas was giving council to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people.

Q.—What did Judas do with the thirty pieces of silver?

Matthew (xxvii, 5.)—He cast down the thirty pieces of silver in the temple, and went and hanged himself.

Mark.—I have said nothing about it.

Luke in his silence is presumed to know nothing about this very important transaction, and the death of one of the twelve.

John shakes his head, says he never heard of this important transaction before, as he would have been sure to have recorded it.

Well, we will turn over to the Acts of the Apostles. In the first chapter and eighteenth verse, it tells us that Judas purchased a field with it, in which he fell headlong, and all his bowels gushed out. [Mark, Luke, and John are now seen whispering together, and saying it is curious they had never heard of this before.]

Q.—How did Judas come to his death?

Matthew (xxvii, 5.)—He went out and hung himself.

Mark, Luke, and John look surprised again, while I tell them it is recorded in Acts i, 18, that it was by falling in a field that he had just bought, and all his bowels gushed out. They don't see why he should have been speculating in land after he had hung himself. Matthew tries to explain to them by saying it may be a part of two stories.

Q.—What course did Jesus pursue in regard to answering questions to Pilate or the high priest? What did he say, or refuse to say? I want his answer precisely.

Matthew (xxvi, 64.)—The high priest had asked him if he was Christ the Son of God. And Jesus said unto him: "Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven."

Mark (xiv, 60-62.)—The high priest questioned him thoroughly. But he held his peace, and answered him nothing. Pilate asked him (xv, 2, 3) if he was King of the Jews. And Jesus answered him: "Thou sayest it. And the chief priest accused him of many things, but he answered nothing." Then Pilate asked him many questions, and yet Jesus answered him nothing, so that Pilate marveled.

Luke (xxii, 67-70.)—The chief priests asked him if he was the Christ? Jesus said unto them: "If I tell you, ye will not believe. And if I also ask you, ye will not answer me, nor let me go. Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God." (xxiii, 3.) Pilate then asked him if he was King of the Jews. And Jesus said: "Thou sayest it" (xxiii, 9.) Herod also questioned him, but he answered him nothing.

An Open Letter to Louis Lange.

FRIEND LANGE: As thee mentioned my name as that of a staunch materialist, and somewhat in contradistinction to the honored one of D. M. Bennett, I wish to say a few words in reply. Thee is entirely right in believing me to be a skeptic as regards all spirit-life. I have no faith in gods, angels, ghosts, fairies, or spirits of any sort. I believe not in dreams, signs, or omens, or in anything that is supernatural or contrary to nature's known laws. I have given the subject of Spiritualism a fair investigation as regards reading everything I could get hold of relating to it, visiting haunted houses, and investigating ghost stories. Have seen a little table-tipping and planchette-writing, but nothing that I did not believe might be the work of the performers themselves. They were doubtless honest, but self-deceived. Yet I do not say but that phenomena may take place in the presence of some mediums that are entirely unexplainable by known natural causes, or any process of reasoning which we have as yet arrived at.

It is somewhat remarkable that two of the best known editors of the best Infidel papers should differ upon this subject so greatly, as do Horace Seaver of The Investigator and D. M. Bennett of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Seaver has attended seances of all sorts for years, and has never seen one thing to convince him that the dead "still live." And Bennett, on the other hand, has investigated the subject in the same way, and feels that he has almost proof positive that life is continued indefinitely on through the ages. Both these men are honest, truthful, and reliable. Shall we commend the one and condemn the other because a fair investigation led them to such widely different conclusions—because two differently constituted minds could not see alike? Skeptic as I am, as regards spirit-life, I must say that I am glad D. M. Bennett is investigating the subject, and hope he will continue to do so, and continue laying his personal experience before his readers, even at the risk of an occasional bigoted cry of "Stop my paper" from men, who like S. Sturm of Memphis, are not Liberal enough to be willing to give all sides an equal chance. I hope some good Liberal will send Bennett two new subscribers for every one that "steps down and out" for such an illiberal reason as Mr. Sturm did. We do not want our pet paper to be overrun with accounts of ghosts and ghostly marvels, but a column or two a week no true truth seeker can reasonably object to. Let us unmask deceit and fraud wherever we can; but when a belief becomes as widespread and universal as Spiritualism has, it should be investigated thoroughly and if proven true be accepted, and if false let it be shown up as such, and facts given to prove it to be so. The old Christian mythology is playing out, and great multitudes are resorting to Spiritualism as a substitute. There are mysterious forces in nature which have not as yet been understood or explained, and these man is apt to relegate to the supernatural. And many real materialists, like our friend Bennett, weave around these forces a web of material philosophy which makes them seem almost reasonable and believable. And when the strong mind of some man-god which I have learned to lean upon, has succumbed to the seemingly incontrovertible evidence, and I have read their experiences and confessions, I have been ready to exclaim, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Spiritualist"! But a few turnings over of the question presents such an overwhelming array of doubts, absurdities, and inconsistencies, that I drop back again into the broad, straight, and beautiful way of "one life at a time." Thine for investigation,

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Spiritualistic Phenomena.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I meant no injustice or misrepresentation of your position in what I said in a late number of your paper. It seemed to me that your language was fairly open to the construction I put upon it, and I see that another of your friends took a similar view. But, unlike him, I do not consider a little difference of opinion a sufficient reason for crying "Stop my paper!" The fact that we do not wholly agree in our philosophy does not necessitate the raising of a Chinese wall between us, but is rather a reason for continued relations. If I did my thinking exactly in your groove, and you thought in mine, there would be little chance of my learning anything from your paper, provided that it reflected only your sentiments, but as that is not the case a temperate interchange of thought may not be unprofitable. I honor honest opinions frankly avowed, however foreign they may be to my own, far more than I can that narrow intolerance which cannot abide an idea that is not in consonance with the individual's preconceived opinions or prejudices.

I make no claim to have found the absolute truth in these matters, and if I did I could not say with Colonel Ingersoll, that I "have no respect for the man" who differs from me. When the Colonel said he had no respect for a man who believed there was a hell, he forgot the powerful influences of education and associations which have made some of the most amiable, charitable, and lovable people that we know of believers in an eternal hell.

I want to say, and I think your paper a good place to say it, that that kind of argument convinces no one, and that some of your correspondents would do well to read Mr. Frothingham's sermon on "The Gentleman," which you published a few weeks since, and which they have evidently overlooked. Criminations, recriminations, and bad blood generally, do but little to advance the truth, or make men better than they are. There may be some reason for your quarrel with the publisher of the Age of Reason, but I don't see why your correspondents so generally consider it their duty to abuse him. I did not think Mr. Payne such a formidable fellow when he was publishing the Duluth

Morning Call, a paper a size or two smaller than a lady's fan, but he is becoming famous, and you are helping to make him so.

As regards the question of supernaturalism, I don't know that I have much more to say. When you speak of spirits having, if I understand you, invisible yet material and palpable bodies and brains; possessing the powers of speech, physical force, and recollection of experience in this life, according to the phenomena you described in your article of March 16th, I confess that you are getting beyond my depth. I do not say that such existences are impossible, but that they are improbable and not in accordance with our present knowledge of the universe. And here I must object to your definition of my position—making me hold that the powers of the universe are limited and that "we in our present state of existence are the ultimate that the universe is capable of producing." If I in any sense limit the powers of the universe it is in this—that I cannot believe that nature works in eccentric ways, or by irregular methods; and when I see or hear of anything that is not in accordance with our ordinary experience and observation, but wholly at variance with them, I am inclined to seek some solution of the matter that will be in harmony with the known laws under which nature works rather than to attribute the unusual phenomena to some powers or existences in the universe of which we have no correlative knowledge. It is on this principle that I distrust Spiritualistic phenomena; and I will back Robert Heller against Mrs. Lord to call up spirits, or call them down, and if his spirits do not perform as astounding feats as hers, feats as difficult to account for through mortal agency, then you can take the stakes and I will devote myself to the study of Spiritualism.

I am inclined to the belief that there are or will be higher forms of life than ours; but I also think that if our race is connected with those higher forms of life it will be by regular gradations, and not by any sudden jump from our present state of dependence on a material body, subject to all the meanest functions of the brutes, to an ethereal state in which the intelligences we now possess are clothed in an invisible, impalpable, imponderable, yet material body. I do not pretend to understand or comprehend "the highest forms of life that the universe is capable of producing," nor to understand all the silent operations of nature; nor am I prepared to deny the existence of everything that I cannot "see with my own eyes, or comprehend with my own mind;" but when such things are presented, or alleged to be, and they are at variance with general human experience and observation, and subversive of the laws of force and matter with which we are acquainted, I take them cum grano salis and wait for more light. Reply to "Another one Disappointed."

MR. EDITOR: I have taken every number of THE TRUTH SEEKER thus far published, and though I like its tone, its make-up, and the spirit and ability of its articles generally, yet it has one feature that I like above every other: that is, it is not so egotistic as to call itself The Truth Speaker, The Voice of Truth, or anything of that kind, but it modestly comes before the world from week to week as a TRUTH SEEKER. It justifies the expectations reasonable people would build on such a name by giving both sides of every question an open field and a fair light. For proof of this read the articles it published from Rev. G. H. Humphrey, and the tedious ones from Rev. Cyrus Romulus R. Teed.

In order to carry out the programme implied in the name of truth seeker, I see you have admitted articles on each side of the great question of Spiritualism; probably a want of space has caused you to reject many more articles on this and other subjects than you have admitted.

You have learned ere this that it is out of the possibilities to conduct a paper so as to please every one. The particular point which I personally know pleased many of your intelligent readers, displeased at least one who thinks you should haul down the flag of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and run up that of "Marvel Hunter" in its stead. I hope you will not allow your paper to be deterred from searching for truth wherever found by the mutterings of a few, or even many dissatisfied ones who would frighten you with the bug-a-boo, "Marvel Hunter," simply because you happen, in your search, to get off of the ground which they may have staked off for you! Be assured the bigots are not all in the churches. You will find a few of them in the Spiritualistic and anti-Spiritualistic ranks, out of the Christian fold.

This disappointed one very kindly gives you and your readers to understand that it is utterly useless for you to investigate Spiritualism. Why should you examine it? Has he not "examined the Spiritualistic philosophy ever since the Fox family commenced their rappings and toe-snappings?" When you and your readers examine it, you imply either that Mr. Stebbins has not examined it, or that he is, like other men, fallible! Now, though he kindly suggests that he will not, for this offense, tell you to stop his paper, yet it is a terrible strain on his generosity to allow you and your readers to investigate a subject which he long since investigated, and decided that "it is no less absurd than the ghost fooleries and witch romances of old."

Now, I humbly ask Mr. Stebbins if he personally investigated the matter, and learned that the marvels in the family of John D. Fox were produced by a "toe-snapping" process? I have sat with two of these sisters on nearly a hundred occasions and know that the rappings were not produced by the toes. I have heard them on the floor, on the walls of the room, on the ceiling overhead, on tables, chairs, stoves, and other furniture. There are more than one thousand people, not five miles from the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who will bear testimony to having had similar sittings, with similar results. Must such testimony be excluded from a truth-seeking paper on the unsupported testimony of a man who has probably never in his life put himself in a way to get at the truth of the matter?

Next, Mr. Editor, you are accused of being "easily satisfied," because you say you have received proofs which to you "are satisfactory." I would ask, how does this man know that you were "easily satisfied?" Was he present on the various occasions when proofs came to you? Or can he, being absent, judge better of these proofs than you could when witnessing them? Why, this judging of your proofs and the amount of evidence which satisfied you, looks to me like a piece of impertinence seldom witnessed outside the Vatican!

After this, this disappointed one indirectly accuses you of making merchandise of the spirits' powers. Is this true? As much time as I have spent in New York, and in your office, I never before had an indication of it! but then, I am a Spiritualist—one of the merchants—have made my immense fortune out of Spiritualism, and it could not be expected that I would see it. "Spirits," are accused in the article under review, of having "done no good." Supposing that is true (and it is not) does that make Spiritualism false? Snakes and mosquitoes do but little good, but that is no proof that they do not exist, or that they cannot manifest their existence in a tangible way!

In reply to your inclination to believe that man exists after death, this writer admonishes you to "banish inclination, and rely entirely on facts." Very good. Now suppose, as in your case, the facts are so numerous, and all running in one direction, will not they incline over in the direction you are inclined. If I understand Webster, to incline is to lean or bend, now the facts have been such that they have compelled you to lean toward the spiritual hypothesis. I submit that it is in order for Mr. S. to present his counter facts, and thus incline you and other of us spiritual merchants in the other direction.

After having carefully read and re-read the fourth lecture of Prof. Lawrence in his "Comparative Anatomy of the Natural History of Man," I join with Mr. Stebbins in advising you to read it, and I tell you in advance, it says not one word about Spiritualism—not one word in explanation of its phenomena—not a word that would be new to you. I tell you more, there is hardly a thought in it that you yourself have not had and published. If you cannot get that volume and read it, Mr. Editor, let me advise you to read in its stead, "Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind," by D. M. Bennett. There you will find the same ideas as well expressed.

I am aware, Mr. Editor, that I have taken too much of your space, yet I have not said half I felt prompted to say. I have only one request to make, that is, let THE TRUTH SEEKER remain as it is, open to all sides of every question. You may lose a few dollars by it, but truth is worth more than dollars. MOSES HULL.

The Finance and Labor Question.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am glad your TRUTH SEEKER still lives, and I am glad to find in your columns a word from a woman on the money and labor question. True, I do not see things just as "Margaret" does; but I cannot agree with "Central New Yorker" in thinking that her queries and her objections to such a depreciated currency results from sympathy with the money-lender; a woman who can suggest an Oneida system, minus the peculiar sexual feature, is more advanced than to be in sympathy with the money-lender as such; it can be only as she thinks—that which is detrimental to him reacts upon the laborer. Margaret Chappellsmith sees that plenty of money is not going to free the laborer from his bondage, and she is right; it may lighten his burden for a time, but something more is needed to free him, and until he is freed from the control of capitalists, there can be no permanent peace.

In a true state of society, individuals can combine, cooperate, and exchange labor for labor, but only the great public, the people through their chosen agents will hire, pay wages, and the term used will be "salary," steady work and certain pay. No man, or set of men will hire or pay wages unless it is expected that something can be made off the labor of those hired. This is the rule, circumstances make the exceptions. Now the time must come when men must cease to live off the labor of their fellows, and the only way I can see in which this can be done is to give to individuals or combinations of individuals, the field of production, and to the public through its appointed agents, the business of exchange. We are told that the Jews, something over eighteen hundred years ago, crucified Christ, and we are further told that the poor, the needy, and the oppressed are Christ's representatives. Well, the Jew crucifies him to-day. I do not mean the literal Jew, though when we remember that Rothschild is a Jew, we might make it mean even that. But I mean the trading spirit. Men who trade upon public necessities for their own private benefit, and make fortunes thereby, are Jews, no matter of what nation born. When we have come to understand what fields of labor belong to the individual, and what to the public, so as to strike a proper balance between the two, the "people" will be rich, but no single individual will so tower above his fellows as to be counted specially so.

Mrs. Chappellsmith says "Money now waiting for use cannot find profitable employment." Why? I once heard a superintendent of a New England cotton mill say, that men would not invest money unless it was likely to bring them ten per cent profit; that I presume would be profitable employment for money, but what of the men?

Let us suppose a case. A man has $500,000 to invest; he puts up a mill, gets things in readiness, and employs five hundred men; but he must have ten per cent profit. To get this he must make enough over and above paying his hands, keeping machinery in repair, etc., to have $50,000 a the end of the year, and $50,000 divided between five hundred men gives $100 to each. Thus you see that every man must earn $100 over and above the cost of keeping the mill and machinery in repair than he gets, in order that the man's money shall receive ten cents on the dollar for being used. Suppose these men all represent families, then five hundred families are $100 poorer than they would have been had the husband and father received just what he earned, and one man has $50,000 more than he has earned, for his money has brought him ten per cent. To do that he must have the $50,000 over and above the pay for what time he has spent. But the five hundred men have less purchasing power by $100 each than they in justice should have, and so have not the power to buy as much of what is manufactured by just that sum. Shelves soon pile up, not enough sale to make the ten per cent unless wages are cut down, and this reduction only increases the difficulty, and all because money rates above men, because money must have profitable employment or be idle, even if men become tramps and women starve.

But I must illustrate this ten per cent and the power of trade in public necessities on one's own private account a little further.

An acquaintance of mine had learned a trade, and instead of working for others, set up in business on his own account. A building on a cross street near the Common in Boston had a front wide enough for two small stores or shops, one of which was occupied as a tailor's shop, and my friend hired the other with the whole of the back of the building (it being a little deeper and same width as both fronts) and also the cellar. These latter were used for warerooms and manufacturing purposes, and his half of the front for a salesroom, and what do you suppose he paid for the use of the space enclosed within these walls? $3,600 per year, $300 per month, $10 per day, Sundays and all. Now, why did this space, those rooms, or the use of them cost so much? Trade. The building stood where many people passed. He could sell enough of what he manufactured to keep two girls employed in the store. He allowed himself as much for a week's work (and he worked hard) as he paid in two days for the room; each girl had the price of another day for their week's work, and he hired help in the back shop to the amount of from $20 to $30 more. Thus some five persons by working hard received about the same as the landlord did, and he had only to collect the rents. Well, these five work hard the whole year, and at the end the man has made nothing, he has barely lived, supported his family, and paid his help and each of the five workers has earned twice what he received, employer with the others, otherwise the $3,600 rent money could not have been paid. Ten per cent and trade on one's own account tells the story. There is one chance in twenty, perhaps, that a trader may get rich, and for the sake of this chance, people crowd into cities; they climb high and dig deep so as to get as near to the best trade centres as possible this till a house and a few feet of land is counted worth ten, twenty, fifty times as much as the same sized house and land elsewhere.

On a house that in the country is counted worth $1,000 the ten per cent would be $100. Put the same house at one of the best centres of trade in a large city and the ground it stands on would be worth $50,000, or $5,000 for the ten per cent, and the house would be pulled down, and one that rose higher and sunk deeper built in its place, till the saloons under ground, stores on the first floor, offices on the second, third, and perhaps fourth floors, would make the rent-money count twice or three times $5,000, while every person employed therein would have to earn enough more than he received to pay his proportion of this sum. Trade and ten per cent are the two robbers of the workingman. Now, if production was in the hands of the individual, and exchange in the hands of the people, to be carried on by salaried agents, then no man could expect to get rich by trading; rents would be reasonable, and ten per cents would disappear. Houses that cost $1,000, when standing alone, would sell for that, and would not, because five hundred persons came and put up $1,000 houses all around it, be valued at $10,000.

But the subject enlarges, and I must close, first asking a few questions. Mrs. Chappellsmith talks of irredeemable money. If I have a ten-dollar legal tender greenback, and it will buy me food, clothes, pay stage or railroad fare, or be taken for anything else that I wish to purchase, all I want is enough of them. I do not care about getting gold for them, for if I did I could neither eat nor drink it, and must still exchange it for such things as I need, and every time I get what I need for a greenback, it is redeemed. This is the only kind of redemption the worker needs, and if the rich prefer gold it is only that they may enslave us with it, and as to foreign nations, whatever our Government will take at par, other nations will:

"We'll throttle gold and take away
Its terrible power for ill.
Then those who hold it sure must toil
Or may eat it, if they will."

It is time that we set the example to other nations of freeing our laborers from the thralldom of the capitalist. Eugene Macdonald says that education can make better times. Not unless we learn and apply the law of balance in the sphere of wealth; and, as to the population question, I know of but one legitimate method of regulating it, and that in strict accordance with the law of evolution, but it cannot be done till the multitudes are freed from the fight for bread—cannot be done so long as the laborer's faculties are all absorbed in the question as to how he shall get shelter, food, and clothing.

What the law is that leads to the natural result of fewer but better children I may give at another time, but first I want this article published and criticised so sharply that in replying I may be able to bring out the principle involved more fully. Yours for the truth. LOIS WAISBROOKER.

Is There a Future Life?

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I was very much pained when I read your remarks in answer to a letter from Mr. J. Newell, with reference to a future life, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 16th. I had always supposed you to be a Materialist in the fullest sense of that word—that there is nothing outside of, nor superior to, nature. You so state in your discussion with Mr. Teed, that outside of matter there is, and can be, nothing. And you further affirm that without perfect organization we cannot have mind—in other words that mind is the result of organized matter, all of which is scientifically true. There are some who believe the mind to be the spiritual or immortal part of man. But this is absurd, for, as you have stated, mind is a function of the brain, which is matter peculiarly organized; and where there is disease of the brain, there is corresponding disease of the mind. If mind were spirit it could not be affected by disease. In the case of idiots where there is imperfect organization, both of the physical and nervous system, we have little or no mind. And in the lower animals, mind is correspondingly developed with the brain. You have further stated that you do not believe in spirits, ghosts, hobgoblins, sprites, gnomes, spooks, genii, fairies, witches, etc., all of which, in my judgment, is very sensible in you; and after placing yourself on such materialistic grounds how can you be consistent when you say, in answer to Mr. Newell, that certain manifestations which you witnessed at Mrs. Lord's "could be accounted for only on the theory that there are existing intelligences capable, under favorable conditions, of making themselves known, and of conveying various tokens of their love and continued life, and which are invisible to our sight?" Is not this avowing the doctrine of Spiritualism? and is not Spiritualism only another phase of orthodox religion? The Bible teaches Spiritualism as much as it teaches anything. John, the Revelator, was in the spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind him a great voice, as of a trumpet. And he speaks of the seven spirits which were before the throne. They exorcised evil spirits in Bible times, and did a great many miraculous things through the influence of some presiding spirit or deity; and their ignorance even led them into crimes, such as the sacrificing of human beings, to appease the wrath of an imaginary god. Now, if you believe in Spiritualism you must accept the Bible as an inspired work, for it was just as probable then that some spirit influenced Moses and St. John to write the Pentateuch and the Revelation, as it is now that some spirit influences the writing upon the slate at a Spiritual seance; or that the spirit of some old Indian should take possession of the body of a "medium," leap about the floor, and prate in unintelligible Choctaw. You must renounce your belief that the universe possesses powers and forces adequate to the production of organized life; you must believe that man has a soul (whatever that may be), and that that soul is immortal; and, more, you must believe in the existence of a God, and when you go that far you might as well swallow the whole pill and believe He is the author of all things.

I am truly surprised that a man of your education, and the knowledge you possess of the science of biology, and the laws of the universe generally, should leave the sure and firm foundation of materialistic Atheism for the wasting sands of Spiritualism, and be led away and deceived by an ephemeral band of Spiritualistic jugglers. You have been such an inveterate hater of orthodox religion, and have labored so long and efficiently both with voice and pen to convince the world that it is a gigantic humbug, that how, in your senility, you should abandon reason and science for ghosts and spirits is truly passing strange. You have ridiculed the orthodox idea that God remained inactive for all time until six thousand years ago when the happy thought struck him of constructing worlds. I would like to ask you what the spirits have been doing since the creation up to the days of the Fox girls, the inception of Spiritualism? Why did they not revisit the earth during that long interval, and commune with loved ones as now? or was it because the "conditions" were not "favorable?" I would ask you, also, if all the "manifestations," materializations," and doings generally of modern Spiritualism have not been proven to be stupendous humbugs? The Davenport boys, you will remember, successfully deceived the people of this country and Europe for a time, but finally they were detected, when their show collapsed. Look at the Eddys, Katie King, Dr. Slade, and others, who have all met the same ignominious end—that of detection in practicing a base fraud.

And finally I would say that if you have concluded to go with the Spiritualists, THE TRUTH SEEKER is doomed—unless, perhaps, it may be supported by those who are in the same faith. I am sorry to say this, for it seems as though I could not give up THE TRUTH SEEKER. I look for its coming each week with as much anxiety as I would for the coming of a freighted ship from across the water; for indeed THE TRUTH SEEKER is freighted with scientific truths which the hungry, inquiring mind so much relishes. Reflect, Mr. Bennett, before you give up science for a creed. Do not let the history of the life of Robert Dale Owen be repeated by you. GEO. F. ROCKWELL, M. D.

Wolcottville, Ind., April 13, 1878.

REPLY.—1. We are truly sorry that our candid reply to Mr. J. Newell pained our good friend, and that our admission that there might be a possibility of our having a continued existence should make him unhappy. We fear he is more easily disturbed by the opinions of others than we are. We can contemplate his disbelief in these things without the slightest pang of pain or the least feeling of unhappiness. THE TRUTH SEEKER probably visits about an equal number of Materialists and Spiritualists, and, so far as we are able to judge, we feel as much of a fraternal feeling for one class as for the other; one has as much of our love as the other. We have many warm friends in each class, and we hope this may continue many years yet. While neither class may exactly claim us as one of themselves, we hope both may continue to take interest enough in us to not discard us and cry out, Stop that paper!

2. We are "a Materialist in the fullest sense of the word," and we never expect to be anything else. We believe that matter and its inherent forces constitute all that is, and without matter there can be no existence. And we think, too, that men do not yet fully know all the forms and conditions that matter is capable of entering into. From the granite rock up through soils, vegetation, water, atmosphere, and gases, to the ether that fills inter-planetary and inter-stellar space there are many grades or degrees; and we recognize the possibility of there being as many grades or degrees in matter above the ether as below it. Our eyes, our nerves, and all our senses combined are unable to take cognizance of the many forms of substance which we have good reason to believe have an existence. Of the finer forces, called imponderables, which belong to the universe, and hence to matter, as yet very little is understood, even by the most learned scientists; and that field within the next hundred years will undoubtedly be more extensively explored than ever before. Those who believe and accept only what they can see, feel, weigh, and handle really accept only half, or less than half, of real existence. One half of the universe that can be weighed and tested is said to be invisible to the eye and almost imperceptible to our physical senses, and still it exists as really as the other half. When the imponderable realm is investigated, we know not where the stop will be made. Everything connected with visible nature is susceptible of being converted into an invisible gas; and that all we now see once occupied the invisible form there can be but little doubt. The universe possesses vast powers and possibilities but yet little understood by the most astute and learned.

3. We think most decidedly that mind is the result of organization, and that there can be no mind where there is no organization to produce it. This fundamental fact we have at all times had in view when we have come to the conclusions which we entertain. When we have, from time to time, running through an experience of a third of a century, received proofs that, to our weak mind, were satisfactory that intelligences do exist, we have concluded that those intelligences or minds are the result of organizations invisible and insensible to our cruder perceptions—that every mind or intelligence must have an organized brain and a real, bona fide body to produce it. We do not believe in elementary minds, that exist eternally without being produced by an organization. Of course good organizations must produce good minds, and vice versa. We do not believe that mind is spirit, but that it is possible for spirit to exist in a real, material, but invisible form, capable of evolving and producing mind, and on precisely the same principle that our cruder physical bodies produce mind.

4. If in the economy of the universe it is the destiny not of humanity alone, but of all organized forms of life, to have a second, third, and other phases of existence, there is nothing supernatural about it. It is all a part of the great system of nature but yet partially understood. Neither has it any connection with orthodoxy or with the fables, crudities, and absurdities of the Bible. Of course the Bible recognizes and teaches the existence of spirits; but what of it? It also recognizes the existence of men and animals; shall we therefore set them aside and declare these do not exist because the Bible says they do? The Bible possesses no power to convert an actuality into nihility. If spirit-life is a reality it is an outgrowth of this form of existence, the same as this form is the outgrowth of fœtal life, and fœtal life of the ovum or germ life—all is one grand, continuous, material, universal system. There is but one universe, and it embraces all forms of matter, all forms of force, and all forms of life, and where it all ends, or what its limits are, no man knows or can know. We are under no obligation to accept the Bible as a book inspired by a personal God because we accept the theory that this is a rudimental form of life and that the ultimate succeeds it. There is no necessary connection between the two. We believe in no God save the universe, and hence we are under no necessity of accepting the silly tales about the Jewish Jehovah.

5. Our friend is very wrong when he says we must "renounce the belief that the universe possesses powers and forces adequate to the production of organized life." We believe this quite as firmly as himself, and we go still farther and accord to the universe far more power than he does. We have no necessity for man-made gods and we cannot believe in them. The universe, as we said, is all the God we accept. It is the Most High, the All in All, the author and source of all things and all existences, but we do not, we repeat, circumscribe its powers to the extent our friend does.

6. The Doctor need not grieve nor be surprised that we have left the firm foundation of materialistic Atheism for we have not done so and there is not the slightest indication that we ever will. We think ourselves quite as much of a Materialist as himself, and quite as much an unbeliever in a personal creative God. We are happy to inform him that we still stand on the same firm foundation of Materialism that sustained us so many years. Because we have conceded to the universe more powers than our friend, it does not follow that we have stepped off the right foundation.

7. We are no more a lover of orthodoxy, ecclesiasticism, theology, and supernaturalism, than we have ever been. We believe in neither of them. If Spiritualism is a fact it is perfectly independent of all these. It is just as natural and just as free from miracle and supernaturalism as any other phenomenon in nature. It is simply a branch of the great universal economy. And it must be confessed that if the universe is capable of continuing our existence it is the grander and more worthy of respect for that fact.

8. There are natural phenomena taking place every day as marvelous as would be a continuation of our existence by the production, while living in this life, of another or counter-organization with head, brain, body, and nerves of the higher, subtler, and less perishable forms of matter, and which will be able to set up business for itself when disconnected from the rudimentary body, and continue the process of living and thinking for hundreds and thousands of years. We of course do not know that this is possible, and our great offense is admitting the bare possibility of such a state of things. Life of all kinds is a mystery, whether vegetable or animal, embryonic or perfected, and it is not easy to explain how it takes place and how its different phases are perpetuated. And there are new laws and new phenomena yearly being brought to our knowledge which were before unknown to us. Among these may be mentioned the application of steam to the engine and machinery, the electric telegraph, the utilization of electricity as a motive power and for the production of light, photography, the telephone, the phonograph, and other discoveries and inventions. Before the discovery of these phenomena a description of any of them would have been hooted at and denounced as an impossibility. If, fifty years ago any man had advocated the possibility of messages being sent from New York to San Francisco in three seconds of time, or of being conveyed in the same space of time from Europe to America, under the Atlantic Ocean, no one would have believed it. Until men become familiar with a certain line of facts they pronounce them utter impossibilities, and the few who first accept them have often been denounced as fools. Because Copernicus was repeatedly assured that the world was flat and stationary, and that the sun moved around it, it made no difference with the facts, and by pushing his investigations, he succeeded in convincing himself of the rotundity, and diurnal motion of the earth, and though the truth was slowly confessed by others, hundreds of millions of intelligent people now stand ready to acknowledge the great fact. Although Columbus was repeatedly told that no land was to be found by sailing westward, and that his ship even could not proceed a great distance in that direction, nor return if it even were possible to make the advance, it made no difference with the facts in the case; and by making the grand experiment his bravery and his labors were rewarded by the discovery of a new world, upon which hundreds of millions of men and women have since lived and died. Unproved facts have again and again been denounced as impossible, which when demonstrated everybody is willing to accept as true. Because a fact or a philosophy is denounced as untrue, it does not follow that it is so.

9. The assent on our part that a continued existence may be possible does not rest upon the three seances of Mrs. Maud Lord's that we have attended, but quite as much upon what we have witnessed in private circles and in our own family, where we were confident there were no chances for fraud or collusion, as well as recitals we have listened to from tried and true friends—people of intelligence and truth, who we were positive had no wish to mislead us. If, after witnessing these things for more than a generation, we come to the conclusion that there is a singular class of phenomena, not dependent upon fraud or deception, that do take place under certain circumstances, we hope our skeptical friends who have had no opportunity to witness the same will not think us quite a fool and that our efforts in the direction of mental liberty ought to go for naught. We cannot help thinking that there are many among our doubting friends who, if they had witnessed precisely what we have witnessed, would arrive at similar conclusions.

10. We do not seek to defend any of the frauds that have been committed by professional mediums. Doubtless many frauds have been committed. Private seances are usually more satisfactory than public ones, and afford better opportunities for investigation. We feel sure that the cry of fraud will not answer for an argument to meet all the phenomena that have taken place. We do not say they are produced by spirits, but we do say, we have received numerous proofs of existing intelligences that seem to have no connection with visible organizations. Where there is intelligence we think there must be an organization to produce it, and the spirit theory has seemed to cover the facts better than anything else that has been presented to us. Scientific investigation may prove that we are mistaken. When we learn that such is the case, we shall very readily abandon our present views. But if we cannot see cause to do so before that, we hope our materialistic friend will try to bear with us and recognize the good intentions that prompt us to do what we do.

11. We do not pretend to explain why spirits do not accomplish more than has been accomplished. The difficulties under which communication is kept up between this state of existence and the hypothetical one may be greater than we are able to understand. Our knowledge in this direction is limited, although we have been a partial believer—about the same as at present—the better part of our life. We shall leave somebody else to answer the hard questions.

12. We have not given up science for a creed. We have not decided to go with the Spiritualists any more than with the Materialists. We hope to go with both, for we affiliate and readily harmonize with both. Many from the ranks of both are our personal friends for whom we entertain the highest respect. We have not aimed to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a Spiritual paper, nor do we intend to. We are not troubling ourselves about a future life and do not propose to, but to give this life and what will make it better our undivided attention. If we arrive at the highest degree of perfection here which we are capable of attaining to, and spend our time in the most profitable and useful manner, we feel sure that if there is a continued existence we shall be in good condition to enter upon it. Our chief motto is: Let us do the best we can in this life, here and now, and attend to the other when we reach it and can know more about it. If feeling this way—if accepting so much of the Spiritual philosophy—if exercising the freedom and candor to answer direct questions when propounded to us is going to "doom" THE TRUTH SEEKER, then "doomed" it is. If even a baker's dozen of our readers should relinquish the paper because of our views we do not see how that could change them. We cannot change our mind to order. It is not within our power, even, to change our views as we ourselves may wish. They are governed by evidence and evidence alone.

We shall endeavor to give our readers a good and valuable paper filled with sound arguments and scientific facts calculated to benefit our fellow-beings while on their life-journey, and we hope there will continue to be a disposition evinced to sustain us in this effort; but if there are those who conscientiously feel that they ought to cease reading these pages and to withdraw their support because we are compelled to think as we do and have the frankness to tell what we think, and if in consequence the light of THE TRUTH SEEKER is forever extinguished, we shall try to feel as reconciled as possible under the circumstances. We are certain, however, that there are many Materialists who are not bigoted and who can tolerate a well-meaning person who differs in a slight degree from themselves. To such we look for support in the work we are prosecuting according to the best ability we possess.

Now, kind friends, please "give us a rest" for a while on the subject of spirits and a future life and let us all bestow the best attention we can to the more urgent affairs of this.

Comstock's Annual Report.

The Fourth Annual Report of the Secretary of "The Society for the Suppression of Vice," for 1878, has been out some little time. On the cover of the pamphlet is the favorite device of the society—and which they use as a coat of arms—in which an unfortunate handcuffed victim is, by a minion of the law, being thrust into a dungeon, while Saint Anthony is making a bonfire of books and pamphlets, supposed to be TRUTH SEEKERS, Open Letters, scientific tracts on Marsupials, etc. One can easily imagine that around the benign but badly-scarred face of the good Anthony, like his illustrious predecessor Torquemada of the fifteenth century, hovers a wish that he could thrust the victim in the flames, as well as his books.

On page 7 is found this very kind mention of Freethought publications, which is in the same vein with the remarks of the president of the society, Samuel Colgate, at their last meeting, when he gave it as his opinion that Freethought publications ought to be suppressed. But to the extract: "Another class of publications, issued by Freelovers and Freethinkers, is in a fair way of being stamped out. The public generally can scarcely be aware of the extent that blasphemy and filth commingled have found vent through these varied channels. Under a plausible pretense men who raise a howl about 'free press,' 'free speech,' etc., ruthlessly trample under foot the most sacred things, breaking down the altars of religion, bursting asunder the ties of home, and seeking to overthrow every social restraint." Thus it will be seen that Freethinkers and Freelovers are to be "stamped out," and their publications burned or otherwise suppressed.

On page 8 a wail is offered up about the slackness of prosecution in our State courts in this city. The statement is made that during the year 1877 forty-five arrests were made, upon which thirty-nine indictments were found, but that in all those cases not a single trial was had. This was, indeed, a bad state of things, and does not argue promisingly for the funds with which to replenish Comstock's exchequer, when it is remembered that half the fines go to the informer.

At the close of the report, on page 14, the worthy Secretary pays the following tribute to his not less worthy accomplice, who by decoying intrigues and the meanest kind of misrepresentations and inveigling under false pretences and the basest subterfuges induces well-meaning but ill-informed persons to commit a crime that will allow his chief to arrest them and thrust them into prison, and which has several times been described in these columns. Thus says Anthony: "Honorable mention should be made of our assistant, Joseph A. Britton, who has rendered valuable service." After returning thanks to three members of the legal profession for the share they have performed in the delectable business, he deigns to give thanks also to God for the part he performed, thus: "More than all should we acknowledge the constant care and special blessing of Almighty God. When the way has seemed hedged up, clouds hung darkly over us, and it seemed as though our Agent [Anthony, of course] stood alone against the powers of evil, God has led, protected, and given us the victory. To His name be the praise. ANTHONY COMSTOCK."

Thus it will be seen that the efficient members of the firm, who have done most of the work of suppressing vice, are Joseph A. Britton, Esq., His Holiness, Anthony Comstock, and Almighty God. Here is a trio worthy of a worthy cause. We have heard before of God's getting into bad company, but we do not remember of his ever before forming quite so bad a partnership as this—Britton, Comstock, & God.

Before Congress.

The petition asking for the repeal or modification of what are known as the Comstock obscenity laws are now being considered. Effective arguments have been made before the House Committee by J. B. Wolff, A. E. Giles, and Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr; and Col. R. G. Ingersoll is expected to address the Senate Committee on the subject. Heavy prejudices are of course to be encountered. The Christian influence is to be met with in Congress as active as anywhere else. Comstock is on hand with some of his specialties in the curiosity line; and he does not take pains to conceal his hatred for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor. He told the gentlemen of the committee, on Saturday last, that we were publishing a most villainous and blasphemous sheet, and that it ought to be suppressed. If there is a devil and Anthony hates him half as bad as he does us, and if his getting into heaven depends upon his hatred of the devil, we think he can calculate that his calling and election is sure. But if he does go to heaven and there is but one apartment there, we wish it distinctly understood, that we do not intend to register our name at that hotel.

Love-Letters.

It is indeed a sad condition in which the portly and venerable Bishop McCoskry, of Michigan, finds himself placed. At the advanced age of seventy-four years, an honorable career of half a century is turned to disgrace by six or seven letters which he was foolish enough to write to pretty little Miss Fannie Richards (now Mrs. Bannister) two or three years ago. It is true the letters were rather affectionate, to be written by such a saintly personage to one so young, but it would doubtless have been far better for all parties concerned had they not been suffered to come to the eyes of the public. It does not appear that the young lady was basely or maliciously false to the bishop by making herself busy in showing his letters around, but by a careless accident they seem to have fallen into the possession of another lover. It is a dangerous business for a doting old man to write soft and silly letters to any lady, for he knows not, though they are designed for the eyes of but a single person, how many may be invited to peruse them. Witness the grief of the old bishop from this cause. He was obliged to resign the honorable position he held, with the promise to spend the remainder of his life in Europe, in exile and retired disgrace. Poor Beecher had lots of trouble about the letters he wrote. The Newell divorce case, now progressing in our courts, is bringing to light another batch of ridiculous love-letters, written by another old man. They may serve to amuse for an hour a giddy public, but it would have been far better to consign them to the flames. Were we to give advice to men of age, it would be: WRITE NO LOVE-LETTERS.

Young Folks' Series.

TWO LITTLE RED MITTENS.—Realizing the importance of affording a suitable class of reading for the little folks—a class free from the taint of priestcraft and superstition—which will be not only entertaining but instructive and teach a good moral, we have decided to bring out as our means and opportunity may serve such a series of Radical juvenile works as are demanded. We hereby announce No. 1 of the series—"Two Little Red Mittens"—by Jennie Butler Browne. It is a pleasing and instructive story, and just suited for children. It is equally suited for lyceums or families. Every family that has children ought to have a copy. Give the little ones something that will engage their attention, something that will impart information and will not instill into their minds a particle of superstition.

THE cable brings the intelligence that a large number of the High Church party of the Church of England, including bishops, rectors, curates, deacons, etc., and estimated as high as three millions of people, are about to secede from Protestantism to the Catholic Church, and conditions and preliminaries are said to have already been agreed upon. If this is true it will weaken the English Church very materially. The change, however, is not very great after all. It is merely a change of leaders, the dogmas and the system of government being much the same. Perhaps it will only hasten the day when the grand struggle is to take place between Romanism on the one hand and Radicalism on the other, and when there will be but few occupying middle or Protestant ground.

A LIBERAL LECTURE ON THE BOOK OF ESTHER. By Jasper Griggs.—The author of this pamphlet of twenty-five pages has, for reasons which he states, brought out this rather obscure book in its true light in a sharp and clear manner. In the appendix he cites numerous historical facts concerning the cruel torture and deaths which occurred in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries in our own and other countries, which were instigated and commanded by Protestant inquisitors; which cruelties he clearly shows to be an outgrowth of the Bible teachings and examples by the chosen of God, who is portrayed as gloating over the annihilation of his enemies. Published by the Independent Tract Society, Worcester, Mass., 1877. For sale at this office. Price 10 cepts.

WE have received from a correspondent an account of the formation, by the ladies, of a Liberal society, in connection with the Farmers Club of Atwater, Ohio, which we think an example for farmers' wives and daughters in other towns. This society is called the Atwater and Randolph Domestic League. It has resolved to discuss in a formal and friendly manner any important subject which may arise. They give in their resolutions, which we have not room to publish, free expression to their condemnation of the Comstock system of suppressing vice, believing it can be more readily eradicated by proper training and education of the morals of the young.

THE SALT-EATING HABIT: Its Effect on the Animal Organism in Health and Disease. A Contribution, as one of a Series, toward the Study of the Rational Food of Man. By Richard F. Colburn. This is a neat pamphlet of thirty pages, of the character indicated. The work appears to us to be the result of careful thought, observation, and experiment. Published by Austin Jackson & Co., Dansville, N. Y.

IT IS hoped that all friends who feel able and disposed to contribute to the fund to aid in the repeal or modification of what are known as the "odious Comstock laws," will not fail to remit such amounts to Maj. J. Weed Corey, Washington, D. C. A correct account will be kept of the sums donated, as well as for the purposes for which used, and a statement of the same will probably be published in these columns.

THE Eighth Annual Convention of the American Labor Reform League will be held in Masonic Hall, 13th St., New York, Sunday and Monday, May 5th and 6th. Three sessions each day. J. K. Ingalls, R. W. Hume, E. H. Heywood, S. Mira Hall, Wm. Hanson, Geo. W. Madox-Edward Palmer, and other speakers expected. The Monday forenoon session will be devoted to the American Anti-Usury Society.

MOSES HULL and Mattie Sawyer are holding Sunday evening meetings at the Harvard Rooms, on Sixth avenue between Forty-second and Forty-third streets. They are stopping at 101 East Twenty-fifth street, where they will be glad to see their friends. They can also be addressed as above.

B. F. UNDERWOOD lectured at Kirksville, Mo., from April 16th to the 21st; at Warsaw, Mo., from April 23d to the 25th; and will speak at Independence, Kansas, from the 28th to the 30th; Iowa City, Iowa, May 1st, 2d, and 3d.

SOMETHING more than a year ago Mr. Markee, the husband of the medium Mrs. Markee, was fined $50 for holding spiritual seances in Rochester, N. Y., without taking out a license as a showman. The case was appealed, and we are informed that the Supreme Court, at general term recently, reversed the judgment, with costs. Besides refunding the $50, the city has a bill of costs to pay, in consequence of the effort of certain city officials and others to suppress spirit manifestations.—Banner of Light.

THE SIZE OF THE GLOBE.—Its size has been determined, I have no doubt, to within a very few miles, in what appears to us now a very simple manner. In the first place, every section of the earth is bounded approximately by a circle, and mathematicians divide all circles into 360 degrees. Hence, if we can measure accurately the 1-360 part of this great circle, and if, when we have got that measure out into miles, we multiply it by 360, we get the circumference of the earth, that is to say, the whole distance round it. Then by dividing this result by something a little over 3 (3.1416, the ratio of the circumference of the circle to its diameter) we find out how far it is from one side of the earth to the other. This gives us the diameter of the earth. As a result of a long series of observations, it has been found that a degree measures as near as possible on the average 69½ miles. It can be stated in inches, but it is near enough for me to give as a first statement of result that it is about 69½ miles; and if you take the trouble to multiply 69½ miles, the average length of one degree, by 360 degrees, the number of degrees that there are all around the earth, you will find that the circumference is something like 25,000 miles, and therefore that the diameter of the earth is something like 8,000 miles. Mark well the words "on the average." In truth, the earth is flattened at the poles, so that the length of the degree varies from the pole to the equator; and hence the diameter in the equatorial plane is in excess of the diameter from pole to pole. These two diameters, expressed in feet, are as follows: Equatorial, 41,848,380; polar, 41,708,710.—J. Norman Lockyer, in Good Words.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER IX.

RELICS.

The House of Relics.—Slaughter of Egyptian Horses.—Description of Jacob's Ladder.—The Death of Judas.—Row in the House of Relics.

1. And in the narrow path the beast had erected a certain house called the House of Relics, and the house was built of parchment, and its foundation was of a certain soft substance called hard-lying.

2. And within the house were many curious things, and many relics of former and famous pilgrims; and of ancient and renowned guides.

3. And the name of one of the guides who showed the relics was Paternosterrow.

4. And Simon was near to the house, and Paternosterrow stood at the door with a drum, and drummed furiously, lest any of the pilgrims should go by without coming in.

5. And Simon gave the guide money, and went in.

6. And the guide showed him the wonders of the place; and while they were looking there came into the house many other pilgrims, and the man whose name was Blunt.

7. And the guide led Simon and the others towards the skeleton of an ass; and he said unto them, This is the ass of the prophet Balaam, which saw an angel.

8. And one of the pilgrims said, How wonderful it was that the ass, and not the prophet, should see the angel.

9. But Blunt answered and said, Oh fool, knowest thou not that the angels have ever shown themselves to asses, and to no other creature?

10. And the guide said unto the pilgrims, Heed him not; he is a scoffer. And they passed on. And the guide showed them a vessel, saying, Herein is some of the thick darkness of Egypt. And they looked in and saw nothing.

11. And Simon said, I see nothing. And the guide answered, saying, Nay, my son, how canst thou see anything, seeing the Egyptian darkness covereth all up? And they were all satisfied, and went on.

12. And the guide showed them a fowl, saying, This is one of the quails on which the Israelites fed.

13. And Simon said, 'Tis somewhat like a goose.

14. And Blunt answered, Yea, very like a goose; and there are many such hereabouts.

15. And Simon seeing a certain dishonorable utensil near by, cried out, saying, Who hath dared to bring that thing here? But the guide, smiling, bid him hold his peace, saying, Thou mistaketh it, my son; that is the cup which Rabshakeh sent to Hezekiah to drink out of; 'tis one of our greatest treasures.

16. Methinks, said Simon unto one of the pilgrims, this thing should be a grindstone. And he pointed towards a certain round stone near by. Yea, replied the other, verily, I think it is.

17. Nay, said the guide, 'tis one of the hailstones which killed the Egyptian horses.

18. But, said Simon, my guide-book telleth me they were killed by a murrain.

19. Nay, said another, were they not all drowned in the Red Sea?

20. Foolish children that ye are, said the guide, they were thrice killed. Think ye that our great and mighty king is not able to kill a dead horse? And they were confounded and passed on.

21. And the guide showed them the skeleton of King Ahaziah, and said, This is he who, by the unspeakable richness of our king's mercy, was two years older than the father who begat him.

22. And Simon was amazed, and opened wide his eyes, and his ears, and his mouth, and said, Nay my brother, how could that be? Surely a father must be older than his son.

23. And the guide answered, saying, Verily, I tell thee, nothing is impossible with our king. Is not our king's son of the age of his father? And if a son can be of the age of his father, why not two years older? Hast thou not read the story in thy guide-book?

24. And Simon answered, saying, Nay, if it is in my guide-book I verily believe it; and he passed on, gulping vehemently in his throat.

25. And Simon said unto the guide, What is this tied up in this napkin?

26. And the guide answered and said, Ah, my son, that is the greatest of all our wonders; 'tis the hole through which Korah, Dathan, and Abiram fell; and the napkin is never undone lest it should be lost. And the pilgrims passed on gulping.

27. And the guide showed them a certain ladder, which he called the ladder of Jacob; and he said unto them, This is the ladder whereon the angels journeyed to and fro—even from the earth to the skies.

28. And Simon said, How might that be, seeing the ladder is no more than a league from the top to the bottom?

29. And the guide answered, saying, Nay, my son, it is easy enough: they did but erect the ladder in the air, and when they had mounted to the top thereof they turned it the contrary end upwards, so that what was formerly the bottom was become the top; and when they had again ascended to the top they did as before. And the pilgrims were all satisfied, and more, and went on.

30. And the guide showed them divers bears called Elisha's bears, and there were betwixt two and three of them; and the guide said, These are they which chewed the naughty children. And he showed them the children within the bears, and the hair of Elisha's head also.

31. And Simon said, Verily, methought Elisha had been bald.

32. And the guide answered and said, Yea, my son, he was bald; and this is the hair which was not upon his head. And the pilgrims passed on choking.

33. And the guide took them up into a chamber that was built upon the house, and the chamber was more newly built than the house, and in it also were relics.

34. And the guide showed them some napkins of the infant Emanuel, and the pilgrims smelled at them devoutly, and passed on.

35. And he showed them one of the fishes that had fed a thousand men.

36. And Simon said, Verily, 'tis somewhat like unto a whale. And the man Blunt answered saying, Yea, very like a whale.

37. And the guide showed them a rope, saying, this is the rope wherewith Judas hanged himself.

38. And Simon said, Nay, my brother, he hanged not himself, but rather fell down and his bowels gushed out.

39. But another said, Nay, of a truth he hanged himself. And Simon and he disputed about the matter, and grew angry.

40. And the guide spake unto them, saying, Why wrangle ye thus, oh ye of little faith? Verily the man hanged himself, and his bowels gushed out also. See ye not the rope is of hay? And the man having hanged himself therewith on a very high tree, his ass, being an hungered, did devour the rope, and it brake, and the man fell down headlong and his bowels gushed out.

41. But, said Simon, if the tree was very high, how came the ass to reach the rope, so that it could devour it.

42. And the guide was exceedingly wroth at the question, and refused to show any more of the wonders of the place.

43. And I, Philo Aletheia, saw that there were certain portions of the chamber, and of the house also, that were not visited save and except by such as came in by the gate called Katholikos; and in these portions there were very great abundance of relics, but they were accounted as of no account by all save those that came up by the gate Katholikos.

44. And in this part of the chamber was one of the guides belonging to the gate called Katholikos; and he would have shown the pilgrims the skeleton of a virgin and her children, but the guide called Paternosterrow came up, and forbade the pilgrims, and derided the virgin.

45. And the other guide grew very angry thereat, and they fell together by the ears and fisted it valiantly. And the fight grew fierce, and the pilgrims joined in the fray.

46. And in the fight the decayed virgin came woefully to grief.

47. And when the man Blunt perceived that the pilgrims and the guides were fighting together, he gat himself hastily down from the chamber, and took the napkin in which the hole was wrapped up, and he unfastened the napkin, and let out the hole.

48. And immediately there was as it were the sound of a mighty rushing wind, and the hole swallowed up everything in the house, and the chamber, and the relics, and the pilgrims, and the guides, and everything whether small or great, went down quick into the pit.

49. But the hair that was not upon Elisha's head stuck in the hole's throat, and it could not by any means swallow the hair; and when the hole perceived this, it gave back what it had already swallowed.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE DESTINY OF THE ANCIENTS.—The ancients believed that at the point where man's rule and power over the forces of the world ended, there destiny began; and if a ship was wrecked at sea, or if a country was devastated by an epidemic, as such catastrophes were clearly not brought about by man's wishes or desires, they thought that they could only be caused by some mysterious superhuman power who meddled with, and ruled over, human affairs. We cannot certainly be surprised that such should have been the views and opinions of persons who were ignorant of the fact that a storm or an epidemic is but a natural effect resulting from natural causes, and that its occurence is governed by laws as certain and invariable as that of gravitation. In a country where there was supposed to be gods of the sea and gods of the woods, rulers of the wind and deities of the river, there manifestly was but little room in which man's free-will could assert itself. But now, since we know that we have in truth only to contend with natural forces, and those, too, of a constant and uniform character, we can by studying their laws render them subservient to our wishes, and make them become our ministers instead of allowing them to be our masters. The electric current, which in the form of lightning was once the fiery sword of an angry deity, has now become the willing messenger of man, and carries his commands to the uttermost parts of the earth. Thus one of the most marvelous and fearful instruments of destiny, as it appeared to the inhabitants of Rome and Athens some twenty centuries ago, has in these latter days lost much of its terrible character; and, to the great disgust of Jupiter and the other lords of Olympus, little Mr. Dilettante at his scientific seances can give you as much lightning as you wish. The fancy and imagination are more powerful, and less subject to the dictates of reason, in the night than they are in the daytime; the land of darkness may be considered as their proper and natural habitat; and, like the bats, they are most busy when the sun has left us. Ignorance is a kind of darkness, and when mortals had not the remotest idea of what was the cause or nature of an eclipse, and when they knew "less than nothing" about electricity, it is hardly a matter to be wondered at that, as knowledge had omitted to furnish the universe for them with facts and realities, they allowed imagination to supply the deficiency with the first fictions and fancies that presented themselves. The world was to them a tabula rasa, and they wrote on it whatever nonsense they thought fit.—Tinsley's Magazine.

Communications.

Mr. Macdonald and Labor.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 16, 1878, Mr. Macdonald "rises to explain," to defend his former article against the criticisms of Mr. Cumming. Now, while I agree with most of what Mr. Macdonald says in relation to emigration and labor, and what Mr. Cumming said about an increase of a circulating medium, yet I think Mr. Macdonald, especially, sees but one side of the trouble. We read and hear much about inflation, contraction, resuming specie payments, remonetization of silver, the "rag baby," keeping the nation's faith, repudiation, etc., etc., while the real, vital question is but seldom spoken of. Mr. Macdonald says it makes but "a temporary difference" whether there be one million or a million millions of dollars in circulation in a nation. If this is his honest opinion, I must say that, in my opinion, he does not know anything about national finances. But I will be more charitable, and suppose that the language quoted was thoughtlessly penned. All will admit that it requires a certain amount of money per capita to carry on the necessary exchanges of the products of a country with facility and dispatch. Now, lessen that amount one-fourth, one-half, or to the enormous amount of two hundred per cent, as ours has been, and just in that proportion you disturb the equilibrium of trade, and consequently produce "hard times." Prices are largely governed by the amount of money in circulation. Maintain a large circulation for a few years, and prices are established, and men's calculations for one or two years ahead are made on those prices. Then suddenly contract the volume of currency, and the inevitable result is that hundreds of thousands of good citizens will be bankrupted, as has been the case for the past eight years. This proposition is too plain, and has been too sadly proven many times in the history of our country, to need any further discussion here.

But, Mr. Macdonald, let us get down to the bed-rock, the "hard pan," if you please, of this question. The real increase of the wealth of our country, over and above consumption, is estimated at about three per cent per annum. Now, let me ask you, and all other Liberals who believe in the "God of humanity," in the inalienable rights of humanity, Does it make "any difference" whether the people have to pay three per cent or ten per cent on their circulating medium? Is that governed, too, only by a "temporary difference"? Is it a matter of but "temporary difference" whether the people are to be furnished with a government full legal-tender money at not over two or three per cent interest, if even that much, and enough of it to make the necessary exchanges with facility, and a sufficient amount kept in circulation for the proper needs of the people all the time, or that we be compelled to live under the iniquitous class legislation that created the national banks—put the power in the hands of a few men to issue and control the volume of currency and to compel the people to pay to them ten per cent per annum?

Does not Mr. Macdonald see that this discriminating class legislation has clothed a few men with the power to inflate or contract the volume of our circulating medium at their pleasure, and at the same time to compel the people to pay to them usurious rates of interest?

Can you, to-day, get a dollar in circulation, unless some three or four good men's ten per cent interest-bearing note is over the counter for it? And if the producers can only make three per cent over and above consumption, is it not plain that the money issuer and trader is "devouring the land"? Think, think, ye Democrats, ye Republicans!

I do not pretend to say that such a change in our national financial system as hinted at above would correct all the evils of our once happy country. No! no! There is much to be learned, much to be gained by individual and national effort, before we can truly be a "free," happy, and prosperous people.

I think it is now full time to quit advertising "Anthony." We should fight all manner of oppression; but let it be done in respectful language, while at the same time we plead for the rights of humanity, full and free discussion of all questions that affect us mentally, socially, physically, or financially. To grow requires food; to reform, to better our condition, requires effort, work—persistent work. I like the spirit of Mr. Macdonald's articles,

His ideas are clothed in beautiful language, and I agree with much that he wrote upon the labor question, and especially in his suggestion, in the last paragraph, in relation to our laws governing emigration. His eloquent words in which he tells us that the law of the "survival of the fittest" must govern here, as elsewhere, and which portray in glowing colors the effects of over-population, of famine in India, and now in China, more than hint at the importance, yea, the necessity, of controlling, limiting, the number of offspring. Better not to be born than to starve. But, brother Macdonald, do not forget the oppression of ten per cent interest. Try again.

What Shall We Say About the Finances?

MR. EDITOR: I am well pleased with your positions upon the finance problem, which is agitating this great and growing country. I have come to the conclusion that there are a few fundamental principles, underlying the subject of finance, which cannot be overlooked if we wish to arrive at any true basis for a settlement of the much-vexed question.

1. Where is the power vested to create money? and what is the nature of that power? Unquestionably the power is in the General Government, as set forth in our constitutional powers granted to Congress, to wit (5th power, 8th section, and 1st article): "To coin money," etc. "Ah," the stickler says, "Oh, yes; metal money." But, unfortunately for that conclusion, coining means more than stamping metal; it also means to fabricate or make, to invent, to originate, as to coin a word, a sentence, a speech, or any other creation. The nature of the power is a delegated power; and, as a delegated power cannot be redelegated, it follows, as a matter of course, that no other body can constitutionally emit or issue money except the people—the sovereign people—through their representatives in Congress; and, therefore, all State banks, local banks, and United States banks, under the control of corporate powers, are unconstitutional and therefore void; all precedents to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. What is money? what is its function? and of what material should it be made? Money is the creation of law, in and through the supreme authority of the government that issues it, and cannot be legally issued by or through any other authority. Its functions are (1) to pay debts, and should be always a full legal tender for all debts, public and private; then it is an honest money at all times within the realm that created it; (2) to facilitate exchanges of value or products between producers and consumers, thereby doing away with the inconvenience of bartering one product for another. The material from which it should be made is a question of great importance in the discussion of this subject, and should not be answered with a sneered expression—"any fool ought to know that as gold and silver," etc; so let us arrive at a conclusion by using our better judgments. After looking at the conveniences and inconveniences of the different materials of which money has been made (not in ancient but in modern governments), it is a universal remark among commercial men that metal money is very inconvenient; it is too heavy for common use; it is too easily counterfeited; it wears away too fast; and the best thinkers of these times say it is too expensive. For what is the use of having value in money, as it is the law that gives the money value? Why not have it made of a cheaper material, and let the product find its level with other products? Why should one product measure the value of all other products, thereby giving into the hands of those that are able to absorb all the precious metals to themselves the power to control the prices of all other productions? "Ah," says the sneerer, "can an act of Congres add value to anything?" when he knows that greenbacks, crippled at that with an exception, are nearly equal with gold, while 420 grains of silver (trade dollar) were much below gold. What was the cause, except it be the want of the act of Congress, the law creating power to say, This is a full legal tender at its face value for the payment of all debts. But excuse the digression. The conclusion that I have come to is that it makes no difference what is used to make money of; it should be issued upon one basis, to wit, a full legal tender basis, so that all money would do the work designed for money to do, be it gold, silver, or paper; and I believe paper is just as good as the metals, and much more convenient, and certainly more economical.

3. What amount of money should be put in circulation? and who should control the amount? These questions, it seems to me, are easily answered if we wish to do away with all privileges and class legislation. In the first place, what would the best business man do if he had unlimited power to issue a full legal tender money, and say to every one within his circle of trade that they were obliged to use his paper for money for all purposes and all business transactions between him and each of themselves, and also between themselves for all time to come, or as long as he held that power? I ask in all candor, Would he ever borrow any money to transact business with, or would he (as the Government ought to have done) issue and pay out all he needed for all his legitimate trade, paying as he goes at all times, paying no interest whatever? Every right-minded man would say at once he would be idiotic to borrow if he had the right to create or make all he wanted. Now, I hold that the Government has that power, and it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision can be found in the twelfth Wallace Reports, pages 540 to 560. Now, with the power proven in the people or Government, we will proceed to state what amount of money should be put in circulation and how to control issues. If it was wrong at first to borrow money or create bonds, it would now be right to immediately pay off the ntire bonded indebtedness and thereby stop the drain of interest that is now impoverishing the people—$100,000,000 yearly. "Yes, yes," says the objector; "you have no right to change the contract." I answer: Every man, dealing with the Government, deals with the full understanding that the law is liable to change, from time to time, as the interest or demands of the people shall require. In other words, one Congress cannot bind the next or any subsequent Congress. And after the entire debt of the Government is paid off and cancelled, if there is not sufficient money in circulation to reduce the interest on loans below the aggregate increase of wealth, we, the Government or people, should continue to create and disburse in the common expenses of the Government until money would not command more than 2½ to 3 per cent, as the increase of wealth is only about 3½ per cent. Then the enterprise of the country could borrow with an assurance of making a profit upon the capital by putting their work with it; and then we would have stability. With stability we would have prosperity; but with constant change, as we have always had under a pretended specie basis, we shall have panics on an average of once in seven years, with the entire profits of labor absorbed by the privileged or money classes.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you will indulge me, I will answer some of Mr. Truesdell's statements. He says: "How absurd, then, to suppose that by an act of Congress 412½ grains can be made equal to 440 grains." And in the next sentence he says the same 412½ grain dollar will drive into the jeweler's crucible or out of the country a dollar in gold, not recognizing that it is the supreme law of the nation that gives the money its exchangeable quality. It is hardly necessary to dwell on the crocodile tears shed over the "poor sewing girl, the factory hand, the man and maid servant," etc., when they, one and all, are in almost destitute or starving conditions for lack of money in the country with which to pay them for work. The common laborer never called for contraction. The producers nowhere called for contraction. There were no complaints until there was contraction. To whom will we attach the blame if not to the money oligarchs who called for contraction, which has caused the scarcity of the life-blood of the body politic until everything has stopped in the way of trade. The farmers' produce will bring no living price, because the laboring class cannot get work to obtain money to pay with, and have to do without money, and, in a great many instances, have to beg the scanty pittance of charity to keep soul and body together. The farmer has to use his old plows, harnesses, and wagons, and stop building of all kinds; consequently the merchants' sales are stopped, and he is prevented from buying his usual amount of stock; employees are discharged, and they both have to do without some of the common necessaries of life—another clog to distribution. The retail dealer is cut short in sales, and he commences to feel the pressure; he turns off some of his clerks—another clog to distribution. The wholesale dealer finds his sales falling much short of former sales. Collections cannot be effected. The result is failures from one end of the land to the other, and all from the demand of a few money sharpers who have demanded the issue of a bonded system of indebtedness in the first place, and in the second place, the payment of the bonds in coin; in the third place, demonetization of silver; fourthly, contraction of the currency to one-fourth of what is needed for the commercial transactions of the country; and, fifthly, then demanding specie payment. What now have we got in prospect? I answer, A repetition of English history from 1818 to 1822, when the ownership of the soil of that country was changed from 162,000 to 34,000. If any money is wanted by the enterprising citizen, he is at the mercy of the sharks, Shylocks, and money-kings, who are too good to bear their share of the expenses of the Government under which they live, consequently pay no taxes, but charge any rate of interest their "miserly, ill-contracted souls will dictate."

I would like to say something in answer to the communication of Mrs. Chappellsmith, but I have now written much more than I purposed to, and if it is seen fit to publish this, I may at another time notice some of her positions. In her closing line she says: "I will not offer any more nonsense." I will say that her writings cannot be called nonsense, taken from her standpoint or English education financially, but her standpoint or the English system is not well calculated for the benefit of the many, but is calculated to make the "rich richer and the poor poorer," as the condition of the inhabitants of the British Isles proves.

With my best wishes for yourself, Mr. Bennett, and the downtrodden laborers of my country, I subscribe myself,

Geneseo, Ill., March 18, 1878. WM. H. TERPENING.

"The Resurrection of Jesus."

I have just been reading this clear little work written by the noted Liberal lecturer and ex-clerical Bible expounder, W. S. Bell of New Bedford, Mass. Having long been an admirer of the clear, terse, and forcible arguments of Mr. Bell, I wish to give in THE TRUTH SEEKER a few words of public testimony to the strong, good sense and plain, practical reasoning which is displayed in all he writes. No unprejudiced person can read this pamphlet, which he quaintly calls "a little baby—the offspring of my brain," and not be struck with the ridiculous absurdity of taking as reliable testimony such a mass of contradictory, conflicting, and incredible evidence (?) as is here collected from the holy "Book of Books," aptly called "The Portable Pope of Christendom," and prove that a dead man-god became alive on a Thursday, or any other day whatsoever! In closing his very convincing and effective argument he gives the following conclusive settler:

"We have pointed out the facts of the record which show beyond question that the story of the Resurrection is a myth, and the conclusion is, that all theology resting upon this myth must be false. What have we left? We have truth left, human virtues, science, and the inexhaustible stores of the universe left. All that is good is left." I hope every Liberal will buy, read, and circulate this epitome of the very best arguments which have ever been advanced against the absurd doctrines of the continued existence of an organized identity after it had become entirely lifeless. "The dead know not anything, neither have they any more reward."

What are revelations now.
As we to reason's sceptre bow?
Science fair displays her lore,
And miracles are seen no more.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

What Morality is and How to Promote it.

After a full sway of nearly nineteen centuries, Christianity finds her defenders contaminated with all manner of vice and immorality. So-called "heathen" nations excel them in many phases of morality. We know not whom to trust, in the Church or out of it. Let any one do a loose credit business with even none but church-members, and his financial ruin is only a question of time. Church membership adds nothing to your ability to get trust. Creditors have learned to look at the man instead of his creed. Now, one of the professed objects of Christianity is to make men moral. It has undoubtedly failed in this regard. The cause of the failure must be the defects in Christianity because in Christian countries, Christian believers have full power. They can enact and enforce any law they wish. Disbelievers know this to their sorrow.

Now, to my mind, the following are the chief causes of the unhealthy moral condition of our boasted land of civilization: 1. Ignorance enforced by poverty, which is enforced by class legislation and the subversion of natural rights; 2. Superstition abetted by ignorance, bigotry, and intolerance; 3. False morality enforced to the neglect of true morality by Church and State; 4. The worship of God and mammon instead of humanity and knowledge.

The leading features of true morality are taught by reason to every nation, unless "revelations" interfere and subvert reason. Reason teaches man that lying, stealing, murder, adultery, and polygamy are unjust and wrong. But submission to priestcraft, kingcraft, and selfishness perverts reason and morals, and makes men and women do things with a clear conscience—that their natural reason condemns—because they do not think for themselves.

Church and State strain at gnats and swallow camels in morality. They are terrible on gamblers, Sabbath-breakers, unbelievers, blasphemers, etc., but liars and dishonest debtors are not troubled. For the latter, exemption laws, bankrupt laws, etc., are made for their special protection.

Does reason uphold all this? No. Revelation (so called) comes in and stupifies reason.

The morality of the Bible is very defective. Civilization aided by reason is dropping its false doctrines. Slowly but surely polygamy, slavery, kingcraft, the subjection of woman, revenge, non-resistance, hells, devils, efficacy of prayer, fall of man, etc., are giving way before the light of reason.

HOW SPINOZA LIVED.—Of Spinoza's habits in daily life we know just so much as to make us regret that we do not know more. In outward appearance he was unpretending, but not careless. His way of living was exceedingly modest and retired; often he did not leave his room for many days together. He was likewise almost incredibly frugal; his expenses sometimes amounted only to a few pence a day. But it must not be supposed that he shared the opinion of those who profess to despise man and the world. There was nothing ascetic in his frugality, nothing misanthropic in his solitude. He kept down his expenses simply in order to keep them within his means; and his means remained slender because he did not choose to live at other people's charges. He used to say of himself that he was like a snake with its tail in its mouth, just making both ends meet. Doubtless he was indifferent as to money and the world's goods, but with the genuine indifference which is utterly removed from the affected indifference of the cynic. A man to whom he had lent two hundred florins—which must have been a considerable sum in proportion to Spinoza's income—became bankrupt. Spinoza's remark on hearing of it was this: "Then I must lessen my expenses to make up the loss; that is the price I pay for equanimity." In like manner he kept himself retired, not because he was unsociable, but because he found retirement necessary for his work. There is ample evidence that he was none of those who hate or disdain the intercourse of mankind. He kept up, as we have seen, an extensive correspondence, of which we must regret that so little has been preserved. He was free and pleasant in familiar conversation with the people of his house. On Sundays he would talk with them of the sermon they had heard, and would praise the sound learning and morality of their worthy Lutheran pastor, a certain Dr. Cordes, who was succeeded in his office by Spinoza's biographer, Colerus. Thus he won the esteem and affection not only of his philosophic friends, but of the simple folk among whom he lived; and such affection, as M. Renan has well said, is in truth the most precious of all. Thus he showed in action the ideal of life set forth in those writings which he could not venture to publish in his lifetime, and which were supposed to strike at the foundations of religion and morality. And what is the rule proposed for the guidance of conduct by this man, whose opinions have been called abominable, execrable, and atheistic? In one word, it is this: To use the world with cheerfulness and content, not abusing it, and remembering that the good of mankind consists in doing good to one another.—The Nineteenth Century.

A Word Again from Mr. Butts.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of March 9th you were kind enough to publish a communication from me, in which reference was made to an insinuation from Dr. C. H. Horsch and to the placing upon a certain document by F. E. Abbot the name of O. B. Frothingham. I promised to give, if called for, a letter from Mr. F. to me upon the subject, as well as an extract from his affidavit touching the same subject. Mr. F's letter in your last paper seems to make this call, and, as a matter of justice to me, and to show that my assertions were not unfounded, I ask you to give place to the following extracts from the sworn affidavit, as a vindication, as I say, of my statement and my promise. I will not ask you now to print the letter referred to from Mr. F., but may at another time.

Let me correct Mr. F. The declaration which he speaks of as having been made in the alleged libelous circular to the effect that the signatures were affixed to the Appeal and not to the whole paper, was instead a part of a second or subsequent circular, and supplementary to the former, which states that the said words were published as the words of said Abbot alone. I am truly yours,

ASA K. BUTTS.

SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

vs.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM

The above-named defendant appearing in this action by his attorney, T. Frank Brownell, answers the complaint of the plaintiff herein as follows:

2d. This defendant admits that on or about the said 16th day of March, 1874, there was printed and published a private circular containing the words which are in the complaint set forth and alleged to be a libel, but avers that the same was published only to a limited number of persons interested therein, as hereinafter more specifically mentioned; and this defendant alleges that he was not the author of said circular or any part thereof, and that he did not direct nor take any part in the publication of said words, and that this defendant did not compose, sign, or publish concerning the plaintiff or at all the said words, alleged to be a libel, nor did he ever authorize, cause, or consent to the composition, signing, or publication thereof, or any part thereof, but on the contrary protested against the insertion of said words in said circular, and requested the person proposing said publication not to publish said words, and that the same were published without his knowledge and contrary to his request. O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 9th day of February, 1875, (signed) THOS. PRUDEN, Notary, City of New York.

Letters from Friends.

SIOUX FALLS, D. T., April 13, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: You have my name wrong on your list. You have it C. H. Moe, when it is only C. Moe; but when I received circulars, begging appeals, and papers from Seth Wilbur Payne, he made the same error you have made, and directed to C. H. Moe. Let me ask how he could make the same mistake in my case that you made unless he took my name from your list. Yours suspiciously,

C. MOE.

NEW YORK, April 22, 1878.

DEAR TRUTH-SEEKER: I see in the last Payne's Age of Reason that its editor says, "We have never borne false witness against our neighbor." What does he call the process by which he declared you a forger, a fraud, a robber, a conspirator with Comstock, that your claim that you had been arrested was a fraud, that you were worth $200,000, that Comstock is a Liberal and a Spiritualist, etc., etc.? What explanation can he make of the fifty-three positive falsehoods which one of your correspondents pointed out from his papers, and which he has never attempted to disprove? If such lying is not bearing false witness, will he please say what is? He says, also, "We have never stolen to the value of a farthing." Will he then please state how he came by your mail list? If he came honestly by it, he certainly can easily tell how it was; or will he please explain how it is that he has addressed circulars, sample copies of his paper, etc., to your subscribers all over the country, in many cases sending to all your patrons and to none others, and in dozens of cases making the same errors in name, post-office, etc., that are on your list? Is there the slightest possibility that all these mistakes could occur with him as with you unless he had your list before him? Could such a number of coincidences take place in trying a million times? How is it that Payne has failed to show that any one of the charges he has made against you is true, or that any one of those you have made against him is untrue? Are we not to conclude that his charges against you were false and that yours in reference to him were true? I am sorry to see that he now confesses to abusing his aged mother, being cruel and indifferent to his sister, refusing to protect her when ill-treated by a brute, and also to striking a defenseless child. I regret to be told that he has committed these offenses, with the other bad deeds he has been guilty of. I am reminded of the remark made by sixteen Mormon wives when they invited Artemus Ward to marry them and he politely declined: "Oh, it is too much, too much," said they, wringing their hands in agony. "Yes," retorted Artemus, "it is the muchness of the thing that I object to." And so it is with me in regard to your neighbor. Is there any hope for that man Payne?

Truly yours, JAMES W. SMITH.

MARSHFIELD, Mo., March 30, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: The Liberalists and Freethinkers of Springfield, Mo., met at the Opera House on the 3d inst. and organized an association, which they designated "The Springfield Liberal League," the following persons being chosen as officers for the ensuing year: D. M. Fox, President; Wm. Naegler, Vice-President; John H. Koch, Recording Secretary, pro tem.; Mrs. J. A. H. Colby, Corresponding Secretary; Wm. Massey, Treasurer; Executive Committee, Mrs. Nettie Pease Fox, J. F. Underwood, R. M. S. Cooper. After the organization was completed, twenty-four names were enrolled as members, the number at the present time consisting of about fifty, with a steadily increasing number, and fair prospects for the future. J. A. H. COLBY.

WHICH IS THE GREATER CRIME?

ANGOLA, APRIL 12, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Comstock uses every means possible to induce people to commit crime that he may make a few dollars at the expense of their reputation, and in some instances their life. Wives and little ones are left to suffer for the necessaries of life while husbands and fathers are imprisoned, and this vile wretch lives in ease, faring sumptuously on his ill-gotten gains. Madame Restell, at the request of the unfortunate, has given relief and received at their hands no doubt a bountiful recompense, which was thankfully bestowed upon her. So long as it is a shame to become a mother without a license from a priest or magistrate, so long will there be use for some 'Madame Restell' and that class of persons will find employment in spite of the vile Comstock and his accomplice, or the entire Y. M. C. A. Is it better to relieve human suffering than to cause suffering? Every sane person will answer in the affirmative. If Christians think it right to lead persons into temptation and take from them their daily bread, they had better invent a new prayer and set aside the old invention called the Lord's prayer. Brother Bennett, we look anxiously every week for something favorable to our petition. Will Congress adjourn and do nothing? Is the liberty of the American people to be in the hands of this vile wretch another year, and our law-makers sit in silence concerning a matter of such vital importance. I have several friends who wish to purchase Dr. Foote's "Words of Pearl." Can you inform us whether it can be sent through the U. S. mail without the Y. M. C. A. hog sticking his nose in the mail bag, and rooting it out? If there can be no other means of keeping him out, the people had better catch him and put a ring in his nose. I do not think it is nice to say naughty things, but I do like to call things by their right names. ZUBA.

CANYON CITY, COL., April 12, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: As to taking THE TRUTH SEEKER, I thought I would let it go for one year, as I take Payne's Age of Reason, which I would not take if I had not paid for it. I do despise a dishonest man, or even an angel from heaven, that would injure even an enemy without cause. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER for its boldness in telling what it thinks, and I endorse, generally what it says. J. Butler Brown is somewhat ingenious in showing the penetration of our physiques. It may be true, but I have something to say. I understand her to say the spirit is an organized structure and matter as much as the body. She illustrated by saying, "A vessel filled with gas will receive as much more of some other kind of gas. So the spirit fills the cells between the globules or molecules of the body." As the molecules of the body must touch each other to form a compact organism, must not the molecules of the spirit touch for the same purpose? And how could these two organisms, interwoven as they are like two fish-nets, separate without leaving a rent in one or the other or both of them? Could a material, organized brain come out of my head, through skull and skin, and leave no hole? Again, the soul fills the spaces between the molecules of the body from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, or it occupies some part of the system only. If it occupies the whole body, then the loss of a leg or an arm of the body involves a loss of an arm or leg of the soul; and if the compound of the soul is immortal, and the man who has lost his legs shall live ten years, where will his spirit legs be for that time? But if the soul occupies the head only, then the soul's feet and legs and arms are all in the physical head where mentality lies. If the spiritual legs that are cut off can attach themselves again to the spiritual body and grow fast, then the man without physical legs has spiritual legs but cannot walk. Could they be cut to pieces? All matter is divisible. Suppose I strike with a sword ten feet wide right through these spiritual legs at the knee, and stop half way, will the portion below the knee be cut off? and what intelligence in those legs to unite themselves to the thighs again? If they cannot, then the soul is a cripple as well as the body. And if the head should be taken off in a second, how long would it take the two parts of the soul to get out of the physical and get together? and if matter, would it not take some time to get well?

I was born in the last century, and can't read as much as once. I can exchange the Age for THE TRUTH SEEKER with a neighbor, so I guess you may stop THE TRUTH SEEKER for this year; besides, I want the "Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier" and the "Resurrection." But I claim to be a doctor of divinity, if understanding makes doctor. A. B. PIKARD.

COSHOCTON, OHIO, March 13, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: The remarkable Cyrus Romulus R. Teed quotes the Bible for authority, even for a "succession of six with one to come" Jesuses, so he can't well go back on that Divine revelation. Now, that infallible authority says God created all things in six days, looked the job over, pronounced it "good," and then rested from his labors. "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them, and on the seventh day God ended his work." Now Teed knocks this story higher than a kite by evoluting the assertion that "the process of making or creating and that of unmaking, are constantly going on." Yet if the first model was such a good one, the latest improvements ought not to be patented, and do not speak in trumpet tones of God's inventive genius.

When in his eighth letter he contradicted your assertion that there is no proof that such a person as Jesus ever existed, save what was found in the stories of four unknown persons who died long before their narratives were known to be in existence, and said your assertion was the outgrowth of ignorance, coupled with an intense repugnance to the fact that Jesus did exist, I felt confident for a moment that he was going to produce some proof to put you in Limbo, but, alas! as usual, the effort was dissolving views in gases—hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, oxygen, etc. I believe this author is the first who has produced labored, if not learned homilies on gas to prove the divinity of Christ. But not quite satisfied to rest his proof wholly upon gas in all its forms and composition, he adds the following brilliant flash of Teedism:

"The bare fact that the millions of professed Christians and Mohammedans found their belief upon the existence of Jesus, the Christ, is demonstrative proof that he lived and taught as declared." I was not aware that the Mohammedans doted much on the Christian's Jesus Christ, but if the "bare fact" that because, say, ten millions of Christians and Mohammedans founded their belief upon his existence and divinity two thousand years ago, is "demonstrative proof" that he lived and was verily God, then the contrary belief of ten thousand millions is, in a much greater degree and force, "demonstrative proof" that the Christian belief is a delusion from the fertile brain of a designing priestcraft. Cyrus Romulus has a great tendency to bite off, chew, and swallow a great deal more than he can digest, infold, unfold, fecundate, or incubate into things of beauty that promise to be a joy forever, to adorn the foci of his wonderfully illuminated mind—or at least of any other mind. W. S. WOOD.

N. Y. MILLS, April 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed I send you P. O. order for $3, which should have been paid before, but has been carelessly overlooked, and was reminded by your gentle dun in your last TRUTH SEEKER. I think you are spending too much powder on that miserable Seth Wilbur Payne. He used to edit a miserable sheet in Utica, and he got well punished for his slander of the noble Judge Doolittle, lately deceased. Let him alone and he will soon play out. I like your paper very much. Frothingham's sermons are splendid contributions. Hudson Tuttle, Underwood, and Mrs. Slenker add much to the value of the paper, and your own noble efforts would suit me better if they were not quite so much of the Spiritualistic order, but you have a right to your own opinions in regard to the hereafter, but the noble old hero Horace Seaver comes up to my ideal of a man governed by reason and good common sense. Hoping to meet you at Walkins at our August meeting, I remain Yours truly, S. HOAG.

THE MORMON BIBLE.

WASHINGTON, D.C., March, 25, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: In answer to an inquiry concerning the finding by Joseph Smith of the metal plates from which the Mormon Bible is claimed to have been written, you say that no one saw the plates except Smith, and that they were three in number. The Liverpool edition of the Mormon Bible contains two certificates, the first signed by three witnesses and the second by eight, saying that the signers saw the plates and the engravings thereon. But it is remarkable that of the eleven signers five are named Whitmer and three Smith. Joseph says he was told by an angel where to find the records—on the west side of a hill, not far from the top, about four miles from Palmyra, N. Y., near the mail road to Manchester—and there he found them in 1827. The plates were about eight inches by seven, not thicker than tin, and were bound together by three rings running through the whole, making altogether a volume about six inches thick. But the story about their discovery is "too thin." The Mormon Bible is a clumsy and imbecile forgery, written, no doubt, by the Rev. Solomon Spaulding for a pastime. It is the driest kind of reading, and, singularly enough, condemns polygamy. But the Mormons get around this by a new revelation, contained in their "Book of Doctrines and Covenants," saying, "None of these things shall ye practice save I, the Lord, command it of you." Some of the smaller divisions of the "Saints," however, still adhere to the original doctrine, and bitterly oppose polygamy.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I was very much concerned, on looking over my paper this week, to see the two communications from Memphis, Tenn., especially the "Stop my paper" from Mr. S. Sturm. Now, what, for weeks and months past, has the Liberal world been contending for—and with great results, too, and satisfactory ones at that—but the "freer expression of opinion"? Can Liberals (and under that term I have been fondly classing Infidels, and all those who oppose the orthodox Church—Materialists, Scientists, Spiritualists, Quakers, Shakers, etc., etc.) afford to fall out? Can we consistently demand of each other that all shall have, hold, and promulgate only one and the same dogma or belief? I think that point is the meat of the nut. If we have not come yet to a point where each should concede to the other a right to hold such beliefs as each shall choose, it is high time it were the understanding. When the day arrives that printing and publishing a paper will be so cheap that everybody's particular theories can be accommodated with a paper devoted to his or her cause or dogma exclusively, why, then the day will have arrived in which Mr. Sturm can thrive and enjoy himself; but not before.

An old man, sixty years of age, all the glamour and charm of youth stripped off; a man who has seen that life on earth is a stern reality; who has probably buried many a fond hope and had to clasp to his bosom many a bitter disappointment, looking back on life finds no solid ground upon which to place his foot, and sees but a short distance ahead a dark, unfathomable future, or, if not a future, to him a point of annihilation, and, leaving all cant, all hypocrisy, all falsehood behind him, asks a plain and simple question of one who, although younger than himself, is in the vigor of manhood, and with many new lights about him that the old man has never had, or had too late for his day and time to consider and understand. He asks of his younger friend what mean those far distant lights on the great ocean of Futurity that are coming to view. The friend answers, as to his mind the coming lights become visible, what he thinks they betoken. Now, friend Sturm, you who stand on another pier—and I confess that I stand on the same pier, Materialism, with yourself—be fair. The lights that now but dimly show themselves to us all are too dim for any of us to be certain. Wait, watch, and work, but don't take our credit or our good word from the cause. All will one day, perhaps, agree. Till that time comes, let us help one another to fight our great enemy, whose name is Intolerance and Orthodoxy. Fraternally,

CHARLES F. TITUS, M.D.

ALLEGHANY SPRINGS, VA., April 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am a late subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, not having known there was any such paper in the country until recently. I feel as if it were every Liberal's duty to say something in behalf of THE TRUTH SEEKER; for of such papers there are but few. I have thought from time to time that I would write and give you a sketch of theology in this section of Virginia; but as I have never written any for the press, I have hesitated to make the attempt. I would say to all Liberals, Do not criticise our editor for giving his honest convictions; we have ghosts and devils enough to fight without quarreling with each other. But if we had a few Ingersolls in every county, the devils and ghosts would soon disappear. Go ahead and fight superstition and error, and cease to notice that contemptible S. W. Payne. I am looked upon here as a firebrand (not one that Samson used with his three hundred foxes) in the community. I wish I were able to buy all the Truth Seeker Tracts and distribute them to the people; but, unfortunately, I am poor, with a large family. But, thanks to good reason and THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will try and raise them outside of superstition. I have been comparatively alone in this country in regard to faith. I had no idea that there was the one-hundredth part of the Infidels in the world that there are before I commenced reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. I became a dis-believer by reading the Bible. I do not see how any intelligent person who reads the Bible can possibly swallow all the impossibilities, mysteries, errors, and falsehoods that it contains. But, as Jonah swallowed the whale, I suppose it goes down all right. I have been looking for you to commence your series, "What I Don't Believe." I am of the opinion that such exposures bring more people to thinking than almost any other writing.

Yours respectfully, G. W. Hall.

Corsicana, Texas, April 15, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I think most of your subscribers in this place are well pleased with The Truth Seeker. I am perfectly delighted with it. I think it is decidedly the best Liberal paper I ever saw. I am much pleased with your replies and comments on "Is there a Future Life?" "Tell us How It Is," "Stop my Paper." "Stop my paper"—what a contemptible thing, and claiming to come from a Liberal! Shame on such a Liberal! Your reply was splendid. I am truly proud that we have got one editor that cannot be gagged; one that will give his honest convictions upon all subjects regardless of popular opinion. Go on, brother Bennett, with your sledge-hammer blows; every one knocks the scales from some one's eyes. The "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" is fine I keep it loaned out all the time. I think I will send you another order for books soon. You will remember I sent you a check on Rogers & Orr Bros. for $10.00, for the following books. . . . All were received in good order except "Champions of the Church." That I will look for as soon as out, and no doubt will read it with interest and profit. Sincerely wishing you the best of success, I remain, Yours fraternally, H. J. Howell.

Tripoli, Iowa, April 9, 1878.

Friend Bennett: I notice a number of articles in The Truth Seeker of April 6th taking you somewhat to task for certain convictions you entertain, and among those my attention was particularly drawn to was one from S. Sturm of Memphis, headed, "Stop my Paper." And the only excuse for ordering his paper stopped was that you viewed some things in a different light from what he, the said Sturm, did. Now, this is what I would call Liberalism with a vengeance. This Sturm seems to grieve over the enormous amount he has paid you. He says, "I have sent you $3 00 and $5 00;" and, as a matter of course, you were in duty bound to publish nothing but his peculiar views!

I commenced taking The Truth Seeker with its first issue in Illinois, and I think I have not missed a single number to the present time. Prominent among its many contributors have been Mrs. E. D. Slenker, Hudson Tuttle, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, Prof. Denton, and, latterly, Jennie Butler Brown, and many others that space will not permit me to mention; and although a great diversity of opinions and views are entertained by the abovementioned contributors as to man's finale, yet with deep interest have I followed them all; and who among them will say, "I am right, and you are wrong"? And it is with no less interest, Mr. Editor, that I have read what has been written by your own honest and able pen. And when the Church and State combined to crush The Truth Seeker, the brave, bold, honest, fearless, and outspoken stand of its editor so endeared its thousands of readers that all the Sturms in the world can effect nothing.

My present subscription to The Truth Seeker expires sometime in May. Inclosed are $3.00 for a renewal, for which credit me accordingly.

I live in an orthodox community, but if you will publish all the Sturms who order their paper stopped, I will make a mighty effort to get you a new subscriber for every one so stopped. Very respectfully yours, D. P. Walling.

Richford, April 15, 1878.

D M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I am sorry that the dogma of Spiritism is being discussed in The Truth Seeker, because at present it is "the unknown." My main objection to all religious systems is that they chain the human mind to imaginary things, to the exclusion of real things that we can know if we would exert ourselves as we do to know what is unknowable. Christianity has been Spiritism ever since it started. "God is a spirit." "The sanctus spiritus shall come upon thee." "Then was Jesus led, drove, took up into the wilderness," by the spirit—devil—to be tempted. "The spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." "And God said, Let light be." Now, brother, I think the word "spirit" is an infamous lie. If it were restrained, in our language, to mean the force by which all matter in the universe is moved, it would be definite knowledge. As it is, we have individual, independent spirits—spirit of God, spirit of Jesus, spirit of Christ, spirit of Holy Ghost, spirit of devil, and spirit of every dead man, and even the spirits of beasts. I think there is but one spirit—the spirit of the universe. If it is a law of the universe that all creatures live after we die here, it is fixed in fate; your faith or mine will not alter it. We do not need a million of salaried, interested, lazy priests to dispute about it and keep the world in an uproar. Instead of the salvation, Christianity has been the damnation, of man on earth, and is now. This is the reason why I am an Atheist. I don't believe I knew anything before I was born; I don't believe I shall know anything when I cease to breathe. And nearly all Christians are ready to burn, in a priest-fabricated hell, all, or any, who do not join their Church and help sustain the damnation. If Spiritism becomes popular, a Spiritualist chaplain will be in Congress, in the army, and in the navy. We must keep up a Government and Church of some sort, and hypocritical priests and officers of State love money and power better than they do the people, and their business has always been to keep up the relation of master and slave—despotism and ignorance. It should be the business of Liberalists to let go their interested, individual faiths, and try to furnish all real fact, information, here. I don't care whether I live after I am dead or not; my choice is out of the question. Christianity has taught only one important thing: "He that believeth not shall be damned." I have no respect for the author of that saying; it is so indefinite—good for priests only.

It is my opinion that the dogma that man was made in the image of God has done untold mischief; so has the surety of a future life. Priestcraft and kingcraft are supported by it. If we submit to tyrants, priests, and kings, we are saved in Elysium; if not, we go to Tartarus. This same tom-foolery could be played with Spiritism, after priests have manipulated it awhile. For Christian man is the greatest cheat, liar, traitor, deceiver, and inventor of all animals; and his God has been always a photograph of himself. There has been as great improvement made in Christianity in eighteen hundred years as in anything else. Our popish priests are as much superior to Jesus and his fishermen as they were superior to the smallest insects. The poor fishermen Cephas, John, and James differed greatly from our popish priests. Spiritualists claim that when we die, our spirits go direct to the Spirit Land. When the spirit, or force, of the universe makes me know that I shall live after I am dead, I will be a Spiritualist. I shall take no hearsay of "mediums."

I am sorry any Liberalist says, "Stop my paper," because you simply gave your private, honest opinion of Spiritism from your evidence.

I have been very disconsolate because I could not get subscribers to The Truth Seeker. I have loaned it ever since I took it. Very few were interested in it until Col. Ingersoll's lectures on "Hell" and "Ghosts" aroused their attention; then Beecher, Canon Farrar, and now Frothingham. There are some twenty half and-half Liberals here—so timid that they will not pay one cent for information. They get extracts in their newspapers, and they begin to inquire. Bigotry and laziness has nearly ruined us. Thanks to the Colonel, I hope we shall get awake. The books and tracts are used some, all I can get them read.

Yours, Joseph Noyes.

Macomb, Ill., April 15, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Having removed from Prairie City, Ill., to the above-named place, I am necessitated to write you a few lines, a pleasure I have many times promised myself. It was only after your arrest by and under an unjust law, that I became acquainted with you and your paper, and it is the truth to say, that that act has and will continue to do more to eradicate from the American mind the old mythical religious dogmas than all the other acts and doings of the Y. M. C. A., for notwithstanding the deep-seated and ever growing desire for such writings as yours, still it always requires some overt act to awaken even the intellectual mind to prompt and active energy and inquiry for them. This is one of the most Liberal counties of the State, and there are many thousands who would willingly have signed the petitions you forwarded had they known of it; but here we exercise the privilege so securely of worshiping the Supreme Architect of the universe in our own way that we are hardly aware of the innovations the Church is making upon them until they go a step too far, and then comes the reaction. We have organized a red-ribbon reform club here for the purpose of suppressing the immoderate use of alcoholic drinks, and while we refrain from political and religious arguments, and from suppression by legal enactments or prohibition, we agree that it is for the good of our physical self and common humanity. So in connection with the parlor—gaming, smoking, and gymnasium rooms—we have a reading-room in which we intend to place all kinds of reading matter—not obscene—selected regardless of Comstock, therefore there will be at least one number of D. M. Bennett's. Truth Seeker in the room each week, and let us hope that the truths that it will inculcate, together with such books as the "Voices" by Barlow, Ingersoll's "God's," etc., may help to extricate us from the Spiritual thralldom in which we are now groveling.

That The Truth Seeker may advance the people's interest, and proportionately your financial interests, should be the desire of all Liberal minds. Wishing you all the success that I would bestow on you if I had the imaginary power of all the imaginary gods, I subscribe myself, yours respectfully, T. L. Kendrick.

Albert Lea, Minn., April 15, 1878.

Friend Bennett, Dear Sir: I do not say, Stop The Truth Seeker, like the very liberal Mr. Sturm, nor do I wish a gospel preached continually "a la Ingersoll, Underwood, Mrs. Slenker" to the exclusion of truth and knowledge, but rather give us the truth and facts as they really appear, though our most sacred and cherished ideas of a lifetime will have to pass into oblivion as errors, for it is better to pass on than to stand still and denounce. Deliver me from such Materialists and all other ists that are so steeped in bigotry and intolerance that they can not reason in any other direction than round the circle. They had better not talk quite so much about bigoted and intolerant orthodoxy, because they will be worse tyrants so soon as invested with power and authority. Verily, consistency thou art a jewel. Go on, brother Bennett, give us the truth. Though the Sturms and other shining lights withdraw from the support of The Truth Seeker you will be sustained in the end if you remain true to its name and announce the same when found. Truth, friends of Freethought, is what we want, and let us all aid and encourage it, though the heavens fall. Then on and forward with your investigations, aid and help to demonstrate philosophically and scientifically the immortality of man, and you will have achieved more for humanity than ever was done before, and I venture to say that the very Materialists and Deists that now so very loudly protest and appear horror-stricken at your honest and truthful experiences, will rise up and call you blessed.

Yours, etc., E. P. Hassinger.

Mauston, Wis., April 15, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Like many others of your subscribers, I received a paper and circulars from the office of Payne's Age of Reason some two months ago, and I, like the others, wondered how he had got my address, I thought you must have given him your list of subscribers, like a generous soul as I take you to be, but the next Truth Seeker I got, opened my eyes, and I concluded he (Payne) must be the thief that stole your list and stamps. I was going to canvass for him, and had got one subscriber, and sent some of his circulars out. I lost no time in stopping the agent from getting any subscribers from that quarter, and none have subscribed here that I know of, and probably never will.

I am sorry to see by the last paper that you have to dun some of your subscribers. I may be a little tardy sometimes for the want of stamps only, and not from carelessness, nor from a desire to get such good mental food for nothing.

Inclosed please find a post-office order for $10.25 to be applied as directed. You may put me down for one copy of "The Champions of the Church." Respectfully yours,

Wm. Holgate.

Rockford, Ill., April 15, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Brother: On reading in The Truth Seeker of April 6th the letter of S. Sturm requesting a discontinuance of his paper, simply because you had made an allusion in its columns to the subject of Spiritualism (and I could not help admiring your noble and manly reply to it), I felt impressed to write to you, and if what I write should be thought worthy of a place in your paper, please print it.

Spiritualism is a subject which is agitating many of the advanced minds of to-day. And what more fitting thing is there for The Truth Seeker to give a hearing to than Spiritualism? I am a Spiritualist, and am proud of the name. Yet I am a constant reader, and a great admirer of your paper, and its noble manner of giving all sides a hearing.

We, as Spiritualists, are willing to admit that there are many so-called mediums traveling the country who are frauds, as well as frauds who are humbugging the people by pretending to expose Spiritualism. And who, I would ask, are more ready and anxious to expose fraud than Spiritualists themseves? We have in this country gold and silver money, and we have also a good deal of bogus money, and we do the best we can to separate the spurious from the genuine, and drive the spurious out of circulation. Yet the spurious does not destroy the genuine. Now any men or women who have ever set themselves to work to honestly investigate the subject of Spiritualism, and have carried their investigations on to any extent, must and will admit that they have found a great deal in their investigations which they cannot account for on any other hypothesis than that it is just what it professes to be.

Now I commenced to investigate the phenomena of Spiritualism three years ago last September, under peculiar circumstances, and I followed up investigations over a year (as opportunity offered), before I came before the public, and in a convention declared myself a Spiritualist. And from that time until the present, I have been almost daily having things occur to me which are to me incontrovertible evidence of spirit presence; and nothing would please me better than to have the opportunity of relating some of these experiences to the numerous readers of your paper.

To me Spiritualism is not a belief, but an actuality. In the communication entitled "a Materialistic view of Spiritualism, the question arises as to what is spirit. Is it something or is it nothing? That is, has it a ponderable body? I say yes, as much as light, heat, or electricity has a ponderable body, although we, with our limited knowledge may not be able to weigh it any more than we can weigh light or electricity. Another question also arises: Can two bodies occupy the same space at the some time? For reply, I would refer the questioner to the telegraph wire: do not the metallic substances of which the wire is composed and electricity occupy the same space at the same time; or let him look into the first pool or stream of clear water he may see, and tell me if light and water do not occupy the same space at the same time, and in like manner may the spiritual body fill and occupy the physical body at the same time. But the spiritual mind cannot fill or occupy any more space than there is provided for it in the brain in which it has to live while in the physical body, and therefore the mental powers and forces of the spiritual body are governed and controlled in a great measure in their development by the capacity of the brain in which they are located.

The mind of the spiritual body is no more the whole of the spiritual body than the head is the whole of the physical body. But methinks I hear some reader say, Prove these statements you are making. In answer I would say that science is not far enough advanced to prove this any more than it is to prove why the blood circulates through the human system. Or how and why the infinitesmal particle, by scientists termed protoplasm, performs its work in building up flesh, tissue, bone, and muscle, yet it is being fully demonstrated by the advanced scientists of the day, both in this country and in Europe, by the use of newly invented microscopes. But what power causes it to perform its work so faithfully and well they cannot tell. Nevertheless they have been able to photograph it while in the actual process of performing its work; and who, for a moment doubts their statements simply because they cannot tell what causes it to do what it does. And yet it is evident that there is an unexplained and undiscovered power or force behind it, that causes it to perform its work, just the same as there is a power in the magnet and electricity that enables them to perform their work. It is about time that we began to give up denying the existence of those forces and powers in nature, the phenomena of which we see, yet with our limited development of science we do not as yet, quite fully understand; or else throw up and cast aside all of the developments of science, and go back to the belief in a flat earth, with the sun, moon, and stars circling around it every twenty-four hours, or else pronounce nothing unknowable until it has had a fair, impartial, and unprejudiced investigation, Spiritualism is comparatively a new science. One generation has not yet passed away since what is known as modern Spiritualism made its advent in a few feeble raps in Hydeville, N. Y., and now behold the advancement it has made. And who can number the many lonely hearts that have been made happy by realizing the presence of those near and dear friends, who, previous to that time, we were taught to believe had entirely and absolutely left this world forever, but now many of us know that they are with us trying to make us good and happy.

F. F. Follet.

The penniless man.—Blessed is the man who is penniless, for he is never stricken—for a dollar.

The deadhead annoyeth him not, neither is he pursued by the book agent.

He is not grasped by the lightning-rod seller. The lunch fiend turneth away from him. The trinket vender passeth him by. He is not asked to invest in church lotteries.

He hath no friends to "treat;" he is poor and hath no enemies.

When he riseth in the morning his stomach is not rebellious from over-feeding; neither does he chink his silver and say, "How shall I get rid of these dimes?"

When he eateth he is not vexed by a multitude of dishes.

His lands will never take unto themselves wings, neither will the fire devour his water lots.

He is not perplexed about taxes, neither careth he for the rise in lumber.

He toileth not for gold, nor orateth like Jones on silver.

He hath no ties for money, therefore, careth not to demonetize, nevertheless a dime will he not refuse, nor turn away from a five-center.

Yea, a gherkin will he relish, and storm the outworks of a steel-clad biscuit.

He loveth none but himself; he is selfish; yea, fond of fish, clams in chowder, oysters raw, and lobsters in vinegar will he not dispise.

He maketh his lair in a barroom; he squatteth on a keg while it is day, and sleepeth in a barrel at night.

Where the scent of whiskey is, there he is found; he snuffeth the lunch with frenzy, and crieth Ha, ha! at the chink of glasses. He liveth like a ring-tailed moke, and dieth like a spotted jehosaphat.

Many foxes grow gray, but few grow good.

A Sterling Old Poem.

Who shall judge a man from his manners?
Who shall know him by his dress?
Paupers may be fit for princes,
Princes fit for something less.
Crumpled shirt and dirty jacket
May beclothe the golden ore
Of the deepest thought and feeling—
Satin vests can do no more.

There are streams of crystal nectar
Ever flowing out of stone;
There are purple beds and golden,
Hidden, crushed, and overthrown.
God, who counts by souls, not dresses,
Loves and prospers you and me;
While he values thrones the highest
But as pebbles in the sea.

Man upraised above his fellows
Oft forgets his fellows then.
Masters, rulers, lords, remember
That your meanest hinds are men—
Men of labor, men of feeling,
Men of thought, and men of fame,
Claiming equal rights to sunshine
In manhood's ennobling name.

There are foam-embroidered oceans;
There are little wood-clad rills;
There are feeble, inch-high saplings;
There are cedars on the hills.
God, who counts by souls, not stations,
Loves and prospers you and me:
For to him all vain distinctions
Are as pebbles in the sea.

Toiling hands alone are builders
Of a nation's wealth and fame;
Titled laziness is pensioned,
Fed, and fattened on the same.
By the sweat of others' foreheads,
Living only to rejoice;
While the poor man's outraged freedom
Vainly lifts its feeble voice.

Truth and justice are eternal,
Born with loveliness and light;
Secret wrongs shall never prosper
While there is a sunny right.
God, whose world-wide voice is singing
Boundless love to you and me,
Links oppression, with its trifles,
But as pebbles of the sea.

Where are Heaven and Hell and "Fiddler's Green"?

AND WHERE'S JACK TRENT?

An added gloom pervades the place,
And, as it were, shuts out the light;
'Tis felt and seen on every face
That Jack, a convict, died last night.

Jack ne'er had a note of warning
That grim old Death, with keen-edged knife,
Would come before another morning,
And cut the brittle thread of life.

Serene, contented, sound, and blithe
Was Jack Trent only yester-morn,
Until old Time came, with his scythe,
And cut him down likes blades of corn.

Poor Jack is dead and "gone," they say;
But gone where? Who will solve this riddle?
To "Fiddler's Green"—a place half way
'Twixt heaven and hell? Just at the middle?

No; that won't do. Where's Fiddler's Green?
And where is hell's or heaven's place?
Has earth e'er had a man who's seen
These marvels anywhere in space?

If there's no man that's ever seen
The heaven about which Christians shout,
Nor yet the hell, nor Fiddler's Green,
Then what do preachers talk about?

Man hopes for life beyond the grave—
Would have it at whatever cost;
But if he has a soul to save,
We first must know that it's been lost.

Pray tell us how we are to know
That man hath an immortal part—
A soul. At death where does it go?
How shape itself to make the start?

Now where's Jack Trent? I mean his soul;
His body lies 'neath yonder sod.
Let's hope he's safely reached a goal
Where Nature reigns the supreme God.

"The World Would be the Better for It."

BY HOMER A. BILLINGS.

If honest Christians would unite
With Liberals to put down evil;
Act more from love, and less from spite,
And be respectable and civil;
And then let reason have its sway,
Instead of claiming to abhor it;
Then give to honest thought its say—
The world would be the better for it.

If men relied on common sense,
And less on gods and creeds infernal;
Could we with foolish myths dispense,
And all unite in bonds fraternal;
Could bigotry be cast aside,
And all mankind at once ignore it;
Could we have less of squeamish pride—
The world would be the better for it.

When honest thought can have its say;
When Justice in her might has risen;
When Comstock, too, has had his day
In sending editors to prison;
When man shall dare assert his right,
Instead of having to implore it;
When all shall learn that right is might—
Our world will be the better for it.

When man shall on himself rely,
And not upon a foreign Savior;
When he shall his own errors try,
And regulate his own behavior;
When persecution, too, shall cease,
And every nation shall abhor it;
When wars shall cease, and all is peace—
Then will the world be better for it.

The "good time coming" 's almost here;
Freethought is making people stronger;
Hell's nearly banished, do not fear;
Be patient—wait a little longer!
When superstition's passed away,
And no one wishes to restore it,
Then all mankind will truly say,
Our lovely world is better for it.

Fabius, New York, March 22, 1878.

Anthropology.

How few have any conception of the vast and wonderful philosophy represented by the word anthropology, the unfamiliar name of the heretofore unknown science of man, for which we are indebted to the discoveries of Prof. Buchanan.

I have just finished reading the system of anthropology published by Prof. Buchanan a quarter of a century ago, and as this rare book has long been out of the market and inaccessible to the public, a sketch of its contents would be as novel to most readers as a translation of Sanscrit manuscripts.

This volume of four hundred pages, which I read with intense interest and delight, is an extremely concise presentation of the four sciences, phrenology, cerebral physiology, sarcognomy, and pathognomy, with illustrations of psychometry, anatomy of the brain, physiognomy, chirognomy, and social philosophy. Of the latter only enough is said to make us wish for its fuller presentation.

It is made entirely clear in this volume that all the great problems of life and mind which have puzzled mankind for ages, and many others which have never even been thought of by scientists or philosophers, have been grasped and solved by a bold experimental inquirer who has known how to interrogate nature and bring forth her secrets by a novel and original method of experiment.

That he has revised, corrected, and vastly enlarged the phrenology of Gall and Spurzheim is conceded by all who have investigated the subject. It is equally apparent that he has enlarged physiology by demonstrating the physiological powers of the convolutions of the brain which, has never been heretofore asserted or even imagined by any one.

His exposition of the sympathies of the soul and body is not only a source of delight to those who have heard his lectures on sarcognomy, but is deeply instructive to the mesmeric and electric practitioners whom he is now teaching to treat diseases in a more efficient and scientific manner by the guidance of sarcognomy, the practicability of which he demonstrates on the patients at every private lecture.

Dr. Buchanan differs greatly from his predecessors in phrenological science. He is not limited to the materialistic sphere of Gall and Spurzheim but comprehends the highest range of psychic facts and wonders as well as the common phenomena of life and mind. Hence, his views are vastly more profound than those of Gall, Spurzheim, or Combe.

His style as a writer is concise, lucid, and forcible. He has all the vigor of expression and acuteness of thought which we find in John Stuart Mill, Wendell Phillips, or Horace Greeley. These qualities in his systematic public lectures which have been published, are combined with a brilliant eloquence which is rare among scientists. His lecture on the "Evolution of Genius," delivered at Louisville, and his recent anniversary address at Boston on the "Divine commands for 1878," are in our opinion unsurpassed by any similar efforts of American orators. His address on the "Triumphs of Medicine" is marked by great ability and boldness. Those who wish to enjoy the singular force and beauty of his style will soon be gratified by the publication of his powerful reply to Dr. Carpenter (the famous English physiologist) which will soon be issued by Colby and Rich at Boston. Notwithstanding the ability and learning of Prof. Carpenter, all who have read the installments of this reply which have been published in the Popular Science Monthly and Banner of Light concede that he has been thoroughly crushed by Dr. Buchanan. As a champion of liberality, freedom, and progress, we have much to expect from his future efforts. S. W. KENT.

New York, April 8, 1878.

THERE is so much of good among the worst, so much of evil in the best, such seeming partialities in providence, so many things to lessen and expand, yea, and with all man's boast, so little real freedom of his will, that to look a little lower than the surface, garb, or dialect, or fashion, thou shalt feebly pronounce for a saint, and faintly condemn for a sinner.—Tupper.

"American Communities."

Brief sketches of Economy, Zoar, Bethel, Aurora, Amana, Icaria, the Shakers, Oneida, Wallingford, and the Brotherhood of the New Life. By William Alfred Hinds, Office of the American Socialist, Oneida, New York, 1878.

Here is a book made upon honor. The writer is a communist of a well defined stripe himself, and yet, he has been able to give a fair account of all the styles of communal life differing from his own. For there are sects in socialism as there are in religion. Some of the communities, whose stories are told in this interesting book, are sticklers for marriage simple; others, complex; and others not at all—the latter not necessarily "heaven" where there is said to be no giving of that kind. Some of them live in moderate houses of one, two, or three families; and others live in one common establishment and eat and lodge under one roof. Nearly all of them have some sort of religion, but are divergent in creeds; though all are drawn from the one plenary and unfailing fountain, the Bible. But the one thing in which they do all agree is the early Christian practice of having "all things in common," a practice which their fashionable Christian brethren spurn, disown, and are as ashamed of as they are of their homespun mothers and shoemaking grandfathers. They agree also in all the essential virtues—industry, frugality, deference and duty to others, and implicit integrity in dealing with each other and with the outside world. All their products are the result of perfect work and the best materials. You will get nothing shoddy from the Shakers nor adulterated at Oneida.

These communities are mostly primitive births, the crude and accidental products of an evolution not yet complete. They were conceived in religion and started into being to ultimate a form of faith and live out a creed, not altogether to try a social experiment. Their community of property and associated home was the accident of their situation. All the earlier communists were emigrants from beyond the Atlantic, impelled by a religious idea. Finding themselves here in a strange land, they remained together in a body, took up their lands in common, and organized communal homes, the better to carry out their religious idea. The Icarians are the one exception to this; they came from France, in more recent years, with no religion, but with the communal idea dominant from the start.

The Oneida community is of native origin, and is the most complete and best appreciated of them all. They have a varied industry with perfect tools and machinery for all departments. Their people live like bees, in clover, and are quite as busy. They, too, have a religion, and are very earnest and sincere in it, but it is not ascetic nor an impediment to their developement; its yoke is easy and its burden light. Evolution is at work among all these communities; the fathers pass away and the children, whether home-made or adopted, see with wiser eyes and less severe affections; and all socialists believe that some grand social problem will be solved by their continued existence.

All this, and more, is told in this encyclopedic nutshell of a book, for sixty cents, sent to the author at Oneida, New York. The works of other recent writers on these American communities, Noyes, Nordhoff, and Dixon, are expensive—three or four dollars—but here you have the whole thing in 176 pages at this small price. All who do not like to dogmatize on the various social schemes, but do like to know the facts of the progress thus far gained, will be glad to procure this book. THERON C. LELAND.

The Spirit of Persecution.

The spirit that condemns to martyrdom those who differ from us in opinion is one of which no age and no class can claim a monopoly. It seems to belong to human nature. It is the same spirit in the intellectual plane that, operating on the physical plane, causes the enslavement of the weak by the more powerful. There is a strong tendency to "pass on" the blow we ourselves receive—to visit upon the class next lower in the scale of strength the oppression and intolerance that a higher one has visited upon us. The Irish, seeking refuge from oppression in this country, were the staunch supporters of the enslavement of the negroes. The negroes, sent by the Colonization Society to Liberia, enslaved the native tribes. Precisely the same spirit pervades the mental and moral atmosphere, and will do so until, individually, people shall have achieved freedom. Not simply freedom from other men, but freedom from the spirit of tyranny within us that desires to enforce our ideas upon others.

We cannot look for the development of this freedom among Christians, it is true, for their whole system rests upon authority and they are all the slaves of their imaginary God. But Materialists and Spiritualists, in their onward march after truth, have not left behind them in Mother Church all of this same spirit of tyranny. Could the so-called Freethinkers of the country be trusted to day with absolute power? If they are indeed Freethinkers, yes; if only Materialists, no. In the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER we notice one writer lamenting the "cruel and despotic tendency of Christians to ostracise from society all who differ from them," and another who "was in hopes he had found a proper paper to read," discontinues it because its editor, having had an opportunity to observe certain natural phenomena that he (Mr. Sturm) has not, honestly recorded his observations! If in deference to their prestige of past power the rights of Christians would be safe in the hands of such Materialists, evidently those of Spiritualists would not The last-named class show the same spirit toward those of their number who honestly question the reality of alleged phenomena, as well as toward those who hold advanced views on social or industrial subjects; and these last, as soon as anybody shall get ahead of them, will undoubtedly begin to manifest the same phase of human nature. Its manifestations grow less violent in proportion to enlightenment, but will cease only with the recognition of perfect freedom as the right of every individual.

Spiritualists are recruited from two classes: Christians, who in many cases have only transferred their allegiance from the authority of Jesus and the Bible to the authority of spirits and mediums, and Materialists, who have enlarged their philosophy so as not to exclude any of the phenomena of the universe. The one class brings with it its unreasoning credulity and love of the marvelous; the other its clear-sighted intelligence and honest adherence to truth.

Whether a man classes himself as a Christian, a Materialist, a Spiritualist, a Communist or a Free-lover, depends upon what best satisfies the needs of his inner nature at the point of developement where he now stands; and it is only when he has passed through all these schools, taking from each what a wise eclecticism dictates, that he can rightfully lay claim to the degree of Freethinker.

If Mr. Bennett has "become a Spiritualist" few of those familiar with his career and with the quality of his intellect will have any fear that, in so doing, he has ceased to be a Freethinker and indefatigable truth seeker. G. W. KEITH.

SPRINGFIELD HYGEIAN HOME.

That others may know more of what we are trying to do, I will simply state that during the three years we have been here nearly 1,000 persons have been treated for a great variety of diseases, both acute and chronic, including Fever and Ague, Congestive Chills, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Neuralgia, Female diseases, Insanity, Consumption, Inflammatory Rheumatism, White Swellings, Paralysis, etc. But one death occurred in all that number, and every one was benefited or permanently cured where the laws of life were strictly adhered to. With a fair trial, where cure is possible, we may safely promise good health to all. Please state definitely the nature and probable cause of your disease, when contracted, age, amount of drugs taken, etc., and we will give you an honest reply as to the probability of recovery.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

THROUGH ROME ON;

A Memoir of Christian and Extra-Christian Experience.

BY NATHANIEL RAMSAY WATERS.

Extra Cloth, 12mo, 352 pp..... .....Postpaid, $1.75.

A VERY critical analysis of both Protestantism and Catholicism, from the vantage ground of an intimate personal experience with the two systems. The writer, it appears, is determined to nothing extenuate nor set down aught in malice. His analysis of the Protestant principle will be new to some Protestants, as will his philosophy of Catholicism to many Catholics. Besides the very interesting Memoir which is the main part of the book, it contains notes, parts of correspondence, and an essay or two; all partaking of the analytical and deeply earnest spirit which appears in it from the first. The plan of the work is strikingly original, its purport is set forth in the tersest and clearest language, and the manifest sincerity with which the whole is written will commend it to readers of many various shades of opinion. The work is very argumentative, with touches of liveliness here and there, which serve to relieve the general gravity of its strain. It has the merit throughout of being free from coarseness and jibing; while it deals the most trenchant blows which pure logic is capable of inflicting.

EXTRACTS.

I ASK you, would Absolute Goodness create with active poison-working elements for any end?....Was God under compulsion to create man so? No: he was free, you say, to create or not to create; but man could not have been made otherwise compatibly with free will in the creature. Then it would seem creation should not have taken place, or free will should been left out of the plan rather than evil accepted for its sake. What necessary Moloch is this Free Will, that is higher than goodness, better than happiness, and so mysteriously precious that evil must be adopted as a means to secure it, and goodness and happiness offered a divine sacrifice to it? This known world of ours so abounds in moral foulness, as well as in physical suffering of manifestly impeccable beings, such as little infants and irrational animals, that it negatives from the first your anthropomorphic theory of Creation and Providence; which is an apotheosis of human imperfection.

AN unverifiable hypothesis of a reformed Providence, which, however agreeable it may be to the fancy, has no support in sober reason. If the rule of Providence in the present life be one of injustice, there is no reason to believe that a future life under the same Providence will be differently ordered, so as to be just and happy: and if the order of the present life be right, there can be no need of a future life as a scene of reparation. Our wish to be rid of what is bad and painful, and secured in what is good and pleasant, of course does not affect the argument. The existence of a wish does not imply that it will ever be gratified.

THE true philosopher is reverent and silent in the presence of the Incomprehensible. The green world of sense and knowledge where he finds himself placed furnishes employment to all his faculties. He does not deny supernal spheres: he only refuses to make or to bow down to assertions for which he sees no sufficient foundation. Here he finds the appropriate sphere of his activity: of what is beyond he confesses himself ignorant. The supernaturalist of course knows no more of the beyond than he, but is afflicted with what Socrates called the worst kind of ignorance: the conceit of knowing what one does not know. Prate as men may, the Mystery is there: as deep as ever when the Bible is opened; as dark as ever when the Church has lighted her wax candles.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition: had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

IN human life there is a constant change of fortune; and it is unreasonable to expect an exemption from the common fate. Life itself decays, and all things are daily changing.—Plutarch.

A NATION'S character is the sum of its splendid deeds; they constitute one common patrimony, the nation's inheritance. They awe foreign power; they arouse and animate our own people.—Henry Clay.

DO NOT think of knocking out another person's brains because he differs in opinion from you. It would be as rational to knock yourself on the head because you differ from yourself ten years ago.—Horace Mann.

THERE is no trifling with nature; it is always true, grave, and severe; it is always in the right, and the faults and errors fall to our share. It defies incompetency, but reveals its secrets to the competent, the truthful, and the pure.—Goethe.

MUSIC moves us, and we know not why; we feel the tears, but cannot trace their source. Is it the language of some other state, born of its memory? For what can wake the soul's strong instinct of another world like music?—Miss Landon.

NATURE stretches out her arms to embrace man, only let his thoughts be of equal greatness. Willingly does she follow his footsteps with the violet and the rose, and bend her lines of grandeur and grace to the decoration of her darling child.—Emerson.

NO LANGUAGE can express the power and beauty of a mother's love. It shrinks not where man cowers, and grows stronger where man faints, and over the wastes of worldly fortune sends the radiance of its quenchless fidelity, like a star in heaven.—Chapin.

"WHAT is wanting," said Napoleon one day to Madame Campan, "in order that the youth of France be well educated?" "Good mothers," was the reply. The Emperor was most forcibly struck with this answer. "Here," said he, "is a system in one word."—Abbott.

HOWSOEVER varied the courses of our life, whatsoever the phases of pleasure and ambition through which it has swept along, still, when in memory we would revive the times that were comparatively the happiest, those times will be found to have been the calmest.—Lytton.

THE gravest events dawn with no more noise than the morning star makes in rising. All great developments complete themselves in the world, and modestly wait in silence, praising themselves never, and announcing themselves not at all. We must be sensitive and sensible if we would see the beginnings and endings of great things. This is our part.—Beecher.

I KNOW not what the world may think of my labors, but to myself it seems that I have been but a child playing on the sea-shore; now finding some pebbles rather more polished, and now some shell rather more agreeably variegated than another, while the immense ocean of truth extended itself unexplored before me. —Newton.

REMEMBER to comfort thyself in life as at a banquet. If a plate is offered thee, extend thy hand and take it moderately; if it be withdrawn do not detain it. If it come not to thy side, make not thy desire loudly known, but wait patiently till it be offered thee. Use the same moderation towards thy wife and thy children, towards honors and riches.—Epictetus.

A FATHER may turn his back on his child, brothers and sisters may become inveterate enemies, husbands may desert their wives, wives their husbands; but a mother's love endures through all; in good repute, in bad repute, in the face of the world's condemnation, a mother still loves on, and still hopes that her child may turn from his evil ways and repent; still she remembers the infant smiles that once filled her bosom with rapture, the merry laugh, the joyful shout of his childhood, the opening promise of his youth; and she can never be brought to think him all unworthy.—Irving.

Odds and Ends.

"PAPA," asked a boy, "what is meant by Paradise?" "Paradise, my son," replied the father, "is the latter part of the Summer, when your mother goes on a visit to your grandfather."

SAID a theatre manager to one of his company, "I wish sir, you would be careful, and pay a little attention to what I say." "So I do," replied the actor—"as little as I possibly can."

JOHNNY lost his knife. After searching in one pocket and another until he had been through all without success, he exclaimed: "Oh, dear! I wish I had another pocket, it might be in that?"

A WITNESS in an Irish court of justice stated that he was suddenly aroused from his slumbers by a blow on the head. "And how did you find yourself?" asked counsel. "Fast asleep," replied the witness.

COMPETITIVE trial before a jury sitting to award prizes for a tragic declamation. Candidate—"Beg pardon, gentlemen—would you be kind enough to move back a little to give me room to roll my eyes?"

WHEN the officials of a banking institution commence to use the funds for their own benefit, they say, "Let's speculate." Pretty soon this suggestion is slightly changed to "Let's peculate," and they "pec."

OLD gentleman to troublesome boy—"Look here, my boy, can you tell me why you may be said to be playing at hide-and-seek?" Troublesome boy—"No sir." Old Gentleman—"Because you are seeking a good hiding."

A PARTY of young fellows found fault with the butter on the boarding-house table. "What is the matter with it?" said the mistress. "Just you ask it," said one; "it is old enough, and strong enought to speak for itself."

"I was not aware that you knew him," said Tom Smith to an Irish friend, the other day. "Know him," said he, in a tone which comprehended the knowledge of more than one life, "I knew him when his father was a boy."

THE man who has heretofore collided with a plate of soft butter when feeling around in the cupboard in search of something to eat after dark, now experiences a relief from the monotony by sticking his fingers in mince-meat.

SAID an artist to a censorious critic: "Why, according to you, my picture is all beastly. I suppose the animals in it are beastly, too!" "Well, no; that's what they ought to be, but unfortunately they are not," replid the inexorable critic.

"AND isn't there an old gardener somewhere about here, too, Mrs. Maloney?" Pat Riley. I think his name is." "Know him, is it, me leddy? And shure isn't he a relation of mine! Shure, he wonst wanted to marry me sister Kate!"

"PA, will you get me a pair of skates if I prove to you that a dog has ten tails?" "Yes, my son." "Well, to begin, one dog has one more tail than no dog, hasn't he?" "Yes." "Well, no dog has nine tails; and if one dog has one more tail than no dog, then one dog must have ten tails!" He got the skates.

A GENTLEMAN gave a party in honor of a missionary, lately returned from his field of work. The ladies appeared with low-cut dresses, and the host, fearing the style might shock his reverence, he apologized to him for it, saying that the fashion demanded it. "Oh, I don't mind it at all," replied the missionary, "I have been ten years among the savages."

ON A railway line, recently a passenger stopped the conductor, and asked, "Why does not the train run faster?" "It goes fast enough to suit us. If you don't like the rate of speed, get off and walk," was the rejoinder. "I would," replied the passenger, settling back in his seat, "but my friends wouldn't come for me until the train comes in, and I don't want to be waiting round the station two or three hours."

THAT MULE.

The mule stood on the steamer's deck,
To land he would not tread;
They pulled the halter round his neck,
And cracked him o'er the head.

Yet firm and steadfast there he stood,
As though formed to rule;
A critter of heroic blood
Was that there cussed mule.

They cussed and swore—he would not go
Until he felt inclined;
And though they showered blow on blow
He wouldn't change his mind.

The deck hand to the shore then cried:
"This here's bound to stay,"
And still upon the critter's hide
With lash they fired away.

His master from the shore replied:
"The boat's about to sail;
As every other means you've tried,
Suppose you twist his tail?

It's likely that will make him land."
The deck man brave, though pale,
Approached with outstretched hand,
To twist that there mule's tail.

There came a sudden kick behind!
The man—Oh! where was he?
Ask of the softly blowing wind,
The fishes in the sea!

For a moment there was not a sound,
As that mule winked his eye,
As though to ask of those around:
"Now, how is that for high?"

"Cut that there mule's throat right away,"
The captain did command:
But the noblest critter killed that day,
Was the fearless brave deck hand.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 19. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, May 11, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

If the Devil isn't married, who gets up on cold mornings to make the fire?

A shrewd old minister says that the pastor of a church ought not to be regarded as the conductor of a through sleeping car.

The American Board of Foreign Missions wants to occupy central Africa, but also wants $25,000 with which to begin to do it.

The new Baptist Church at Dubuque, Iowa, is happy in the possession of two splendid stained-glass windows, given by the pastor in memory of his deceased parents.

The Mormon church having succeeded in laying hold of the $750,000 which Brigham Young had appropriated, Brigham's heirs will have that much less to squabble over.

If the strolling temperance orators keep on enumerating the crimes they committed when under the influence of liquor, we shall find which of them is old Bender in disguise.

The first Napoleon at all events once showed his respect for science, by permitting Sir Humphrey and Lady Davy to travel abroad, when the Continent was closed to the English generally.

The defaulting Fall River treasurers, Chace and Hathaway, are both prominent members of the Congregational Church. Great interest will be felt as to what will be done with them by the brethren.

The Pope objects to the presence of women on his premises, and the female members of families residing in the Vatican are being removed from the palace. Quite a change from the times of Alexander VI., but Leo is an old, old man.

A clown has been converted in Peter Dwyer's meetings, and announces his intention of devoting his talents to Evangelical labor. If this brother shall conclude to use any of his comic talent in his new field of effort, he may be able to draw large houses.

A minister has been found in the central part of this State who received seventeen dollars for last year's pastoral services. Whether it is on the old plan of "poor preach, poor pay," or whether the brother has a rich wife and did not need to ask the church for more than seventeen dollars, is not divulged.

The Pope has given a church in New York a present of a handsome chalice as a prize for having sent him a large sum of money. King Humbert of Italy has granted four annual prizes of $1,000 each for the best productions in art, science, and literature. Pope Leo loves to encourage almsgiving—in his direction.

A Methodist Episcopal bishop, Dr. Merrill, has had an interview with President Diaz, of Mexico, and reports him to be fully committed to the principle of religious toleration. President Diaz expressed "the belief that freedom of worship is essential to the progress of religion."

Mrs. Van Cott says she will preach, and that neither John Wesley nor St. Paul can stop her. Some fearless wretch should inform the Widow that both the gentlemen named are dead, and are probably well satisfied to have her keep on preaching while on this side the grave, but they tremble when they reflect upon what the consequences may be should she persist in the practice when she gets "over there."

Prof. David Swing says of Joseph Cook: "Much of Mr. Cook's scientific method is only a method of language, a certain gravity of dress, as though a small boy were wearing the wig and gown of an English Justice. The discourses which the Boston orator sends forth on the subject of marriage are the most wonderful specimens perhaps, in all literature, of masquerade of small ideas in the suits of giants."

The Rev. J. Ashe (the "J" may mean Jack), vicar of St. Paul's Church, Crewe, England, after soundly rating his congregation for their "close-pursedness," threatened them as follows: "I have told you often that you are saved by faith, but show me your faith by your works; and if you don't be more liberal in your giving I will stop you from going to heaven, for I will meet you at the gate and prevent you from going in; that I will. It won't be a pleasant thing to do, but I will do it." This threat opened the purses of some, the eyes of others, and the mouths of those who laughed at the absurdity of the parson's position.

The trial of Rev. Fergus Ferguson, accused of heresy, before the United Presbyterian Presbytery of Glasgow, Scotland, partook somewhat of the character of the councils of the Church in the Middle Ages. The court consisted of eighty judges, clerical and lay, and showed an example of disorderliness which was well followed by the audience. Mr. Stark punched Dr. Jeffery on the shoulder; Dr. Jeffery knocked Mr. Stark back into his seat; the people hissed and cheered, half a dozen of the judges chattered away at one time like a lot of religious magpies, and the moderator became so confused that he didn't know what he was doing. At last the accused was found guilty by a small majority. An appeal has been made to the General Synod.

The assembly of this state has passed an appropriation giving fifty thousand dollars to the Catholic Protectory. To be sure, we have a constitutional provision forbidding all gifts to sectarian institutions; but the young man who acts as attorney for the State told the assembly that the Catholic Protectory is not a sectarian institution. But it is one, as any but an idiot ought to know from the name; and it is a gross outrage to attempt thus brazenly to violate the Constitution of the State. And here is a fact to be noticed. The Protectory needs this money because it is fifty thousand dollars in debt. It is not very long ago that a Catholic journal of this city made the statement that it was in debt to this amount, and that it was intended to apply to the legislature for relief to this amount. Now it has been done. We trust that the senate will see that it is not the province of the State to pay the debts of any sectarian organization.—Independent.

The developments in regard to the Fall River defalcations become more astounding every day. The indications now are that Hathaway and Chace, the two detected mill treasurers, have made away with over two millions of dollars. The loss of this immense sum falls upon both rich and poor, and many of the stockholders of the Border City Mills are left without a dollar. Once prosperous citizens are ruined, and persons in humble circumstances who bought stock as a safe and profitable investment, are once more wholly dependent upon their daily toil. The two treasurers appear to have been combined in a league of crime and deceit. Hathaway acted as a tool of Chase, and a cover for the operations of that master scoundrel. But Hathaway was himself no novice in falsehood and hypocrisy, and within a few days before his exposure, a hoodwinked bank president pronounced him, after an examination of his books, to be "perfectly honorable; one of the best business men in Fall River."

How a Young Girl was Treated by the Champions of Christianity in Europe.—The trial of the Russian young lady, Vera Sassulitch, who some weeks ago shot at General Trepoff, the St. Petersburg prefect, curiously illustrates the notions of justice and liberty which prevail in Russia. While a mere girl of seventeen she was arrested and confined for two years in a Lithunian prison without even the pretense of a trial, and for no other reason than that she was a school friend of a sister of a political conspirator. As it was found impossible to allege any offense against her, she was at last liberated. She had scarcely reached home when she was again seized by virtue of an administrative order. She was not even allowed time to take proper clothing with her, and might have died from cold had not a gendarme taken pity on her and covered her with his greatcoat. For seven years she remained in the hands of the police, who removed her from house to house and prison to prison. On her final release it is not much to be wondered at that she formed a resolve to exact vengeance against her chief persecutor. This determination was strengthened by accounts of the barbarous floggings of other political prisoners. It was with the double object of calling attention to those cruelties and avenging her own wrongs that she shot the chief prefect. We must not be surprised that the students sympathized with her; even the draymen of Southwark would have done so.—London Week.

Found Out Early.—Late Terre Haute (Ind.) papers contain full details of a young, straight, well-dressed, genteel clergyman, a few months only from England, named D. R. Boothe, who made his debut in that city, and preached a trial sermon or two very much to the satisfaction of the faithful. He was advertised to preach in two different churches on the same Sunday, morning and evening; but an unfortunate occurrence prevented the carrying out of the programme. One of the frail damsels with which most of our cities are so fully supplied passed by him on the sidewalk and lured him to his hurt. He followed her to her lair, and some too inquisitive spy who had observed the suspicious movement followed carefully, and, unceremoniously breaking into the room occupied by the pair, caught them in flagrante delicto. It soon became noised about the town, and the sleek reverend put his baggage in order and left town on an early train. But what Terre Haute lost some other town may gain.

The Rev. Dr. Crosby of this city is endeavoring to have a bill passed incorporating a Society for the Prevention of Crime. Section 8 of such bill reads as follows: "One half of the fines and one half of the penalties collected by the aid of or through the instrumentality of the society or its agents for the violation of the law shall accrue and be paid for the benefit of the said society." If the said section had read as follows, its real meaning would have been more apparent: "This society is empowered to resort to all sorts of subterfuge, decoying, lying, intrigue, and deception in order to induce weak-minded innocent people to become partners in crime with said society, for which crimes said weak-minded people shall be punished by heavy fines, one half of which fines shall go into the pockets of the clerical speculators in crime composing this society; providing however that said speculators in crime shall always escape the penalties and punishments attached to their half of the crimes committed." This is the plan upon which the Comstock, Britton, & Colgate society operates. Section 8 has been struck out, its nefarious character having been discovered in time by the legisature.

A petition has recently been presented to the Rolls Court in London by the Rev. Frank Besant, the husband of Mrs. Annie Besant, from whom he has been separated for several years. Since the separation, their daughter, who is now about ten years of age, has been under the charge of her mother. Mr. Besant now desires to obtain possession of the child, and alleges that his wife is not a fit and proper person to have charge of their daughter, on the grounds that she is an Atheist and a Malthusian. The notoriety achieved by Mrs. Besant in connection with the famous Bradlaugh-Besant trial has invested the present case with great public interest, which is increased by the announcement that Mrs. Besant intends to argue her own case before the Master of the Rolls. The decison of the question, however determined, is certain to produce a warm and bitter controversy between orthodox Christians and the adherents of the various sects of Rationalists and Freethinkers. The question whether a parent or guardian is disqualified and unfit to have the custody of children on account of holding peculiar opinions in philosophy and religion is certainly a matter of serious consideration involving important and far-reaching consequences. It includes, moreover, a principle, which, if viewed in the light of popular tendencies, is likely to assert itself more and more with increased intensity. The churches everywhere deplore the decay of faith, and it cannot be disputed that skepticism in religion is largely on the increase. This fact, taken in connection with the growing desire to facilitate divorces, renders it highly probable that the Church will become more active in its endeavor to retain and exercise control over the social sacrament of marriage and the religious education of children, and thereby render cases of this kind of frequent occurrence. The petition of Mr. Besant serves to recall the famous decision of Lord Eldon in regard to the poet Shelley, rendered some sixty years ago. Since that time a marked change has taken place in public opinion in matters of religious faith and practice. The decision in this case will serve to show how far the law has been affected in regard to the liberty of opinion.—N. Y. Graphic.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"Half an hour? Why Edith, it is not five minutes," said Sue in surprise, and Charlie was sure it could not have been more than ten minutes, but a glance at the watch Edith held up convinced them that time had flown much faster than they had dreamed of, so Charlie now took his turn on the porch while Edith helped Sue to make a few changes in her dress, having thoughtfully improvised a suitable outfit from her own apparel for the occasion, ere she left home. Sue never looked prettier than she did after she had donned the snow-white dress with its pretty pink ribbons and soft frills of rich old lace about the neck and sleeves, and the slender gold bracelets (Charlie's wedding gift) clasping her round white arms. Her light sunny curls were all the head-dress she needed, and as the long, white veil fell about her, enveloping the whole in its misty folds, she looked like a bride indeed. Edith called Charlie to take one peep before throwing a large light shawl over her to shroud her from observation should they meet a passing traveler on the way to the carriage which had been left waiting at Rose Hill gate. Softly and lightly they sped down stairs, the old woman still slumbered, and mentally shaking the dust from their feet, they passed over the threshold out into the glad, free, world of nature. The carriage was soon gained, and all were swiftly driven to Squire Floyd's, and a few moments more and the two were henceforward one. Sue said she would greatly have preferred that old Mr. Martin had performed the ceremony, but she knew he would not like to do it as he was aware how much her father was opposed to the marriage, but Charlie was better satisfied as it was. He said he did not want any preacher to pow-wow over him, and he was glad for one to be able to set an example that he hoped in time would become universal, that is to never give any Church official the privilege of interfering with any matter that should be the affair of civil and social law. "No one can marry us—that is, bind us really together—save our two selves," continued Charley, "and the only use of any law or ceremony is to make the act legally binding to satisfy the demands of society."

It was just ten o'clock in the evening when the little party drove up the lane and got out at Rose Hill Mansion, which was all one blaze of light; and at the sound of the carriage wheels out came the rush of pattering feet, and glad, happy faces and merry joy-greetings welcomed them. Jennie, Myra, and the two Darwin girls were there, and supper was all ready and waiting for them. Mrs. May had even baked a bride-cake during their absence. Nothing seemed wanting for perfect happiness. Mr. Flowers, being the only gentleman present, would have been somewhat embarrassed, perhaps, had he not been a lawyer, which class of people, you know, are not over-famed for diffidence.

The evening passed delightfully to all, and Sue felt that she was never half so happy in all her life. True, a slight shadow would now and then flit across her fair face as she thought of her father and how much more pleasant it would have been could he have sanctioned her marriage and given them his blessing and countenance. But entire, perfect satisfaction is one of the unattainables; so why wish for or ever expect it? If all of us could have everything we wanted, life would become a vast field of idleness, inactivity, and ennui. No one would want anything more than he had, and all work, strife, competition, and labor would cease. The craving for what we have not is the source of all energy and ambition.

CHAPTER VIII.

Two weeks have flown by since the wedding. Sue and Charlie have been off on a short pleasure trip, flitting hither and thither as "happy as the birds." 'Tis now the day of their expected return. A little company of choice friends have met at the hospitable mansion of old Mr. Flowers to welcome back the bridal pair. Hark! there comes the train. The company crowd out upon the porch, each eager to be the first to greet the young couple. "Save the pieces!" cried Charley, as they swarmed about Sue, hugging and kissing her and asking all manner of questions about their trip.

The first noisy demonstrations over, she escaped from the eager, impetuous group, and, turning to Edith, asked where her dear, darling Jennie was.

"At home," said Edith; "you see, her father did not like her to come here, lest she might be tainted with Universalism."

"Oh, yes; he thinks it a dangerous malady, and fears it's catching," said Myra, laughing.

"And so it is," said Sue. "I've caught lot's of it already, and mean to catch all I can, for it just pours the sunshine into my life; and I'm beginning to learn how much happiness it is possible to crowd into the little hours of one's life. I've got hold of the true thread of existence, and I mean to unwind the whole spool if I live long enough. You see, I shall have to grow fast and enjoy things immensely so as to make up for lost time. Hell dropped out when universal salvation came in, and heaven came to earth when Charlie and I became one; so why should I not just revel in bliss? If religion makes all people as unhappy as it did me, and all men as cold, heartless, and selfish as it does father, the sooner it is rooted out of the world the better."

"And what has become of your father, Sue," asked Myra.

"I was just going to ask Edith that very question myself," said Sue, "for I've never heard a word from him all the time I've been away. You know we made such a flying trip we could leave no address for you to write to."

"Oh! then we know more than you do; and I can tell you beforehand that it isn't much good," said Myra, who never hesitated from any delicacy of feeling about telling unpleasant facts; not that she was a tattler, or fond of giving pain, but she was impulsive, frank, and thoughtless, and enjoyed a bit of gossip, as most people do, if they would confess it. "Now, you see, Sue, the morning after your marriage, Squire Floyd met your father walking up the street, and, being rather fond of a joke, and also, it must be owned, feeling a little glad of a chance to show the old man how nicely he had been outwitted, he walked up to him and congratulated him upon his daughter's having made so good a match. Looking at the squire in amazement, the deacon asked what he meant. 'I mean the marriage of your daughter to Charlie Flowers, of course,' said Mr. Floyd, smiling. 'Why, he is the most talented lawyer in the whole country, and has already established a good paying business in the town of S——, where he lives. Ah, Mr. Conway, you have a son-in-law to be proud of. But, come to think of it,' continued the squire, with a roguish twinkle in his eye, 'I do remember now that you were somewhat opposed to the match; but what is done can't be undone, so I trust that you will make the best of it. They were really the finest-looking couple I ever married.' 'So you did the job, did you? Well, my curse be upon you for it; and may you go to hell, where my infatuated daughter will surely go, now that she has entered that cursed Infidel family.' And the old man turned on his heel and strode back to his home, to find it but too true, that the bird which he thought so securely caged had indeed forever escaped his toils. The old housekeeper said he raved and tore about like a madman, and ordered her at once to leave the house for thus sleeping at her post and neglecting the welfare of his dear insane daughter—for he had made the simple old dame believe Sue was crazy, so as to make her not only afraid to let her out, but to keep her from listening to any appeal Sue might make her. That night old Deacon Slim disappeared, and has never been heard of since. The house is locked up, and all is silent as the grave."

"Poor father!" said Sue. "I hope some day he will see that he is not following the true road to happiness and goodness."

"He is badly organized, and cannot help what he does," said Myra. "He evolutes backward—retrogrades, as Darwin tells us some nations under adverse circumstances do. He has always had his own way too much. Power creates tyrants, and tyrants develop into all manner of vile ways."

"'While there is life there is hope;' so let's hope for the best," said Edith, cheerfully. "We will all enjoy the now and to-day, and think of brighter things."

"Yes; that's true philosophy," said Myra, always quick to grasp a truth. "We'll just offer up a prayer that Mr. Conway may turn Infidel and reform his ways, and then say good-by to all thoughts concerning him for the present."

"If I'm anything of a prophet," whispered Willie Darwin just then in the ear of Myra, "I predict that there is not enough of the milk of human kindness in his wizened-up old body to make a good Infidel out of."

Myra laughed heartily at the idea, and agreed with him entirely, and said that if she ever joined the Liberal ranks she didn't want any such trash as Deacon Slim to be found there.

"I think you two are selfishly having all the fun to yourselves," said Sue, turning to Willie and Myra, who sat just behind her. "Come, let us hear some of it, so we can laugh, too."

"Oh, it's only some of Will's wicked Infidelity," said Myra, "and I'm not going to shock ears polite by repeating it." And she tried to look grave and sober, though her eyes were dancing with fun and merriment.

About an hour before the company broke up, Sue asked Edith to walk out on the back porch with her; and when they had seated themselves upon the little low bench that ran along the end of it, Sue turned to her friend and said, "You can't guess, Edith, what

"No, not unless it be a sweetheart," said Edith, smiling. "You are always wishing me to have one, so perhaps you have stumbled upon the rara avis since you have been away."

"And so I have, and no joke about it. You guessed it right cleverly; now just come into the hall to the lamp, and I'll show him to you."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A Talk with the Evangelists.

BY ELMER WOODRUFF, M.D.

Q.—Did the Jews set a watch at the sepulchre of Jesus?

Matthew (xxvii, 64, 66)—Yes; Pilate commanded his soldiers to watch and make it sure until the third day (xxviii, 2–4); and on the third day there was a great earthquake, which caused the keepers, or watch, to become as dead men. And an angel came from heaven, whose countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow. And he rolled back the stone from the sepulchre, and sat upon it. [Who saw it?]

At this statement, Mark, Luke, and John look wildly at each other in confused astonishment, and say that they waited over thirty years after his resurrection before they wrote their accounts of it, and never heard of this wonderful transaction before, or they would have been sure to have mentioned it.

Q —At what time in the morning did they first come to the sepulchre?

Matthew (xxviii, 1)—As it began to dawn.

Mark (xvi, 2)—At the rising of the sun.

Luke (xxiv, 1)—Very early in the morning.

John (xx, 1)—When it was yet dark.

So, on the whole, we are left to conclude that it was very early in the morning—as it began to dawn; at the rising of the sun; while it was yet dark. Now, the reader is not to compare the statement of the apostles side by side or on a level with similar statements by mankind generally, from the fact that the Church claims that God himself dictated all the words and statements made through these four witnesses; hence they are called "holy." Therefore God is supposed to tell the truth every time, while we admit that statements made by mortal man, not under this divine inspiration which the Church claims for the apostles, are very liable to err (If God wrote this, he must have been "drunk with astonishment," as he has claimed to be before.) and make different statements in regard to the same transaction. But if God talks through them to us, we expect to hear the same story told just alike, in substance at least, every time.

Q.—Who first came to the sepulchre?

Matthew (xxviii, 1)—Mary Magdalene and the other Mary.

Mark (xvi, 1)—It was Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James and Salome.

Luke (xxiv, 10)—It was Mary Magdalene, Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and other women with them.

John (xx, 1)—It was Mary Magdalene, who came alone. [Drunk again!]

Q.—How did they find the stone?

Matthew (xxviii, 2)—There was a great earthquake, and an angel came and rolled it back for them.

Mark (xvi, 3)—And they said, Who shall roll away the stone? And they looked, and it was rolled away.

Luke (xxiv, 2)—They found the stone rolled away.

John (xx, 1)—The stone was taken away.

Q.—Did they see any angels there?

Matthew (xxviii, 2, 3)—Yes, they saw one angel come from heaven, whose countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow.

Mark (xvi, 5)—No; but they saw a young man.

Luke (xxiv, 4)—They saw two young men.

John (xx, 12)—They saw two angels.

Here comment is unnecessary. He is still on the same old fuddle.

Q.—Where were the men or angels when seen?

Matthew (xxviii, 2)—Sitting on the stone at the door of the sepulchre.

Mark (xvi, 5)—In the sepulchre, on the right side.

Luke (xxiv, 3, 4)—In the sepulchre they stood by them.

John (xx, 12)—They were inside the sepulchre; one was at the head and the other was at the feet of where the body of Jesus had laid.

Q.—To whom did Christ first appear after his resurrection?

Matthew (xxviii, 1–9)—To two women.

Mark (xvi, 9)—To one woman.

Luke (xxiv, 13–15)—To two apostles.

John (xx, 14)—To one woman.

1 Corinthians, xv, 5–8.—To Cephas first.

Confusion worse confounded!

Q.—Was there an earthquake at his death or at his resurrection?

Matthew (xxvii, 51–53)—Yes; at his death the earth did quake, and the rocks rent, and the graves were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose and came forth out of their graves, and showed themselves in the holy city to many. And at his resurrection there was another great earthquake. And an angel appeared from heaven, whose face was like lightning, and his raiment white as wool.

Well, Matthew, this was as awful a time as the inhabitants of earth ever witnessed, and must have made a deep and lasting impression upon all in that day and age.

Mark looks confused and red with blushes, and frankly confesses that he never heard of it before.

Luke seems puzzled; says "This is news to me. I have never before heard or written of earthquakes at either of the times spoken of.

John may well be supposed to blush and become quite nervous, and try to excuse Matthew for this awful statement, saying that his translators must have had more zeal than brains to have got things so mixed up. Very well, John; we will pass on.

Q.—Did Mary tell of the resurrection of Christ to any one?

Matthew (xxviii, 8)—Yes; she ran with fear and great joy to bring the disciples word.

Mark (xvi, 8)—No; they trembled and were amazed; neither said they anything to any man, for they were afraid.

Luke (xxiv, 9)—Yes; they told it to the eleven and all the rest.

John (xx, 18)—Yes; she said she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken to her.

Here Mark becomes nervous and uneasy.

Q.—Had you apostles been taught at this time of the resurrection.

Matthew (xxvi, 32)—Yes; he promised to rise again, and go before us to Galilee.

Mark (x, 32-34)—Yes; that he should be killed, and on the third day rise again.

Luke (xviii, 33; xxiv, 6-8)—Yes; that he should be scourged, and on the third day be raised again.

John (xx, 8, 9)—No; not until we saw did we believe; for as yet we did not know that he must rise again.

Now, John, I am surprised that you or the spirit of truth with which you claim to be inspired should make such a statement as this after writing as you did in the 25th to the 29th verses of your fifth chapter, where you claim that Christ taught that those in their graves should hear the voice of the Son of man and come forth, those that had done good unto the resurrection and life, and they that had done evil unto the resurrection of damnation.

At this announcement John grumbles out something to himself about garbling and additions made by translators of his writings, that he should hardly know them himself the way that they had got them fixed up by this time, and he walks out of the room in a rather impatient mood.

Well, inasmuch as John has left the class and gone off quite disgusted, I will continue to ask a few more questions to the rest, hoping that we may the better understand their teachings by an hour spent in asking them questions, although they all seem confused at times to hear one another make such contradictory statements in regard to what they claim as real facts which took place in those days.

Q.—Well, Matthew and Luke, will you tell me what Jesus taught about the use of swords?

Matthew (xxvi, 52)—He said all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword.

Luke (xxii, 36, 38)—He told us that he that hath no sword should sell his garment and buy one.

Q.—Will you also tell what he said about our enemies?

Matthew (v, 44)—He taught us to love our enemies, bless them that curse you, do good unto them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you.

Luke (xix, 27)—He said in my presence, But those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me.

Very well; let this pass, and proceed.

Q.—Will you also tell me who "begat" Joseph, the husband of Mary?

Matthew (i, 16)—Jacob.

Luke (iii, 23)—Heli.

Q.—Well, Matthew, we have been informed by the Church that Christ was the first fruit of them which slept, or the first one that was ever resurrected from the grave. Will you tell us the facts of the case?

Matthew (xxvii, 52)—Oh, no; he was not the first to be resurrected, for at his crucifixion, three days before his resurrection there was a great earthquake, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose out of their graves, and came forth unto the holy city [Jerusalem], and appeared unto many; and the centurion and those who were watching with him saw the earth quake, and those things which were done. And they feared greatly, saying, Truly, this was the son of God.

And many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus from Galilee. All of this was done before Jesus' body was taken down from the cross. Although some translators have added to my statement by saying that it was after his resurrection, but this is an interpolation and should be enclosed in brackets, as it is in the old styles of Bibles. But you will see by the way my story is told that it could not have been at his resurrection. It was at his crucifixion.

Very well, Mathew; you have made yourself clear and quite well understood.

We will now call back John, and ask him one or two more questions, and then dismiss you all together, feeling satisfied that we have gained knowledge enough on this important subject by the interview to well pay us for our trouble.

Q.—Now, John, I want you and Luke to distinctly state what Jesus taught in regard to hating our brothers.

John (1 Epistle, iii, 15)—He said that whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer.

Q.—Well, Luke, what did he teach you about it?

Luke (xiv, 26)—He said if any man come unto him, and hated not his father, mother, wife, brother, and sister, he could not be his disciple.

Well, Luke, there is not much Freelove connected with such teachings as these, and we are happy to say that in most other places in your writings he has contradicted the above sentiments.

Q.—And if you all will now be so kind as to tell us whether he called himself the Son of God or not, and who did call him so, and how many times he called himself the Son of man, etc., we will then dismiss you all, with the warmest thanks for the promptness with which you all have answered these questions, and hoping the world will understand your writings the more clearly for our trouble at this time in putting your answers to the various questions in the present form.

Mathew says he was knowing to his calling himself the Son of man 29 times; Mark, 11 times; Luke, 23 times; John, 11 times; total, 45.

He is called the Son of David in Matthew 7 times; in Mark, 2 times; total, 9 times.

He calls himself the Son of God in Matthew, 0 times; in Mark, 0 times; in Luke, 0 times; in John, 0 times total, 0 times.

He is called the Son of man by the multitude in Matthew 4 times; in John, 4 times; total, 8 times.

Is called the son of Joseph in Matthew once; Luke, three times; in John, twice; total, six times.

Is called Son of man by the apostles in Matthew three times; Mark, once; total four times.

"Devils" call him the Son of God in Matthew once; in Luke, twice; total, three times.

The multitude call him the Son of God in Matthew once; in John, twice; total, three times.

Multitude call him Son of David in Luke twice; total, two times.

"Unclean spirits" call him Son of God in Mark twice; total, two times.

Is called the carpenter's son of Mary in Mark once; total, one time.

Is called the Christ of God in Luke once; total, one time.

Is called the Son of God by John seven times; total, seven times.

Q.—Now, in conclusion, I wish to ask you all one more question; it is this: Have you, in all your writings, ever claimed that the writings were written by the inspiration of God? or has the Church claimed this for you?

All answer with one accord that they have never hinted the thing at all in all their writings; and if it is claimed for them it is more than they ever claimed for themselves; the Bible heads their writings "according to" Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. And how much of what is now printed was their original writings remains for each reader to judge after reading and comparing the above quotations and answers by the apostles, as now printed. And what is the testimony of Christ being the son of God? He himself denies it forty-five times, and others for him thirty times, making seventy-five statements to the contrary; while devils, unclean spirits, and the multitude call him the Son of God only eight times. Still, with this testimony of ten to one to the contrary in the Bible itself, the Church persists in calling him the Son of God! I ask, Of what avail is testimony?

With these few remarks we will now close this catechism, and dismiss these four apostles from the stand of investigation with our warmest thanks, and say to the kind reader that we have put this scripture in this form hoping by so doing that he has noticed some peculiar readings which he has never noticed before. If this is the case, and the real truth in regard to these scriptures doth more freely abound, then the object of the author has been, in part, at least, realized.

To the law of accumulative adaptation there closely follows a third law of direct or actual adaptation, the law of correlative adaptation. According to this important law, actual adaptation not only changes those parts of the organism which are directly affected by its influence, but other parts also not directly affected by it. This is the consequence of organic solidarity, and especially of the unity of the nutrition existing among all the parts of every organism. If, for example, the hairiness of the leaves increases in a plant by its being transferred to a dry locality, then this change reacts upon the nutrition of other parts, and it may result in a shortening of the parts of the stalk, and produce a more contracted form of the whole plant. In some races of pigs and dogs—for example, in the Turkish dog—which by adaptation to a warmer climate have more or less lost their hair, the teeth also have degenerated. Whales and Endentata (armadillos), which by their curious skin-covering are removed from the other mammals, also show the greatest deviations in the formation of their teeth. Further, those races of domestic animals (oxen and pigs) which have acquired short legs have, as a rule, also a short and compact head. Among other examples, the races of pigeons which have the longest legs are also characterized by the longest beaks. The same correlation between the length of the legs and beaks is universal in the order of stilted-birds (Grallatores), in storks, cranes, snipe, etc. The correlations which thus exist between different parts of the organism are most remarkable, but their real cause is unknown to us. In general, we can of course say, the changes of nutrition affecting an individual part must necessarily react on the other parts, because the nutrition of every organism is a connected, centralized activity. But why just this or that part should exhibit this or that particular correlation is in most cases quite unknown to us. We know a great number of such correlations in nutrition; they are especially seen in those changes of animals and plants which give rise to an absence of pigment (noticed previously)—in albinoes. The want of the usual coloring matter goes hand in hand with certain changes in the formation of other parts; for example, of the muscular and osseous system, consequently of organic systems which are not at all ultimately connected with the system of the outer skin. Very frequently albinoes are more feebly developed, and consequently the whole structure of the body is more delicate and weak than in colored animals of the same species. The organs of the senses and nervous system are in like manner curiously affected when there is this want of pigment. White cats with blue eyes are nearly always deaf. White horses are distinguished from colored horses by their special liability to form sarcomatous tumors. In man, also, the degree of the development of pigment in the outer skin greatly influences the susceptibility of the organism for certain diseases; so that, for instance, Europeans with a dark complexion, black hair, and brown eyes become more easily acclimatized to tropical countries, and are less subject to the diseases there prevalent (inflammation of the liver, yellow fever, etc.) than Europeans of white complexion, fair hair, and blue eyes.

Among these correlations in the formation of different organs, those are specially remarkable which exist between the sexual organs and other parts of the body. No change of any part reacts so powerfully upon the other parts of the body as a certain treatment of the sexual organs. Farmers who wish to obtain an abundant formation of fat in pigs, sheep, etc., remove the sexual organs by cutting them out (castration), and this is indeed done to animals of both sexes. The result is an excessive development of fat. The same is done to the singers in certain religious corporations. These unfortunates are castrated in early youth, in order that they may retain their high boyish voices. In consequence of this mutilation of the genitals, the larynx remains in its youthful stage of development. The muscular tissues of the body remain at the same time weakly developed, while below the skin an abundance of fat accumulates. But this mutilation also powerfully reacts upon the development of the nervous system, the energy of the will, etc., and it is well known that human castrates, or eunuchs, as well as castrated animals, are utterly deficient in the special psychical character which distinguishes the male sex. Man is a man, both in body and soul, solely through his male generative glands.

These most important and influential correlations between the sexual organs and the other parts of the body, especially the brain, are found equally in both sexes. This might be expected even á priori, because in most animals the two kinds of organs develop themselves from the same foundation, and at the beginning are not different. In man, as in the rest of the vertebrate animals, the male and female organs in the original state of the germ are entirely the same, and the differences of the two sexes only gradually arise in the course of embryonic development (in man, in the ninth week of embryonic life), by one and the same gland developing in the female as the ovary, and in the male as the testicle. Every change of the female ovary, therefore, has a no less important reaction upon the whole female organism than every change of the testicle has upon the male organism. Virchow has expressed the importance of this correlation in his admirable essay on "Das Weib und die Zelle" ("Woman and the Cell"), in the following words: "Woman is woman only by her sexual glands; all the peculiarities of her body and mind, of her nutrition and her nervous activity, the sweet delicacy and roundness of her limbs, the peculiar formation of the pelvis, the development of the breast, the continuance of the high voice, that beautiful ornament of hair on her head, with the scarcely perceptible soft down on the rest of the skin—then again, the depth of feeling, the truth of her direct perceptions, her gentleness, devotion, and fidelity—in short, all the feminine qualities which we admire and honor in a true woman are but a dependence of the ovary. Take this ovary away, and the man-woman stands before us—a loathly abortion."

CORRELATIONS OF THE SEXUAL GLANDS.

The same close correlation between the sexual organs and the other parts of the body occurs among plants as generally as among animals. If one wishes to obtain an abundance of fruit from a garden plant, the growth of the leaves is curtailed by cutting off some of them. If, on the other hand, an ornamental plant with a luxuriance of large and beautiful leaves is desired, then the development of the blossoms and fruit is prevented by cutting off the flower buds. In both cases one system of organs develops at the cost of the others. Thus, also, most variations in the formation of leaves in wild plants result in corresponding transformations of the generative parts or blossoms. The great importance of this "compensation of development," of this "correlation of parts," has been already set forth by Goethe, by Geoffroy St. Hilaire, and other nature-philosophers. It rests mainly upon the fact that direct or actual adaptation cannot produce an important change in a single part of the body, without at the same time affecting the whole organism.

The correlative adaptation between the reproductive organs and the other parts of the body deserves a very special consideration, because it is, above all others, likely to throw light upon the obscure and mysterious phenomena of indirect or potential adaptation, which have already been considered. For just as every change of the sexual organs powerfully reacts upon the rest of the body, so on the other hand every important change in another part of the body must necessarily more or less react on the sexual organs. This reaction, however, will only become perceptible in the formation of the offspring which arise out of the changed generative parts. It is, in fact, precisely those remarkable and imperceptible changes of the genital system (in themselves utterly insignificant changes)—changes of the eggs and the sperm—brought about by such correlations, which have the greatest influence upon the formation of the offspring, and all the phenomena of indirect or potential adaptation previously mentioned may in the end be traced to correlative adaptation.

NEWTON.—UNIVERSAL GRAVITATION.

Isaac Newton, the most illustrious of English savants, was born in the year 1642, at Woolstrop, Lincolnshire. He is justly placed in the front rank of mathematicians, natural philosophers, and astronomers, yet it may be said with a degree of truthfulness, that his discoveries were, to a certain point, led up to by Descartes. His mother had intended to make a farmer of him, but he showed no aptitude for that calling, and she allowed him to follow his own inclinations. He was sent at the age of thirteen to Cambridge, where Dr. Barrow was his mathematical tutor. He soon learnt more than his tutor knew, and made his greatest discoveries in mathematics before he was twenty-three years of age; more particularly that of the binomial named after him, and of the infinitesimal calculation which he called the calculus of fluxions (differential calculus).

In 1665 he left Cambridge in consequence of the plague, and returned to Woolstrop, where it is said he saw that celebrated apple fall which led to his first ideas of universal gravitation and the system of the universe. But he abandoned the subject for a time after an attempt to verify his theory by a calculation which failed, because he had employed an erroneous measure of the earth's radius.

It is stated that in 1692 his reason temporarily gave way, either as the result of a fire which destroyed several of his papers, or because he had labored too hard, and after that time, he did not publish any work of importance, contenting himself with a revision of what he had already published.

In 1699 the French Academy of Sciences elected him a foreign associate, and in 1703 the Royal Society chose him as President, which title he retained until his death. His latter years were embittered by a dispute in which he was engaged with Leibnitz, whom he accused of plagiarism, the result of which was that, while Newton was admitted to have the priority, Leibnitz, on the other hand, proved that he had also made the same discovery.

His profound knowledge of mathematics led him to the discovery of the curve described by a body in its revolution round a centre, to which it is attracted by a force proportional to the mass of the central body, and decreasing according to the laws of gravity. He thus ascertained that all the celestial bodies revolve in the four principal curves of the conic sections, viz., the planets in ellipses, the satellites in circles, the comets parabolically, or hyperbolically.

The summary of his system is this: Just as all weighty bodies gravitate to the earth's center, so do the bodies which compose the universe gravitate, by the force of attraction, towards the sun, which is their common center. But as to the planets, if they were only governed by the force of attraction, that is to say, by the force which the sun exercises in attracting them towards itself, they would gradually be drawn into that celestial body. Newton adduced two moving powers inherent in the universe, the first of which was a centripetal force impelling the planets toward the sun; the second a centrifugal force, which hunted them away from it, the one counterbalancing the other.

Thus, the earth, instead of being carried far away from the sun by the centrifugal force, is maintained, by the action of the two combined, in its orbit, and compelled to describe around it an ellipse, of which it occupies one of the foci.

In discussing this subject Newcomb says: "The real significance of Newton's great discovery of universal gravitation is fully appreciated by but few. Gravitation is generally thought of as a mysterious force, acting only between the heavenly bodies, and first discovered by Newton. Had gravitation itself been discovered by Newton as some new principle, to account for the motions of the planets, it would not have been so admirable a discovery as that which he actually made. Gravitation, in a somewhat limited sphere, is known to all men. It is simply the force which causes all heavy bodies to fall, or to tend towards the center of the earth. Every one who had ever seen a stone fall, or felt it to be heavy, knew of the existence of gravitation. What Newton did was to show that the motions of the planets were determined by a universal force, of which the force which caused the apple to fall was one of the manifestations, and thus to deprive the celestial motions of all the mystery in which they had formerly been enshrouded. To his predecessors the continuous motion of planets in circles or ellipses was something so completely unlike any motion seen on the surface of the earth that they could not imagine it to be governed by the same laws; and, knowing of no law to limit the planetary motions, the idea of the heavenly bodies moving in a manner which set all the laws of terrestrial motion at defiance was to them in no way incredible.

"The idea of a cosmical force emanating from the sun or the earth, and causing the celestial motions, did not originate with Newton. We have seen that even Ptolemy had an idea of a force which, always directed towards the center of the earth, or, which was to him the same thing, towards the center of the universe, not only caused heavy bodies to fall, but bound the whole universe together. Kepler, also, maintained that the force which moved the planets resided in and emanated from the sun. But neither Ptolemy nor Kepler could give any adequate explanation of the force on the basis of laws seen in action around us; nor was it possible to form any conception of its true nature without a knowledge of the general laws of motion and force, to which neither of these philosophers ever attained.

"The great misapprehension which possessed the minds of nearly all mankind till the time of Galileo was that the continuous action of some force was necessary to keep a moving body in motion. That Kepler himself was fully possessed of this notion is shown by the fact that he conceived a force acting only in the direction of the sun to be insufficient for keeping up the planetary motions, and to require to be supplemented by some force which should constantly push the planet ahead. The latter force, he conceived, might arise from the rotation of the sun on his axis. It is hard to say who was the first clearly to see and announce that this notion was entirely incorrect, and that a body once set in motion and acted on by no force would move forwards forever—so gradually did the great truth dawn on the minds of men. It must have been obvious to Leonardo da Vinci; it was implicitly contained in Galileo's law of falling bodies and in Huyghens' theory of central forces; yet neither of these philosophers seems to have clearly and completely expressed it. We can hardly be far wrong in saying that Newton was the first who clearly laid down this law in connection with the correlated laws which cluster around it. The basis of Newton's discovery were these three laws of motion:

"First Law.—A body once set in motion and acted on by no force will move forwards in a straight line and with a uniform velocity forever.

"Second Law.—If a moving body be acted on by any force, its deviation from the motion defined in the first law will be in the direction of the force, and proportional to it.

"Third Law.—Action and reaction are equal and in opposite directions; that is, whenever any one body exerts a force on a second one, the latter exerts a similar force on the first, only in the opposite direction.

"The first of these laws is the fundamental one. The circumstance which impeded its discovery, and set man astray for many centuries, was that there was no body on the earth's surface acted on by no force, and therefore no example of a body moving in a continuous straight line. Every body on which an experiment could be made was at least acted on by the gravitation of the earth—that is, by its own weight—and, in consequence, soon fell to the earth. Other forces which impeded its motion were friction and the resistance of the air. It needed research of a different kind from what the predecessors of Galileo had given to physical problems to show that but for these forces the body would move in a straight line without hindrance.

"We are now prepared to understand the very straightforward and simple way in which Newton ascended from what he saw on the earth to the great principle with which his name is associated. We see there is a force acting all over the earth by which all bodies are drawn towards the earth's center. This force extends without sensible diminution, not only to the tops of the highest buildings, but of the highest mountains. How much higher does it extend? Why should it not extend to the moon? If it does, the moon would tend to drop to the earth, just as the stone thrown from the hand does. Such being the case, why should not this simple force of gravity be the force which keeps the moon in her orbit and prevents her from flying off in a straight line under the first law of motion? To answer this question it was necessary to calculate what force was requisite to retain the moon in her orbit, and to compare it with gravity. It was at that time well known to astronomers that the distance of the moon was sixty semidiameters of the earth. Newton at first supposed the earth to be less than seven thousand miles in diameter, and consequently his calculations failed to lead him to the right result. This was in 1665, when he was only twenty-three years of age. He laid aside his calculations for nearly twenty years, when, learning that the measures of Picard in France showed the earth to be one-sixth larger than he had supposed, he again took up the subject. He now found that the deflection of the orbit of the moon from a straight line was such as to amount to a fall of sixteen feet in one minute, the same distance which a body falls at the surface of the earth in one second. The distance fallen being as the square of the time, it followed that the force of gravity at the surface of the earth was thirty-six hundred times as great as the force which held the moon in her orbit. This number was the square of 60, which expresses the number of times the moon is more distant than we are from the center of the earth. Hence the force which holds the moon in her orbit is the same as that which makes a stone fall, only diminished in the inverse square of the distance from the center of the earth.

"To the mathematician the passage from the gravitation of an apple to that of the moon is quite simple; but the non-mathematical reader may not, at first sight, see how the moon can be constantly falling towards the earth without ever becoming any nearer. . . . Any one can understand the law of falling bodies, by which a body falls sixteen feet the first second, three times that distance the next, five times the third, and so on. If, in place of falling, the body be projected horizontally, like a cannon ball, for example, it will fall sixteen feet out of a straight line in which it is projected during the first second, three times that distance the next, and so on, the same as if dropped from a state of rest.

"Our next step is to extend gravitation to other bodies than the earth. The planets move around the sun as the moon does around the earth, and must, therefore, be acted on by a force directed towards the sun. This force can be no other than the gravitation of the sun itself. A very simple calculation from Kepler's third law, shows that the force with which each planet thus gravitates towards the sun is inversely as the square of the mean distance of the planet."

Newton calculated the motions of the satellites and the routes followed by the planets with an accuracy confirmed by subsequent observations. The flood and ebb of the sea, the precession of the equinoxes, the mutation of the earth's axis, the difference between the true and the mean time are effects, claimed by Newtonists, evolved from the law of universal gravitation. There are those, however, who deny Newton's theory to be correct and who wholly set aside his doctrine of universal gravitation, some substituting the term equilibrium for gravitation. But by whatever name it may be called it must be admitted that there is a force in the universe which keeps the sun and planets in their proper positions and whether this is accomplished by two forces or a single one, perhaps, may never be fully determined.

NO. XV.

PRIMITIVE ANIMAL LIFE.

My Dear Readers: You can hardly expect me to enter into full details as to all the lower forms of animal life which by degrees grew out of the rudimentary forms mentioned in my last letter. The numbers of the varied kinds were so great that it would be tedious to you, as well as to myself, to enter elaborately into a description of all of them. But I wish to assure you that the diverse forms of life which came into existence from the vitalizable slime, or protoplasm, were at first but a simple step from the unorganized condition of almost vitalized matter. If it did not possess organic life it did possess the necessary qualities to produce it. The properties or substance of inorganic matter are the same as in the organic matter, and to change the former into the latter was the process called spontaneous generation. It has long been thought that this change was the work of a supernatural creative power, but it is altogether a mistake. It was a perfectly natural process, and was not supernatural in the slightest sense of the term. Spontaneous generation has been constantly taking place ever since the waters surrounding the earth were able to assume the fluid condition and the heat had become so reduced that animal life was possible. The conditions existing on the surface of the earth are materially different from what they were a few millions of years ago. At that time there was far more carbon in the atmosphere than at present, and that is a very essential quality for the production of animal life. The waters of the ocean were also less salt than now, and many other conditions have materially changed. And though it was far easier for low forms of life to come into existence then than now, still, as I said, the process has ever since been kept up, and is taking place to-day in the waters of the ocean, even at depths of from twelve to twenty-five thousand feet. The lowest form of life, called monera, as described in my last, are coming into existence in myriads at the present time.

The slime or protoplasm, or the form of matter containing the properties of supplying cells or cellular substance, which, by the agencies of the universe was brought into extensive existence in primeval times, contained carbon largely, with oxygen, nitrogen, sulphur, and some other properties in minute proportions. These were the essential ingredients for the production of animal life, and when, by the vitalizing forces of heat, light, magnetism, and electricity, this albuminous mass was converted first into simple cells, and then into an aggregation or a colony, or a republic of cells, it was, I say, but a mere step from the inorganic to the organic, and it was no more of an extra effort of nature than anything else which she has accomplished. When the possibility of producing one cell existed, the possibility of the production of millions upon millions of them was no more an effort or an impossibility. A simple cell is a simple life, and the combination of cells with subsequent progression or development constitutes the higher forms of life, from the lowest to the highest conditions. Here is the whole question of the production of life in a nutshell; nature did it all, and all that Jah and I had to do was to look on and witness how beautifully the grand system worked.

After the suns and worlds had been brought to the advanced condition they had then arrived at, and we saw them divided off into their appropriate systems, revolving and inter-revolving around their several centers with the utmost accuracy and harmony, it was pleasant to watch and witness the unfolding of organic life from the inorganic state. Few phenomena since the very dawn of the universe have been so replete with interest and so worthy of contemplation. I was able to see in these primary developments the germ movement of grand and extensive forms of life which in later times must come upon the earth; and I derived peculiar pleasure from the study. I exchanged views and suggestions often with Jah upon this subject of individual life. Many were the times that we conversed upon this absorbing theme; and I noticed, when he wanted to add to his fund of information upon the subject, or to know how far my studies had progressed, he was very fond of plying me with almost numberless interrogatories, the responses to which he waited for with anxious interest. Had our conversations upon these scientific themes been fully reported, they would have made interesting and instructive reading in the thousands of years that have since supervened.

I do not pretend to say that animal life was brought into existence upon your globe before upon any other, but I will tell you that this globe of yours was among the earliest upon which organized life existed. There are many other worlds upon which life did not take place till millions of years after it was an accomplished fact here; and there are large numbers of suns and worlds upon which to this day there are no forms of organized life, simply because the conditions necessary for its production and maintenance do not exist there.

The fact of animal life having been successfully produced in the lowest and simplest forms was but the work of time and the ceaselessly active forces constantly evolving from the simple life-cells the higher and more complicated types. This, you will readily understand, was not a rapid process, but was slow and gradual, keeping pace at all times with existing conditions and forces. With ever-varying conditions and influences the forms of life were modified, but in all cases progressing, developing, and evolving through all the lower grades of animal life, the classifications of which are termed, as I remarked in my last, Protozoans, as infusoria, rhizopods, animalcules, sponges, etc.; then Radiates—having the organs within the animal as well as without, radiately arranged, much like the parts of a flower—as polyps, medusæ, jelly-fish, coral animals, star-fishes, etc.; next, Mollusks—having soft bodies without articulations, and having the main nervous cord ventral—as oysters, clams, snails, cuttle-fish, etc.; then Articulates—having the body and members articulated, but without a jointed, bony skeleton, and the main nervous cord ventral—as crabs, lobsters, with the almost endless varieties of insects, beetles, butterflies, spiders, centipedes, and worms of all kinds. The highest class, Vertebrates, having an internal, jointed, bony skeleton, a brain, a spinal cord along the back—consisting of fishes, reptiles, as lizards, turtles, snakes, frogs, birds, and, lastly, mammals, as quadrupeds and bipeds, or man.

These classifications embrace, as you know, a very wide range of animated existence; and it may seem strange to you how so great a variety could originate from a common source; but you must bear in mind that the great and varying influences of light, heat, magnetism, and electricity, with thousands of other almost nameless conditions, have been the agencies that have produced all these multiform changes and varieties. As I said, these have in no instance been rapid or sudden. Remember, millions of years have passed away since animal life first appeared on your globe, and the evolutions that have occurred to produce all the forms of life that have existed—many of which have passed away—have been the consequence of millions of varieties of conditions, including climate, light, heat, moisture, and all the forces which exist in the universe. Millions of forms of genera, species, and varieties that once had an existence in the waters and upon the lands of the globe have passed out of existence, and are no more to be found. This has resulted exclusively from the change in existing conditions. Your world has had many eras since the time of which I am now writing, and those eras have been attended with different conditions and surroundings, and, as a consequence, each has had special and marked features peculiar to itself. Changes have not only taken place between the species and varieties and genera, but in instances where the variety has been preserved the modifications in form, size, and general appearance of the kind of animal life have been much greater than you would suppose. I cannot too strongly impress upon your minds that every change that has taken place in animal existence has been extremely gradual and moderate. No deviation was noticeable at the time, so that the process was almost imperceptible; but in the course of thousands of years the most marked changes have taken place; and by this means innumerable species and varieties have come and gone, and for thousands of years more will continue to come and go.

It would be interesting to examine in detail hundreds of the different varieties of animated life that have been conspicuous upon the globe, but the subject would doubtless be too extensive to take up in these letters, but I cannot forego the pleasure of making a few remarks about the little polyps called the coral insect. The varieties of this little animal number fully forty, having different shapes and appearances; some branching like a plant and others massive or tubular. It is a common notion that the coral is built by an insect, and that the coral animals build at will as the bee builds the honeycomb, or as a mason builds a stone or brick wall, but it is a mistaken one. The coral, rather, is the frame-work or skeleton, or an aggregate of skeletons, and is a necessary result of their existence, and is entirely independent of the volition or will of the animals themselves. The truth is the polyps form, the coral in a manner not unlike that in which the higher animals form bones. The coral is inside the polyps and is in no sense a house for containing the animal. It is only when the polyp dies, withers, and disappears that the solid coral appears. From the resemblance to plants which certain varieties bear they were regarded as belonging to the vegetable kingdom, while later they have been regarded as partaking of the character of both the animal and the vegetable kingdoms, but now their strictly animal character is sufficiently established. The forms of hues exhibited by them are almost endless. In some tropical seas where these polyps especially flourish they rival in varied and graceful forms and in beauty and splendor of colors the most beautiful flower gardens in the world. There is scarcely a form of vegetation, either trunk or branch, leaf or flower, fern, lichen, or fungus, that is not imitated with striking exactness by those wonderful animals of the sea.

It is astonishing to know what vast reefs and islands have been built up by these industrious little specimens of animal life. Coral islands are found in various parts of the ocean, but chiefly in the warmer portions of the globe. Usually they are of a form approaching the circular, and the water is shallow in the center, but surrounded often by a deep and unfathomable sea. When the reef is so high as to remain nearly dry at low water, the animals leave off building, and then the rim or edge of the great basin becomes covered with a calcareous sand, which offers a foundation for the growth of marine vegetables and afterwards a resting-place for the seeds of trees and plants cast upon it by the waves. Trunks of trees also, carried by rivers from continents and islands, after their long wanderings, are often tossed ashore, and sometimes carry with them small animals, such as lizards and insects, which become the first inhabitants of the new island thus brought into existence. The Pacific ocean, throughout a space comprehended between the thirtieth parallel of latitude on each side of the equator, is a great nursery of coral islands, as are also the Arabian and Persian gulfs. Between the coast of Malabar and that of Madagascar there is a great sea of coral. There is an unbroken reef on the coast of Australia, three hundred and fifty miles in length, and between that country and New Guinea, coral formations extend a distance of seven hundred miles.

The growths of coral islands, when compared with your observations of events, seem slow; but as slow as they are, they have produced results of tremendous importance in affecting the general condition of the earth's crust. Their circular form, the steep angle at which they plunge into the sea, and the countries in which they are found, they have been believed to be the craters of extinct and submerged volcanoes; for occasionally lava and volcano rocks have been found in their central lagoons, which have generally a deep, narrow passage, kept open by the efflux of the ocean at low tides. Coral formations are among the oldest rocks upon the face of your globe, as well as among the latest formations. The ancient limestones of the Silurian and Devonian periods, the vast masses of carboniferous limestones underlying the coal measures, the limestones of the coral reef, and among others of the secondary age, with those at present in course of formation in many parts of the world, are all essentially the same—carbon and lime.

But I fear I am wandering from the subject, or am anticipating somewhat. Pardon me for the digression. I will detain you no longer at this time.

I hardly need assure you that I remain your fast friend,

LUCIFER,

Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Devil Worshipers.

In primitive times, people believed that there were two invisible but powerful beings, who had control over the world, and governed all things in it as suited their own wishes and purposes. They supposed them to be equal in power, but entirely different in disposition, and antagonistic in their aims and purposes. One they called good or God, and believed that he did everything in his power to render the people happy. The other they called evil or Devil, believing that he took delight in making everybody and everything as miserable as possible. The first they loved, but did not fear, as they believed he would not willingly harm them under any circumstances. The other they did not love, but their fear of him was greater than their love of the good being, and they were extremely careful not to offend him for fear of punishment. To appease this malignant demon, and keep on good terms with him, they built temples dedicated to him, and kept on the altars a full supply of everything they supposed would be pleasing to his palate. They obeyed his commands most implicitly, and worshiped with a homage so servile, that the devil himself could not doubt their sincerity. Believing that he wished them to be miserable, they made themselves so, and believing that he was displeased when they were happy, they never did any act tending to make themselves or others happier until they had sacrificed to the demon, or paid a tribute and got a license from him to perform the desired action. These were the Devil Worshipers, and although their belief and practices have been greatly modified, they are far from being extinct. Their influence is still felt. Their temples are now dedicated to the good spirit, but the fear of the vengeance of the evil one is still potent, and controls the action of Church and State. It is only necessary to show that a certain line of conduct will produce pleasure or happiness to call down upon it their most determined opposition. Even the innocent pastime of dancing is condemned by them, not because there is any harm in it, but because it gives pleasure to those engaged in it; but their most bitter and venomous opposition is directed against the "human form divine" and its propagation. Man is made in the image of God, and hence is an object of hate to the Devil and his worshipers. His body must be closely covered, for if any part is exposed to view, they will cry out indecent—indecent—and have the offender arrested and fined, or imprisoned for indecent exposure. Everything else in creation may be shown as it is, and no thought of indecency be entertained, but the likeness and image of God alone is highly indecent according to the notions of the devil worshipers, while the pure in mind look upon it as the most perfect and beautiful of all existing forms. The idea that the human body or any part of it is vile and indecent, originated with the devil worshipers, and is peculiar to them. All animals may be propagated with impunity, but let the female man attempt to propagate without first obtaining a license from the devil worshipers, and she is at once ostracised and may expect bitter persecution for the remainder of her life. They act as if they sincerely believed that when God Almighty made man male and female, and commanded them to increase and multiply, he showed himself to be an indecent old fool. Their doctrines of original sin and total depravity are fully exemplified in themselves and nowhere else. With their solemn faces, and their sanctimonious drawl, they are living examples of innate "cussedness," promising sprouts from their "heavenly father, the Devil." Instead of using every effort to establish "peace on earth and good will to men," they are as faithful servants as the devil need desire. Look at Europe, and see what every nation there has been doing for the last century. Can you point out a single year in which some one of her nations has not been engaged in a war? Can you point out a single nation whose energies in time of peace have not been expended in preparing for war, or in repairing the damages occasioned by war? And what is war but devil worship on an enlarged scale? And what are the kings and popes and priests of the present day but high priests of Beelzebub? But the time is rapidly approaching when we can write "peace to their ashes." ***

Some of Our Immoral Laws.

We have many laws that are unjust and contrary to liberty. I will enumerate a few of them: Coercive, unionism, property in land, tariff laws, internal revenue laws, exemption laws, public school laws, license laws, laws regulating interest, Sabbath laws, exemption of property from taxation, the power of governments to get in debt, capital punishment, pardoning power of the President and governors, &c.

How to promote morality. Give man a free soil, free trade, governments held together by love instead of bayonets, a legal tender currency based upon individual property, good protection in life, liberty, and property; thus more evenly distributing labor and wealth. Then the masses will have the time and means to acquire knowledge, one of the great factors for promoting morality. Repeal the laws against false morality; make more stringent the laws supporting true morality. Send a man to the penitentiary for telling a lie, make every one pay their debts as long as they have a dollar. Teach your children known facts in morals and science. Leave theories and speculations to adult years. Teach your children to worship humanity and knowledge in preference to God and mammon; Amen. O. JONES.

Science and Theology—Ancient and Modern.

BY JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE.

The spell of sanctity once broken, the Bible once approached, examined, and studied, as other books, an analogous result has followed. The critic has approached tenderly and respectfully, but the approach at all implies an assumption of a right to question the supernatural character of the object of his investigation. Certainty passes into probability, and the difference between certainty and probability is not in degree but in kind. A human witness is subsituted for a divine witness, and faith is changed into opinion. The authority of the translation was the first to be shaken. Then variations in the manuscripts destroyed the confidence in the original text. If the original language was miraculously communicated, there was a natural presumption that it would be miraculously preserved. It had not been miraculously preserved, and the inference of doubt extended backward on the inspiration.

The origin of the different books was next inquired into, with their authorship and antiquity. At each step the uncertainty became deeper. The gospel history itself was found to be a labyrinth of perplexities. The divine sanction for accuracy and authenticity once obscured, the popular sense which had cleared the modern world of superstition, and had driven the supernatural out of secular history, began to ask on what ground the Bible miracles were to be believed if all other miracles were to be rejected. Geology forced itself forward, and declared that the history of the creation in the Book of Genesis was irreconciliable with ascertained facts. Along the whole line the defending forces are falling back, not knowing where to make a stand; and materialism all over Europe stands frankly out and is respectfully listened to when it affirms that the war is over, that the claims of revelation cannot be maintained, and that the existence of God and of a future state, the origin of man, the nature of conscience, and the meaning of the distinctions between good and evil are all open questions.

No serious consequences, at least in England and America, are as yet outwardly apparent. We are a law-abiding race; the mass of us are little given to unpractical speculation. We are too earnest to tolerate impiety, and the traditions of religion will retain their hold with the millions long after they have lost their influence over the intellect. Intellect, we know, is not omniscient. Emotion has a voice in the matter, which is always on the side of faith, and women in such subjects are governed almost wholly by their feelings. The entire generation at present alive may probably pass away before the inward change shows itself markedly in external symptoms. None the less it is quite certain that the ark of religious opinion has drifted from its moorings, that it is moving with increasing speed along a track which it will never retrace, and towards issues infinitely momentous. What are these issues to be? "The thing that hath been, that shall be again."

Once before the civilized nations of Europe had a religion on which their laws were founded, and by which their lives and actions were governed. Once before it failed them, and they were driven back upon philosophy. Allowing for the difference of times, the intellectual phenomena were precisely the same as those which we have ourselves experienced. The philosophic schools passed through the same stages; and the latest of them arrived at the same conclusion, that the universe of things could be explained by natural causes; and as no symptom could be discovered of any special divine interference with the action of those causes, so there was no occasion for supposing that such interference had ever been or ever would be. The scientific triumph, as it was then regarded, was proclaimed as a new message of glad tidings to mankind. It was believed by politicians and philosophers, by poets and historians. It was never believed by the mass of simple-minded people, who held on in spite of it to the traditions of the old faith, till Christianity rose out of the dying ashes of paganism, restored conscience to its supremacy, and made real belief in God once more possible.

Human nature remains what it always was. The nature of God, and the relation in which man stands to God, are the same now as they were when man first began to be. The truth of fact is what it is, independent, happily, of our notions of it. We do not make truth by recognizing it; we cannot unmake truth by denying it. So much of it as it concerns us practically to know we learn by experience, as we learn every natural lesson; and if man is not permitted to live and prosper in this world without an acknowledgement of his Maker, the scientific experiment will fail as it failed before. The existing forms of religion may dissolve, but the truth, which is the soul of religion, will revive more vigorous than ever. The analogy is the more impressive the more closely we compare the details of the two periods.

No one knows distinctly how the pagan religions began. Some say they were corruptions of patriarchal traditions; some trace them to fear and ignorance; some to consciousness of responsibility; some to the involuntary awe forced upon the mind by the star-spangled sky and the majestic motion through it of sun, moon, and planets. All these influences, probably, were combined to excite each other, the last, as was most natural, giving shape and form to the emotion of piety. The number 12 and the number 7, occurring, as they do, in all the old mythologies, point unmistakably to the twelve months and to the seven celestial bodies visible from the earth, which have a proper motion of their own among the stars. However the idea was generated, it seized on the minds of men as soon as born with an irresistible fascination, and took direction of their whole being. The nobler nations assigned to God, or the gods, the moral government of mankind. The will of the gods was the foundation of their legislation. Law was to be obeyed because it was so ordered by the maker and master of the world. The early Greek or Roman directed his whole life by the reference of every particle of it to the gods as entirely as the most devout of Catholic Christians. Meanwhile fancy and imagination wandered in the expanse of possibilities, giving these airy creations a local habitation and a name. The law was stern and severe. A brighter aspect was given to religion in music and song and sacrifice, and legends and heroic tales; and poets watched the changing phenomena of days and nights, and summer and winter, and heat and cold, and rain and thunder, and human life, and wove them all into a mythology, till there was not a river without its god, a grotto without its nymph, a wood without its dryad, a noble, heroic man without a deity for his father. All went flowingly so long as the world was young. The vast fabric of unreality grew on without intention of fraud; but the time came when intellect began to ask questions, and the stories which were related as sacred truths were seen first to be inconsistent, and then to be incredible. The first resource for defense was allegory. The stories about the gods were not true in themselves, but only figuratively true. Behind the ceremonial of the temples lay "the mysteries" in which the initiated were admitted into the real secret. So interpreted, Homer and Hesiod continued to be tolerable. But the strength of the traditions was weakened insensibly by allegoric dilution. When anything might mean anything, men began to ask whether anything at all was known about the gods. They looked round them, and into their own souls, at the phenomena of real experience, and asked what lessons they could discover in facts which could not be disputed.

So began Greek philosophy. The tone at first was reverent. Order and uniformity was manifest throughout the universe, and where order was, it were assumed that there was an ordering mind. Some thought that the origin of things was "spirit," others that it was "matter;" some that spirit and matter were co-eternal, others that matter had been created by spirit out of nothing. It was asked what the nature of spirit was. Was spirit self-existing outside the universe? or was it infused in material substance as the soul of man is in his body? Was it conscious of itself? or was not the most perfect being a serene automaton which needed no consideration, and therefore never reflected upon itself? Again, was spirit intellectual merely, or was it just and good? and if good, whence came evil? Such questions cut deep, but they were not necessarily irreligious. Plato taught a pure theism. Aristotle believed matter to be eternal; he believed God to be eternal also, and the phenomena of existence to result from the efforts of matter to shape itself after the all-perfect pattern which it saw in God. Even Epicurus did not deny that the gods existed. He denied only that there was any trace of their interference with human fortunes.

The difficulty was to account for sin and misery, if a conscious Providence immediately directed everything. The most popular religious solution of the problem was the doctrine of what was called plastic nature. Nature was supposed to be a force developing itself unconsciously and automatically, as the seed develops into the tree, or, as it was ingeniously expressed by Aristotle, "as if the art of the shipwright was in the timbers." Each organ of every living thing corresponded to its functions. But the operations of nature were not mechanical like human contrivances. Organization was governed by laws from within, not by intention directing it from without, and nature being imperfect, and only striving after perfection, being progressive and not yet complete, her creations partook necessarily of her infirmities, and were subject to decay and change. Such a conception of nature was an earlier form of Spinozism. The bird builds its nests, the spider stretches its web automatically. The human craftsman, as he becomes skilled in any art, does his work more and more spontaneously, and with less and less conscious reflection. When he is a master of his business, he makes each stroke as surely, yet with as little thought about it, as he lifts his food to his mouth.

With these and the like ingenious speculations, philosophers endeavored to answer the questions which they put to themselves about their own nature and the world they lived in; religion and the religious rituals all the while being neither abandoned nor denied, but remaining as a dress or a custom which each day was wearing thinner. And human life all the while was real, as it is now, brief, struggling, painful, the plaything of accident, a fire-fly flashing out of the darkness, and again disappearing into it; coming none knew whence, going none knew whither: yet while it lasted, with its passions and its affections, its crimes and its virtues, its high aspirations, its mean degradations, its enthusiasms and its remorse, its wild bursts of joy and agonies of pain, it was an important possession to the owner of it, and speculations about plastic nature would not be likely to satisfy him when he demanded the meaning of it. Yet demand the meaning of it man will and must. Life is too stern to be played with, and as the old creed died into a form, and philosophy proved so indifferent a substitute, dark and terrible notions can be seen rising in Greek poetry; notions that there were gods, but not good gods; notions of an inexorable fate; notions that men were creatures and playthings of powerful and malignant beings who required to be flattered and propitiated, and that beyond the grave lay gloomy possibilities of eternal and horrible suffering. Gone the sunshine of Homer, this healthy vigor, unconscious of itself. Gone the frank and simple courage which met the storm and the sunshine as they came, untroubled with sickly spiritual terrors. In Æschylus, in Sophocles, in Euripides, even in Plato, himself, the prevailing thought is gloomy and desponding. Philosophy, it was plain, had no anodyne to offer against the sad conviction of the nature of man's life on earth, or availed to allay anxiety for what might happen to him hereafter.

In this condition the Romans came into the inheritance of the world, and became its spiritual as well as administrative trustees. Their religion, too, had gone like the Greek. They had allowed the national divinities of Italy to be identified with the gods of Hellas. They had modeled their literature on the Athenian type. They had accepted Greek poetry and philosophy as containing the best which could be felt or known on the great questions which most concerned humanity. But for them some practical theory of life was necessary by which they could rule the present and face the future. They were not a people to be troubled with subjective sorrows. They were earthly, unideal, material in all that they thought and in all that they did. The Roman proconsul, when reminded of "truth," asked scornfully, "What is truth?" That men had bodies he knew well; whether they had souls or not was no matter of present concern.

Roman statesmen, called as they were to govern the human race from the British Channel to the Euphrates, had no leisure for any such idle disquisitions. Their only care was that their subjects should obey their magistrates, live peaceably, thrive, and cultivate the earth. For the rest, each individual, so long as he indulged in no political illusions or enthusiasms, was free to dream or fancy what he pleased. Their own convictions followed the pattern of their government. They had no illusions. The material welfare of man was all that they understood or were interested in, and the creed on which they settled down found an exponent in the greatest of their poets. The practical misery of mankind had risen from wars and crimes. The Romans bade war and crime to cease. The spiritual misery of men had been self-caused by fantastic imaginations, by groundless terrors, by dreams of supernatural powers, whose caprice persecuted them in this world, and whose vindictive malice threatened to make them wretched in the next. Religion had been the curse of the earth, and though fools might still torture themselves with a belief in it, if they so pleased, Lucretius, speaking the very inmost conviction of the imperial Roman mind, informed them that religion was a phantom begotten of fear and ignorance. The universe, of which man was a part, was a system of things which had been generated by natural forces. Gods there might be, somewhere in space, created by nature also, but not gods who troubled themselves about men. All things proceeded from eternity in one unchanging sequence of cause and effect, and man had but to understand nature and follow her directions to create his own prosperity and his own happiness, undisturbed by fear of supernatural disturbance. If the sufferings and enjoyments of this world were distributed by a superintending providence, it was a providence which showed no regard for moral worth or worthlessness. The good were often miserable, the wicked flourished, and a power so careless of justice, even if it existed, did not deserve to be reverenced. But it existed only in the brain of man. Evils, or what were called evils, were a necessary part of an imperfect existence. But evil was disarmed of half its power to hurt when its origin was known, and the more carefully the laws of nature were studied, the more successfully man could contend against it.

Long before Rome became the world's mistress, the theory had been thrown out by Democritus; Epicurus had worked it into shape, and it had been the creed of a sect among the Greeks. As soon as it had become practically embodied in the Roman system of government, it was developed into a plain confession of faith, and as the legions struck down the nationalities of Asia and Europe, the intellect of Lucretius declared the overthrow of their superstitions and proclaimed the sovereignty of science.

Unlike the Greek mythology, the system of Lucretius was not a thing of imagination. Splendidly as his genius illustrated the details of the Epicurean philosphy, the system itself was based on observation of facts astonishingly accurate, if we consider the age at which he lived; and his inferences were drawn in the strictest scientific method. Within the proper limits of physical science he anticipated many of the generalizations of the best modern scientific thinkers. His moral and spiritual conclusions are almost exactly the same as theirs. Spiritual philosophy grows out of general principles, and whether those principles be derived from a wide or limited induction, whether the facts appealed to be completely known or only imperfectly, when once the principles are assumed the same deductions will follow.

Lucretius opens with the most beautiful lines in Latin poetry, describing the sacrifice of Iphigenia at Aulis. His object was to create at once and indelibly the impression which he most desired to convey, of the horrors which had been occasioned by religion and the dread of the unknown. Had he lived in our time, he would have referred to the massacre of St. Bartholomew, to an auto da fe, or to the burning of a witch. Ignorant of the real causes of things, men had ascribed the calamities from which they suffered to evil spirits, whom it was necessary to flatter and appease. They were frightened as children were frightened at the dark. Their terrors would disappear with sounder and clearer knowledge.

As the modern astronomer believes that the solar, and perhaps the sidereal, system was once a mist of fiery dust which became condensed by motion into suns and planets, Lucretius conceives that space was originally filled with atoms like the motes which we see floating in a sunbeam in a dark room. The modern philosopher derives the first motion from a tendency of floating particles of unequal density to rotate. Lucretius postulates a downward tendency with lateral declinations from the properties of the atoms themselves. Motion once given, coherence begins, and matter in combination develops the phenomena which we experience. Atoms, germs, monads—call them what we please—are not things without function or property. They tend to assume forms, and in those forms to acquire new powers. The universe exists, and we exist. To say that it exists, because God willed it so, is to say nothing. God is only a name for our ignorance. We conceive of him as more perfect than matter, as being the cause of matter, and we find no difficulty in making so large an assumption. But it is more easy to conceive that matter may exist with less perfect functions, than God with entirely perfect functions.

The earth, when first formed, was fertile, like a woman in her youth. She produced freely all kinds of living creatures, and in the exuberance of natural fecundity she threw out of herself every variety of combination which could consist with the nature of things. She produced plants, she produced animals; some strong, some weak, some with power to propagate their species in their own likeness, some without that power, some able to support themselves with ease, others with difficulty or not at all. Infinite varieties of living things were thus brought into existence to take their chance of continuance. The most vigorous survived. Lions were preserved by their fierceness and strength, foxes by their cunning, stags by swiftness of foot, man by superior intelligence, and other animals again by man's help, because he found them useful to him, as dogs and horses, sheep and oxen. While assigning to the earth these vast powers of productiveness, Lucretius, nevertheless, limits those powers with curious caution. The earth could create only beings consistent with themselves. Rivers could not be made to run with gold. Trees must bear fruit, not sapphires and emeralds. Horses might be made of many kinds, and men of many kinds; but Centaurs, half horse and half man, could not be made, because a horse grows to maturity with five times the rapidity with which a man can grow.

The readers of Darwin will miss the theory of the modication of species, which it was impossible for Lucretius to have guessed; but they will find nowhere the modern doctrine of the survival of the fittest stated more clearly and carefully. Those who deny most earnestly that any elemental power of spontaneous generation can be traced in operation at present, are less confident that it may not have existed under earlier conditions of this planet, or may not exist at present in other planets. The theory of Lucretius is not in the least more extravagant than the suggestion of Sir William Thompson that the first living germ was introduced by an aerolite.

Hark from Ozark!

Editor of The Index: I have heard the piteous plaint that comes shrilling these many weeks to all Liberal ears from beyond the Mississippi, and now recently wilder and more piercing than before. This wailing wisdom crieth through The Index, but as yet no man regardeth. Let me scream an accordant refrain, and proffer help to a long-suffering soul.

"The Purification of Liberalism" is the moon that is cried for. To be sure—let us purify Liberalism. It is full of all live men's bones, wriggling activities, and squirmings to get out of bad into better conditions. There are "insane and filthy isms," arrayed "in the garb of liberty, claiming fellowship with the Freethinkers' cause." There are Freelovers seeking to deprave total depravity and gild the refined guilt at present prevailing in the relations of sex. There are communists proposing to work together for good, divide equitably, perfect the human home, diffuse education, abolish poverty, and secure general happiness. "It is well known that these social and political fanatics are Freethinkers in religion largely," and persist in joining our Church and baptizing in our portal. Wanted—a sieve, a filter, a blower-fan, or anything to winnow these pestilent fellows out of our ranks. "Must we tamely submit to the injustice of having every abomination taught in the name of Liberalism, because some one will be offended if we make a protest?" I should rather think not—certainly not "tamely." We can go wild over it, and that will help immensely. Sufficient unto ourselves is the purity of Liberalism. We don't want anything reformed but religion; there are no wrongs in the world but those of faith. We can capture the citadel of superstition alone. We want no allies. No Irish need apply! The Liberals shall inherit the earth. We are the Liberals. We are the Czar of all the religions; and the Czar and Ozark are good against the world. We descend from the Ancient of Days; we are blue blood, and we will not defile our nobility by contact with low-down Liberals.

All Liberalism is grass—keep off the grass! We hold all the Freethought aces and all the Liberal bowers, and we propose to play it alone if we get euchred. Nobody shall "assist;" and all players but those of our party are requested to step down and out of the Liberal leagues; also to withdraw all subscriptions from The Index and send their patronage to other journals conducted more in consonance with their debasing views.

"Is Liberalism so elastic in its meaning that it can be made to cover every erratic heresy that all other respectable systems of belief disown?" I am really afraid it is; but the elect Liberals, the saints in the Freethought camp, can remedy that. We can get together, make a platform, and resolve to take all the elastic out of it. We are down on a Liberalism that will stretch so. We can make a lump of putty of it, and limit it so 'twill only cover—well, what shall we tuck in under our non-elastic coverlet? Please tell us, O Czar of Ozark! Plank us down a platform right away, so that Liberals and illiberals may see how thin and narrow it is, and what stripe of Freethought it will exclude.

"I believe in drawing distinctions when distinctions exist." So do we all; and here is one of them: "Did I not think that Liberalism is in danger of becoming a reproach to the cause of Freethought, I should not presume to offer these suggestions." Reverse that sentence, and it is still more fearfully true—Freethought is in danger of becoming a reproach to the cause of Liberalism; and that being the case, the next time I meet my grocer I will raise a row with him for sending me six eggs when I ordered only half a dozen. Rationalism has arrived at a frightful pass if the slightest distinction cannot be recognized and accounted for. In view of all the "dangers," I pronounce for Freethought—no, I reconsider—I mean Liberalism; no, that is too decisive—I am in doubt. I mount the fence and await the platform from Ozark before I dare take sides.

"But my earnestness to see Liberals take the front rank among the best men and women of the age must excuse my freedom in speaking so plainly." That is so. Liberals are a long way behind the orthodox in true morality, honesty, and intelligence. They should bestir themselves and come up to the front rank. To be sure, here comes Allen Pringle reminding us that Prof. Tyndall says they are in the front rank; but he refers only to Atheists pure and simple, and not at all to Freelovers, communists, and filthy ismatics, who are only the bummers and vivandieres hanging around the flanks and rear of the army of Liberalism.

"If I wanted to secure the passage of the Christian Amendment, I could think of no better method of forwarding the movement than by circulating some Liberal books and papers, and by sending certain heroic Liberal speakers through the country to address the masses on the issues of Liberalism." Too true, O sentinel on the watchtower at Ozark! you do well to toot your alarming fog-horn on heroic Liberal speakers. A plague on all heroics! say I. Let's enlist the cowards in Freethought and send them out boldly to address the masses on the issues of Liberalism; and he of Ozark and I will shoulder arms for two. We will be magnificent—in retreat. We have an unparalleled faculty for holding back. Great virtue there is in holding back. The gospel of the turtle is heard in the land, and the race is almost always to the slow. "If I had a donkey what wouldn't go, do you suppose I'd wollop him?" Not much! I would back him to the very ragged edge, and after the breechin' broke it would be time enough to trust in Providence. "Whoa, Emma!" is your true rallying cry. Pass it along the line of Liberal mules, and not a Freelover, nor a communist, nor a sledge-hammer reformer, and especially not a heroic Liberal speaker, will ever bray more. They are a stench in all well-regulated nostrils, and smell to an orthodox heaven. Let's sprinkle on carbonates, and disinfect them out.

"Indeed, I think that skepticism is already spreading faster than conservative Liberalism could desire. The new gospel of liberty is making more converts than it has wholesome provisions for." True again, O sage of Ozark! Here is over-production at an infernal rate. Here, you, Underwood, Jamieson, Green, Ingersoll, and other heroic Liberal speakers—you have been roaming over the country manufacturing Liberals beyond all demand for use or consumption. It is our funeral exclusively, and you ought to be ashamed of yourselves for crowding the elect mourners with more Liberals than the front pews will hold. We accuse you of making too many Liberals; and now there is a glut. You have even made Liberals beyond the means of subsistence, and it has come to that starvation pass where there are no "wholesome provisions for them." The bummers in the rear are left nothing but cold coffee and musty hard tack; and we crême de la crême "in the front rank" will have to take up a collection for them. The conundrum now and henceforth must be, What shall we do with our surplus of Liberals? Shall we be driven to take counsel of Emerson?

> "Men and gods are too extense;
> Could you slacken and condense?
> Earth, crowded, cries, 'Too many men!
> My counsel is—kill nine in ten,
> And bestow the powers of all
> On the remnant decimal.'"

"Me and my wife, my son John and his wife—us four and no more" would then be delightfully realized. The three tailors of Tooley street should be our incomparable model. Despise not the day of small things. Where two or three are gathered together, there will great I, and any amount of mutual admiration, be in the midst. The microscope is our favorite style of spectacle; and our study, the stupendously little. No broad views for us, if you please; no telescopic vision; no outlook beyond the shell in which we were pipped.

"There is yet much good in Christianity for the world." An eminently wise remark, O Radiance from Ozark! Not wholly new, indeed. Joe Cook, I think, cooked it from his inner originality before you did, and Moody has said and Sankey sung it any time during these revival years; but it is one of those precepts which will bear any amount of line upon line, and indifferently from righteous or from Radical lips. There is yet much good in Christianity for the world; so let's call off our heroic Liberal speakers, and not worry the dear old departing guest any more. In the struggling shindies between sectaries and skeptics aforetime, ye have heard it hath been said, "Wheriver ye see a Godhead, hit it." But a new commandment give I unto you: Anoint it with oil; heap coals of fire upon it; keep it warm, and pet and coddle and worship it through the whole of your own useless lives. So shall ye have high ideas of the Most Low; and a liturgy, brought down to the meanest capacity, shall be revealed to a perishing world.

In conclusion, I implore Liberals to look over the last two appeals from Ozark again. Read them twice; yea, study them thrice, and see if they will not agree with me that it is our duty to rush to the rescue—our bounden obligation to come up to the help of this lord of lamentation against the mighty.

Use this letter as you please. I am not afraid of holding back, even if I back down into the bosom of the XIIIth Leo who owns and directs millions of consciences at Rome.

PLANTS IN SLEEPING-ROOMS.—Not to leave the matter in the condition of mere conjecture, I have gathered and analyzed specimens of air from a room containing a few plants. I gathered it from the college greenhouse, where more than 6,000 plants are growing. I gathered the air before sunrise on the mornings of April 16 and 17. The room had been closed for more than twelve hours, and if the plants exhaled carbonic acid to an injurious extent, the analysis of the air from such a room would certainly disclose this fact. The three specimens of air gathered on the morning of April 16, from different parts of the room, gave 4.11, 4.4, and 4.00 parts of carbonic acid in 10,000 of air, or an average of 4.05 in 10,000. The two specimens of air gathered April 17 gave 3.80 and 3.88 parts carbonic acid, or an average of 3.84 parts of carbonic acid in 10,000 of air, while the out-door air contains 4 parts in 10,000. It will thus be seen that the air in the greenhouse was better than "pure country air." This deficiency of carbonic acid was doubtless due to the absorption of carbonic acid and consequent accumulation of oxygen during daylight, since the windows of the greenhouse were closed day and night on account of the cool weather. To ascertain whether the air of the greenhouse had more carbonic acid by night than by day, I gathered two specimens of air in different parts of the house at 2 o'clock, P. M., April 17. These gave 1.40 and 1.38 parts of carbonic acid in 10,000, or an average of 1.39 parts, showing that the night air contained more carbonic acid than did the air of day. Now, if a room, in which were more than 6,000 plants, while containing more carbonic acid by night than by day, contains less carbonic acid than any sleeping room on this continent, we may safely conclude that one or two dozen plants in a room will not exhale enough carbonic acid by night to injure the sleepers.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 43.

GREAT JEHOVAH: Permit us to ask thee a few questions in reference to miracles.

Are not miracles performed only by setting aside the laws of the universe, and wholly in opposition to the natural course of things, and in opposition to all the experience and observations of men?

If thou didst create the universe and didst establish all the laws by which it moves and acts, are not those laws essentially and wholly thine own? and dost thou at any time show so little respect for thine own work as to supersede it and set it aside?

Hast thou in reality at any time found the laws of the universe to be wrong, and that they ought to be superseded? and dost thou regard it as an honor or glory to thyself to declare the laws of thine own establishing to be at fault to the extent that even for a short time they ought to be set aside?

Have not the claims of miracles been the chief foundation upon which the religion of thy son was builded, and the principal reason given why it should be accepted by the world of mankind?

Are not his miraculous conception, the claims of his giving sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, the power of walking to cripples, health to the diseased, life to those who had died, his feeding thousands of people with five loaves and two fishes, his changing water into wine, his casting out devils, his own resurrection from the grave, and, finally, his remarkable ascension into heaven, the reasons given why he should be believed in as thy Son, and that he was sent by thee into the world to bear away, by his death, the sins of the world—or, rather, a very small percentage of them?

The same with the Jews; was not the claim that wonderful miracles were said to have been performed among them the principle reason given why they were thy chosen people and why thou dwelledest with them more especially than with any others of the inhabitants of the earth?

Is it not also true that nearly all the other great systems of religion that have been established in the world have set up the same claims of wonderful miracles? In the primitive days of man's ignorance was not this miracle business crowded upon the general attention far more than in the present age of the world?

Was not Buddhism established by miracles of the most marvelous kind? Was not Buddha said to have performed astonishing miracles himself? and did not his disciples also make the same profession as to themselves?

Did not certain Tirthyas, or heretical teachers, have the audacity to challenge Buddha to contend with them in the working of miracles, the same as the magicians of Egypt were said to have challenged Moses when the frogs, lice, and locusts were produced in such astonishing abundance?

Does not Brahmanism also abound with similar wonderful classes of miracles? Is it not stated in the sacred writings of that religion that in a contest between Nagardjuna and a Brahmin, that the latter produced a magical pond, in the middle of which grew a lotus tree with a thousand leaves, but that Nagardjuna produced a magical elephant which destroyed the magical pond?

Do not the Mongols record some very wonderful performances on the part of a lama or priest named Bogda, who, when some messengers were sent to meet him, raised his hand in a threatening manner towards a river, when the waters turned and ran up hill instead of down as before? Did not that miracle almost throw into the shade the one thou performedst when the Red Sea opened and thy children passed over on dry ground?

Was it not reported of Apollonius of Tyana, that he performed the most incredible miracles during his life time, which was not far from the time thy son is said to have lived? Did he not heal the sick, give sight to the blind, and even raise a person from the dead, or at least is it not so reported of him, and are not the accounts as credible as those of thy son?

Did not the Christian Church abound in pretended miracles for hundreds of years, and do not the priests of that Church still pretend that miracles are performed among them? Does not the image of the Virgin still shed tears on stated occasions, and does not the blood of Jesus, preserved in a vial, still liquify on certain sainted days? Do not the relics of the saints, so carefully preserved, continue to perform astonishing miracles of character and kind too numerous to relate?

Did not the founder of the Mussulman religion claim that for his special benefit he was transported up into the seventh heaven upon his celebrated horse Alborak, and that the journey was performed in a marvelously short space of time?

Do not the Mormons hold on to the same idea in regard to miracles when they declare that an angel brought certain metal plates to their leader, Joseph Smith, upon which plates were engraved in mysterious characters the material of which their Bible is composed?

Are not all the miraculous events narrated by those several parties of the same incredible and absurd character? and do they not all deserve to be treated in the same searching and doubting manner?

May we ask thee, in all seriousness, if there was ever really any such a thing as a miracle performed?

Is it really true that, at the command of a man of only ordinary character, the motion of the heavenly bodies was arrested, and that the sun ceased to move for the better part of a day? Is it not far more probable—yes, a thousand times more probable—that that story was related by some person who knew nothing, and cared nothing about the truthfulness or untruthfulness of the extravagant tale than that such an event ever took place?

Is not the story of thirty thousand feet of water falling upon the surface of the earth within forty days, by which the waters covering the globe were raised to the tops of the highest mountains, of such an extravagant character that no sensible person in this age of the world ought to give credence to it for a moment?

Is not the account of the pairs and sevens of all animated creatures, suited to all zones, and possessed of very different habits and tastes, fed on different food, and requiring different treatment in every particular, being shut up together for more than a year, of the same incredible character—which no man in his sober senses can intelligently believe?

Are not the stories of a man being taken up into the upper atmosphere where heaven is supposed to be located, as was the case with Elijah and Jesus, of such an impossible character as to make them wholly unbelievable?

Not to enumerate all the strange recitals given in the Bible, and which in the light of nature's laws and style of performing her operations, are unworthy of belief, is it not far more rational to conclude that they are the exaggerations of deluded minds, or the inventions of designing, cunning persons, who gave them circulation for a specific purpose, than that they were really the work of thy hands, and that thou supersededst thy own laws for the purpose of performing them. As general intelligence increases in the world, and the myths and fables of the ancient ages of ignorance are giving way, is it not decidedly sensible for men to discontinue the belief in asserted miracles?

Is it not far more conducive to the mental well-being of the race to look to the laws of the universe for all the events that transpire than to be expecting or easily believing that some supernatural power is going to set aside the unfailing laws of the universe for the sake of introducing some useless, untoward result?

Has there ever an event taken place which was not directly the result of natural causes? and are not the powers and forces of the universe sufficient for every needful event, and to perform everything that has been performed or can be produced?

Is there not a marked absurdity in saying that everything is possible with thee? Art thou not governed by laws and circumstances the same as everything else that has an existence?

Canst thou make two mountains without a valley between? Canst thou make a rod just three feet long without two ends? Canst thou make a ten year old boy in fifteen minutes? Canst thou cause twice five and three times five to make the same product? Canst thou be false to the principles of truth and justice? Canst thou operate against thyself and act independently of thyself?

Canst thou not do all these and more of the same character with the same facility as thou canst do anything in opposition to the laws of the universe, which are really thy own laws?

The Great Need of Refinement.

In the issue of The Index of the 2d inst., H. Clay Neville bewails the low tone, unmanliness, coarseness, and insolence of a certain class of Liberal publications, and it pains him that the same are approved and indorsed by so large a number of the Liberals of the country. This cultured writer, by alluding to "The Open Letter to Jesus," "Interrogatories to Jehovah," and "Letters from the Devil," "published in a leading Liberal journal," leaves no doubt as to whom the guilty person is that thus "disgusts the refined feelings of many of the readers of that paper." We are the offending one. It is upon our poor head that rests all the guilt.

While we most profoundly bow before this high priest of propriety, tone, and culture, we hope he will be kind enough not to lay his hand too heavily upon us. Our intentions may be nearly as good as his, and our efforts nearly as effective. At all events, so long as there are thousands of people in this country, of good average common sense, who seem to have a relish for the style which Mr. Neville taboos, we hope he will not object to their being gratified. He should remember that the Liberals of this country are not all H. Clay Nevilles, and are not capable of becoming so. He ought at least to be as willing that their tastes should be consulted as his own. Let him rejoice that there is a Liberal journal of high culture, immaculate purity, and unquestioned respectability, designed expressly for such minds as his own, who are so shocked and outraged by the coarseness and irreverence of more unpretending sheets, and let him be willing that those minds not blessed with his own high taste and extensive acquirements should be supplied with such mental pabulum as seems fitted to their mental digestion. There are thousands in this country who have enjoyed reading the "Open Letter," etc., possibly with as much relish as that with which Mr. Neville devours the highly cultured dissertations and essays from the journal of Cultured Freethought. The masses will not object to his tastes being gratified, and he should not that theirs are. His tastes are far above theirs; but while he gives thanks that such is the case, he ought not to deprive them of the innocent pleasure they may enjoy in their low estate.

That "Open Letter" is doubtless very full of defects, and perhaps is unfit to be read. Comstock certainly thinks so—and he has been paid a good salary to judge what is improper for the people to read. It was written in haste, and perhaps should not have been written at all; but there are many thousands over the land who have enjoyed it hugely; and there are some able men who have written us complimentary letters in reference to it, saying it was "the best thing in its line since Voltaire's time." Of course this is a very extravagant estimate, and was made by men not possessing the cultured taste of H. Clay Neville.

Voltaire is thought to have struck sturdy and effective blows against the errors of superstition and ecclesiasticism, and he used sarcasm and ridicule, and was even called low and vulgar; but no heavier blows have ever been struck at the enormities of priestcraft than fell from his powerful arm. Has Liberalism become so refined, exclusive, and cultured that Voltaire is to be set aside and disowned? Thomas Paine has been credited with urging unanswerable arguments against the myths and fables of ancient times. His reasoning against revelation and supernaturalism has never been refuted. But he was not a highly cultured man. He never graduated from a college. He belonged to no literary ring. He has been accused of coarseness and vulgarity. Possibly he was not as polished and refined as our modern Liberals who do not believe in attacking the moss-grown errors of antiquity except with gloved hands and honied words. Shall Paine, too, be discarded by the unbelieving, independent minds of the nineteenth century? Have they become so high-toned, so full of exquisite taste, that the writings of Thomas Paine must be disowned and shelved? Is he to be disfellowshipped because he does not come up to the modern Nevillain standard? This may be the case with a limited and very respectable number, but there are thousands and hundreds of thousands scattered all over this broad land who will continue to revere Voltaire and Paine, and will adhere to their verdict that the cause of mental liberty and truth has had no more effective and faithful champions than those two independent, outspoken men. Yes, their memory will continue to be cherished in the hearts of millions when many of the advocates of kid-glove, aristocratic Liberalism will have been utterly forgotten.

Ingersoll, also, talks roughly, and he does not show due respect for man-made gods, or for the mythical sons produced by the conjoint action of gods and virgins. Scores of these imaginary demi-gods were believed in from three to five thousand years ago, but Ingersoll has freed himself from these antique errors, and he does not hesitate to declare their falsity and his total unbelief in them. Shall he be discarded and disowned because he, too, fails to come up to this modern standard of great refinement? Shall he be one of the class tabooed by the independent free minds of this country? We rather think not. He will have legions of admirers when many of the sticklers for high culture and inoffensive warfare will scarcely be remembered more.

The issue is right here: Christianity is a system made up from the fables and myths of ancient pagan religions, or it is not. It is full of errors and absurdities, or it is not. It was revealed from heaven and sent direct from the throne of God, or it was not. Its reign has been benign and peaceful in the world, or it has not. It has been more lamb-like and bloodless than other systems of religion, or it has not. The claim that a Jewish personal God, called Jehovah, created the universe some six thousand years ago from nothing is true, or it is not. The antique myth that this God cohabited with a young Jewish maiden, and that a personage half God and half man was the result, and whose cruel death was the only means by which a small portion of the world can be saved from endless torture, is true, or it is not. Now, has the cause of truth become so cultured and refined that these errors must no longer be openly attacked? Have they become so sacred that no outspoken antagonism must beset them? Are they, indeed, so grand and good that no direct opposition or sarcasm or ridicule shall be used against them? In fact, is not ridicule a legitimate and fitting means of exposing such error, falsehood, and priestcraft?

What is called the Reformation was a bold step taken by a few brave minds against the corruption and iron rule of the Church that had been almost omnipotent for centuries. It required the spirit of manly courage and independence to successfully combat it. There were different classes of minds drawn into the irrepressible conflict. Some were belligerent, positive, and rough in style; some were smooth, inoffensive, and cultured. Luther belonged to the first class, Erasmus to the second. Which struck the most effective blows? Which did the most towards exposing the corruptions of the mother Church? Which accomplished the most towards opening the way for mental freedom and individual opinion? The world decides, to-day, that polish and culture were vastly overshadowed and surpassed by the rough, direct, and offensive system of warfare. Is there anything to show that the same rule will not continue? Is error any more easily overcome to-day than three hundred years ago? May not the tactics and the modes of warfare which proved effective then still be of some use now? Shall they and everything else be compelled to give way to culture and refinement?

In the construction of a palace or edifice various grades of workmen are necessary. The skilled artisan and the polisher, the finisher, and the decorator are all necessary and useful, but of far more consequence are the laborers, the quarrymen, the rough-hewers, and those who place the material on the ground. The extra finish and polish beautifies the structure, but it can be dispensed with, while the rough and heavy work cannot by any possibility be set aside. The heavy worker is solid utility, while the finisher and polisher is simply ornamentation.

We have nothing to say against high culture, polish, and respectability. These are qualities very good in their way, and we doubt not they ought to be extensively cultivated by American Liberals. We rejoice that there is an organ admirably adapted to that style of thought, and it is hoped the patronage will be adequate to its maintenance. We would not interfere with the influence it is wielding and the good it is doing in the land. The only stipulation we have to make is that it does not try to show that we have been guilty of forgery when we have not; that we are in favor of obscenity because we ask for the repeal of an oppressive, unconstitutional law; and that we are low and vulgar because our early opportunities were limited, because we never attended college, because we have been a constant toiler from our boyhood days, have had but little opportunity for studying refinement, culture, and respectability, and because we are disposed to do what we can with our humble abilities in exposing the errors of the past and in pointing out the better course for the future.

Anthony's Activity.

Comstock has made two or three trips to Washington recently to talk to the committees, senators, and representatives to prevent the repeal of his unconstitutional laws. He always takes with him, we are informed, a satchel full of vile curiosities, which, with all the gusto in the world, he exhibits to our super-virtuous members of Congress, and as a matter of course they are immensely shocked at the wickedness of the people, and are willing to make amends for any little deviations they have made from the straight line of virtue by passing the most stringent laws to punish the imperfections of others. The energy and industry which Anthony exhibits in buttonholing our spotless lawmakers are characteristic of the man, and in his appeals in the holy cause of morality and purity he is said to be perfectly irresistible.

Since his return from Washington he reports having conversation with two senators with whom he talked about the extreme wickedness of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and those two very pious and moral senators assured him that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a most vile sheet, one unfit to be circulated and which ought by all means to be suppressed. Now, possibly those two United States senators are right. It may be that this sheet ought to be suppressed, and it may be that Anthony, and his worthy president of his immaculate society—who in a speech made before the society expressed his unfriendliness toward Freethought papers and publications, and of the necessity of their suppression—will do all in their power to put out our feeble light and compel us to seek retirement. But, whatever may come, we shall endeavor to perform our duty in the best manner within our knowledge.

"OUR FINANCIAL DISTRESS: Its Cause. Can it be Relieved? How? By Moses Hull. 'When, a few years hence, the people shall have been brought to general bankruptcy by their unregulated enterprise, I shall have the satisfaction of knowing I labored to prevent it.'—Thaddeus Stevens. Boston: Moses Hull & Co., 468 Tremont street." The above is copied from the title page of a pamphlet of thirty-six pages, just received from its author. Mr. Hull commences with a general statement of the great wealth of this country, and, after showing the natural wealth of this country in climate, soil, extent of territory, cereals, fisheries, gold, silver, copper, zinc, lead, iron, salt, coal, and, in fact, all that can make a country wealthy, he shows that, without war, pestilence, or famine, in the midst of good crops and all of nature's blessings, we are all at once stricken down, the hand of industry is paralyzed, business firms are failing, and four millions of the wealth-producing class are turned out as tramps. He next shows, and undertakes to account for, the great increase of crime, insanity, and suicides within the last few years. Then comes the inquiry, What has produced this change? Of course he finds the answer in bad legislation. He traces every tramp back to the United States Treasury. He shows that panics are always made to order; that panic-making is a trade. He clearly points out the steps by which the present panic was produced. The history of other panics is referred to, showing that other panics have originated in the same cause as the one under which we now suffer. His remedy is more money, issued by the government directly to the people. The argument is straightforward and concise, and, whether true or not, deserves the attention of the reading public. We will send the pamphlet to any address, postpaid, on the receipt of ten cents.

D. W. HULL is now in the West looking for a permanent location. Those wishing to hear him on the finances of our government, religion, Spiritualism, or hygiene, or those who wish clairvoyant or personal treatment for disease, may address him at Montgomery, Mich., until further notice.

A Singular Boast.

Anthony Comstock boasted a few days ago to a friend of ours that he had caused fifteen persons to commit suicide. It is a singular thing to boast of, and how a man who has any of the milk of human kindness in his nature or who has the least goodness in his heart can boast of such an accomplishment is passing strange. We would certainly rather be guilty of printing and mailing several thousand nude pictures than to be the death of even one person; but as Anthony Comstock evidently takes pleasure in causing suffering and unhappiness for others it can be understood how he takes pleasure in driving sensitive persons to desperation.

He has also otherwise caused the death of numerous persons who died of diseases contracted in prison and from being heart-broken and permanently disgraced and ruined in all business prospects. We saw not long ago an unfortunate victim of Comstock's breathing his last. He was a physician and had been tried, convicted, and sent to prison for sending an innocent powder through the mail in answer to one of Anthony's decoy letters.

We know of a number of persons, wives and mothers, who were driven nearly to frenzy by Comstock's arresting and prosecuting a husband, son, or brother. One lady, described to us, with tears, how she was agonized by her husband—sixty-four years of age and of unblemished character—being arrested because, at the instigation of Comstock's accomplice, Britton, he had procured certain views to present in a stereopticon before a company of gentlemen. The old man's intentions were the best in the world, but the persecutor was designing and relentless. When he got possession of the old man he walked him to prison through the streets without the privilege of putting on his coat or boots. Such ruffianly treatment would not be extended by officers of the courts to the worst murderer, house-breaker, or robber. The unhappy wife described to us the state of mind she was thrown into by this arrest. It was in some respects far worse than death. It produced such a serious effect upon a delicate nervous system that she has not recovered from it in more than a year. It came near causing her death. That her honest, honorable, and worthy husband should be coarsely arrested by Anthony Comstock and dragged hatless and coatless through the streets of this city upon a charge of obscenity was more than she could bear. She could not speak to her nearest friends upon the subject. To have a husband, son, or brother arrested upon such an ignominous charge is such a disgrace and produces such a state of utter wretchedness as few are able to realize who have not had the actual experience. It is a disgrace that should not be visited upon any individual or family when the guilt is not real and positive. The arresting of an individual upon such a foul charge upon trumped-up evidence, upon some frivolous or unintentional offense or as the result of vile decoy letters or heartless intrigue, is a gross wrong which should never be committed.

The load of guilt of this character resting upon Anthony Comstock's soul—if he has one—is far more than we would wish to have resting upon us. We would sooner be guilty of printing all the nudities towards which he so ferociously vents his hate. We think his guilt of a far more villainous and criminal character. The unhappiness and utter wretchedness which that man has brought upon innocent and worthy persons is beyond the power of computation. The cases which have come to our own knowledge are enough to damn his memory forever.

Still, this is the kind of man set on by the very Christain men composing the Society for the Suppression of Vice to entrap, entice, and decoy, well-meaning persons to commit some technical offense and then to drag them to prison and disgrace them and their families for life. This is the kind of business this valorous champion of the cause of Christ has been pursuing for several years. He has wielded the influence to procure the passage of unconstitutional and liberty-destroying laws and then under them he has been playing the role of a modern Torquemada, dragging people far better than himself to prison, and bringing the most extreme grief and unhappiness upon their families. And in this vile work he has exulted and gloried. He boasts of the hundreds of arrests of this kind he has made, he boasts of the number he has driven out of the world; he boasts of the numbers he has driven to suicide. He watches for his victims with all the relentlessness and persistent hate that a demon may be supposed to possess; he counts up his unhappy victims with as much gusto and self-approbation as a savage counts the scalps of the unhappy fathers, mothers, and children that he has massacred in cold blood.

This is the man who has been appointed to care for the morals of the people; this is the man who has had almost unlimited power conferred upon him to molest and torment others, and industriously has he plied that power. This is the man whose course even a certain class of Liberals approve of and whose unholy, unjust, and unconstitutional laws they think ought not be repealed, and that it is even a gross wrong to ask for it. They may have an exquisite sense of property and a most acute appreciation of ultra respectability, but we cannot honor their judgment or their sense of justice or their understanding of the sacred rights of individuals.

SETH WILBUR PAYNE issued No. 20 of his Age of Reason, for the 4th inst., containing some three columns of such infamous falsehoods respecting ourselves that, in justice to ourselves and the Liberal public, we were compelled to take means to prevent its circulation. We are informed, however, that a limited number of copies were sent out. If our friends have received them they will confer a favor upon us by informing us of the fact, and by sending the paper to us.

To Be Arrested Again.

For nearly the twentieth time word has been brought directly to us from Anthony Comstock that he is again about ready to pounce down upon us, and arraign us before the courts of justice. He says the papers are all made out for our arrest and that all he is waiting for is to find time to devote to the pleasant business. He regards THE TRUTH SEEKER as his game and says that it is a sheet of such immense wickedness that it shall be his duty and pleasure to suppress it. He procures a copy of it from week to week as it appears, and says his lawyer closely watches what we have to say about Anthony, and declares that we have made ourselves amenable to a prosecution for libel, a suit for which is now almost daily swung over our devoted head.

Anthony, of course, knows where we are. He can find us at our post at almost any hour of the day, and at half the hours of the night. We shall not run away to escape his arrests, and when he gets fully ready to "pitch in" we can easily be found.

What we have said in exposing his unholy and merciless work we have said from a deep sense of duty—duty to the victims he has persecuted, duty to ourselves, and duty to the public whose information upon the subject is not what it should be. We regard his high-handed, unjustifiable course as an outrage upon the very principles of American liberty, and we shall continue to denounce it while we have breath to use. If we are wrong in doing this, if we can be sent to prison for performing a sacred duty, then to prison it is. We shall endeavor to submit to it with the resignation of a fearless, devoted martyr to truth and justice.

We may have erred somewhat in some of the statements, but the error was not intended. We acted upon the best information we could procure, and where we have misstated the facts, upon being shown the same we stand ready to make due apology. We wish to defend liberty, right, and truth, but we want to wrong no man. Comstock complains because a correspondent said something about his father's irregularities in opening other people's letters. The insinuation may have been unfounded, but we can hardly see how he can send us to prison for what a correspondent said about his deceased father. If the father makes no complaint, why should he?

We have no desire to figure in our courts, but if we are forced there to defend a libel suit brought by Anthony Comstock, we think we shall be able to prove an amount of guilt and black-hearted villainy against him that will damn his memory forever, and we shall be discharging a most conscientious duty by publishing the facts to the world. We like peace better than war, but if we have to fight we shall acquit ourselves with the best ability we possess.

We will again inform Anthony that we shall not run away. We are still, and shall be at 141 Eighth street.

Indicative.

Anniversaries take place here in the month of May. Several have been held already. Among others who have visited our city recently are numbers of clergymen. Three of these white-cravated gentleman passed our office a few days ago. They stopped on the opposite side of the street, and, with their canes pointed to our sign, shook their sanctimonious heads, doubtless with the full conviction that THE TRUTH SEEKER is the wickedest paper in the world, and that it ought not to be suffered to exist. There are many clergyman in the country who have not the slightest friendship for this paper, and would pray earnestly, and act in the same direction, to extinguish its steady light. We hope there are large numbers of the clergy who will go down to their graves before THE TRUTH SEEKER shall expire.

Mrs. M. G. Parker.

This distinguished and talented Irish lady, barrister, orator, and vocalist, has honored us with a call since her return from Europe She proposes to spend some time in this country, and has not yet fully decided whether to take the Liberal and reform lecture field or exercise her musical talent. Whichever field she may determine to occupy, we bespeak for the public a rich treat in her varied accomplishments We wish her much success before the American public. Let the Liberals of the country extend to her the hand of welcome. She is stopping at the St. Cloud hotel, and may be addressed there in reference to lectures, musical exercises, etc.

MR. E. H. HEYWOOD'S Labor Reform League was in session in this city, at the old Masonic Hall in Thirteenth street, on the 5th and 6th inst. Many speeches were made, though we understand the attendance was not large. We are informed that among the resolutions passed, were some very severe upon Anthony Comstock and his oppressive law. A very encouraging feature connected with those meetings is the fact that the daily papers are beginning to recognize them as entitled to the same respectful consideration accorded to other meetings. While a few years ago the meetings of this league were dismissed with a paragraph of ridicule, they now devote whole columns of as favorable a report as the average journalistic conservatism will admit. Public opinion is slowly changing.

TO ALL new subscribers who order THE TRUTH SEEKER during the month of May we will send it three months for fifty cents. Those who wish to order it for a friend to become acquainted with it will do well to write at once. We are sorry to receive orders to strike the names of old readers from the list, and are glad to receive new ones to add to it.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER XI.

YE FOREST.

The Forest of Evidences.—The Giants of the Plains.—The Trees of the Forest.—Revelation and Prophecy.—The Guides rejoicing.—Simon in Difficulties.

1. Now when Simon had escaped from the hole which swallowed up the house of relics and all that was therein, and had returned thanks to the king for his great and wondrous deliverance, the guide showed him a certain forest called the Forest of Evidences, through which the gutter called the Narrow Way passed,

2. Saying, If thou desirest to know for a certainty that thou art in the right way, and that there is a bridge over the river, and a city beyond, then do thou ascend some of yonder trees, and thou wilt be able to see for thyself.

3. So Simon girded up his loins, and went on his way pondering upon what he had seen in the House of Relics, and believing with all his might.

4. Now the forest had been of yore much greater than it now was, for many of the trees had been torn up and destroyed, and many had fallen down of their own accord.

5. For there was no depth of soil there, nor any natural nourishment, but only dry dust, in the which the trees could not take root.

6. And the name of the dust was Piousfraud, and all the trees were planted in it. And there was a very great abundance of dust, more than enough, and much to spare.

7. And the beast called Priestcraft had built here a certain wind machine, which blew the superabundant dust about, so that it got into the eyes of the pilgrims, that they might not see too clearly or too much.

8. And the name of the wind machine was Mystery.

9. And the forest was fenced all round with a fence called Sanctity.

10. And beyond the forest were great and beautiful plains called the Plains of Science, wheron dwelt a race of giants.

11. And the giants were enemies of the beast—Priestcraft—and his hideous crew.

12. And they made unceasing war against the beast and the guides, and were continually encroaching upon the forest, breaking down the fence, and tearing up the trees, and filling up the roadway.

13. For they perceived that great numbers of the people were deluded by the beast and his servants, and spent miserable lives in searching for that which was not to be found, and in seeking for birds in the bushes, and neglecting those they had in their hands.

14. And they were indignant that men should be so cheated of a paradise here, by having held out to them deceptive promises of one to come, for they saw clearly that if men would but cultivate the country that they had, as diligently as they sought for one which they could never reach, they might make a paradise of that which they had.

15. And knowing that there was no city such as the pilgrims sought, they uprooted and brake down the trees, so that they should not be longer deluded, by their magical and devilish glasses, into believing that they could see it.

16. Moreover the whole forest stood in the way of the Car of Freethought, of which they were the heralds and guards, and of which more will be said hereafter.

17. And for this reason also they made war with the beast and his servants, and ceaselessly brake down the fences of the forest, and tore up the trees, and brake the branches.

18. And the giants had certain battering rams, wherewith they battered the trees, by some called Caxtons, and by others presses.

19. And in the plains were many noble and beauteous trees called Geologos, from which the giants made themselves very excellent cudgels, for the wood was exceedingly hard; others armed themselves with cudgels from trees called Astronomos, and others from trees called Cosmogonos, and others from trees called Chronologos, and others from trees called Ethnologos; and many other trees were there, furnishing good and potent weapons.

20. And among the giants was one whose crest was an image broken, and he had charge of one of the chief battering rams, and played havoc therewith.

21. And another had on his crest an holly and an oak, and did good service.

22. And another had on his crest a gravedigger, or a sexton, and he played hades.

23. And another had on his crest a vault and an hare, and he played Thomas.

24. And another had on his crest a well in the south, and out of that well had much truth been drawn.

25. And besides these were many others, who tended the trees in the plains and made weapons, though they cared not to use them against the beast.

26. And when Simon came up to the forest some of the guides met him, and took him to some of the trees; and Simon made an effort to ascend, and failed, so the guides helped him, and with much ado, gat him up, and he looked and saw nothing; but when he had put on his glasses he thought he saw something darkly.

27. And one of the trees, of which the guides vaunted loudly, was named Apriori; and they said that from the top of this tree those who ascended were able to see the king Jah himself; and many strove to climb, but few got up, for the branches were so interwoven and tied to one another, and so many branches were nailed on to uphold the others, and so many to uphold those that upheld the others, that it was well-nigh—nay, altogether impossible for any to ascend.

28. And when any of the pilgrims essayed to climb this tree, and failed, the guides condoled with them, saying it were pity they could not ascend for that if they could they would assuredly see the king.

29. And by these means the pilgrims went away satisfied, saying, 'Tis enough if others have seen—thinking the guides had been up and seen.

30. But the guides were no more able to ascend than the pilgrims, though not a few were hardy enough to say they had been up.

31. But they lied, and had not been up. Nay, the guide who boasted he had planted the tree, could not himself ascend it, except by means of a ladder called Choppedlogic, which ladder he carefully concealed.

32. And this guide had on his crest two things, whereof one was a pie, and the other I have not forgotten, though I remember it not.*

33. And this guide had conceived great affection for the tree, and digged and dunged about it unceasingly, and vaunted day and night.

34. But the giant whose crest was a broken image attacked the tree, and showed the nails that nailed on the branches, and the ladder, and laughed the guide to scorn; and the guide was exceedingly angry.

35. And the name of another tree was Aposteriori, and it had been oftentimes pulled up by the roots by the giants, and was altogether dead, and withered and rotten; but the guides carefully concealed the rottenness, and filched good-looking boughs and green leaves from another tree called Pseudoanalogy, and cemented them on to the other with a certain sticky substance called Mockargument, so that the tree presented a fair appearance to such as had on their glasses, and looked not closely.

36. And the tree was only held in its place by means of the ropes called Sophistries.

37. And the name of another great tree was Revelation, and like the others, it was rotten, and had no root whatsoever, and was held in its place by two other trees, one on each side; and the name of one of these was Prophecy, and of the other Miracles, and they together held up the tree called Revelation, and had much to do, for they themselves were rotten and rootless, and without any strength.

38. And the three trees were all bound together by the ropes called Sophistries, and swayed to and fro under the frequent attacks of the giants, and notwithstanding the ropes wherewith the guides were continually binding them, they became more and more unstable day by day, and will, without doubt, and not long hence, come down to the ground, and great will be the fall thereof.

39. And Simon came to the tree called Prophecy, and would have ascended, but while he was about it, there came up one of the giants, and began to address him with fair language, desiring him but to examine the tree for himself, and without his glasses, and thereby satisfy himself whether it were rotten or no.

40. But the guides immediately beset the giant on all sides, casting mud and all manner of filth at him, yet the more they cast, the more did they bespatter themselves, for though they had very much practice yet was their aim so wretched, that whatsoever they threw fell not upon the giant but upon some of their fellow-guides, or else upon the tree.

41. But the giant, smiling with derision upon them, went up to the tree, and pulled off sundry of the branches, and showed the rottenness of the tree, and the ropes which held it, whereat the guides began to howl, and to roar, and rant, and rage, and bark, and spit, and belch, and bellow, and rave, and gnash their teeth, and hurl about on every side divers scarecrow missiles, such as damnation, eternal blazes, and other matters equally potent, and that with no little zeal, and no great discretion.

42. But the dauntless giant laughed at them, and when he had stripped the tree, he passed on, administrating to one a wholesome kick, bequeathing to another a noble tumble, and helping another to a bruised pate.

43. But when the giant was gone out of sight, then did all the guides like unto a flock of geese run a little way after him, hissing and threatening all manner of unutterable things if he dared to return; and when they had pursued him a very little way, they all ran together as it were with a flourish of trumpets, cackling, and rejoicing, and hugging themselves and each other, and saying to each other, how well they had beaten him, and discomfited him, and driven him away.

44. Aha, said one who had possessed himself of a bloody nose by running against one of the trees in his haste to escape—Aha, did I not bethwack him?

45. Yea, verily, that didst thou, said another, who was earnestly chafing his northern extremities—and did not I also maul him?

46. Truly thou didst said the other, after which they cackled again.

47. Oh, that they would let us alone, said a timorous one, for they cause us woeful mischief, the forest is scarce half its former size, and they beguile away many of our pilgrims. Oh, that our King would remember them.

48. Fear not, said another, our King will remember them for evil in the day of his reckoning.

49. But said Simon, wonderingly, why doth he not cut them off now, and thereby make known his power and prevent his people being mislead?

50. What, said one of the guides angrily, darest thou question the doings of our King?

51. And Simon said, I did forget myself, and will take more heed to my speech.

52. And the guide said, Take heed thou dost; remember 'tis for thee to submit and to believe, and not to question; and Simon said, I will remember.

53. And one said, Let us sing a song of thanksgiving for our great victory over the accursed giant, and they all answered, Amen, and sang.

54. Thy praise we'll sing, our gracious King, for thousands thou hast slain. And through thy might, we've put to flight, this monster of the plain. But yet, oh King, we fain would bring, destruction on them all. For on our trees, they daily seize, and with their weapons maul. But with thy aid, they shall be made to fly like rotten sheep. We'll make them shake, and fear and quake, and for—

55. Perdition, cried one of them, suddenly, the giants are upon us, and they all fled hastily away, leaving their song of triumph unfinished.

56. And when the giants were gone away, the guides bestirred themselves, and fastened on the boughs and leaves of the tree again, and swore by their King that the tree was unhurt and perfect in all its belongings, and had more cackling and rejoicing, and bound up the tree with more ropes.

57. And Simon had on his glasses, and rejoiced with the guides, and believed the tree to be immovable as the heavens. And Simon desired to ascend the tree called Prophecy, so the guides took one of the ropes called Sophistry, and threw it over one of the topmost boughs, and made it fast to another rope which Simon had with him called Self-conceit, and by their means began to draw Simon up.

58. And Simon went up swiftly, and began to be jubilant, but there suddenly struck him one of the stones called arguments (which a giant had thrown) and he fell down headlong.

59. And Simon fell upon the fence which surrounded the forest, and which did divide the forest hereabouts from the land of Narrow-gullets, which bordereth upon the Plains of Science. And whosoever falleth into the land of Narrow-gullets is straightway unable to swallow so much as he was wont, and is not able nor indeed willing to return to the narrow-way, but goeth onwards to the Plains and joineth himself to the giants.

60. And Simon fell upon the fence, and was as it were balanced thereon, his head hanging down on the side towards the land of Narrow-gullets, and his feet hanging down on the other side, and for a little while he stayed so.

61. But his head being very light, and there being but little in it, he shortly fell back into the forest, and was gathered up by the guides.

62. And the guides took away the rope called Self-conceit, and in its place put another called Confusion and at last drew him up.

63. And Simon, over-persuaded by the guides, did his utmost to believe that he had seen the city he was in search of, and very nearly succeeded.

64. And the guides desired him to examine the tree to see that it was perfect, but bid him to take heed to do it reverently, and made him pass over certain portions. And Simon examined and was satisfied, and saw not the patchwork.

THE OLD GAME OF FOOT-BALL—Except in name, the new and the old games have little in common. The roughest "Rugby game" of to-day is mild and harmless when compared with the contests of two or three hundred years ago, when parish fought parish, or all the men of one county kicked their hardest to defeat a neighboring shire. In its primitive form the game was merely a trial of speed, strength, and endurance; there were no rules, and little science. Naturally, therefore, when the player could use any means to bring victory to his side, the violence of the game soon greatly increased. The heroes of the field became those who could plunge into the struggling mass of players, grappling right and left, and giving at least as good as they got in "hacks" on the shins, or more direct blows that laid opposing players sprawling on their backs, with a strong probability of serious damage to limb or even to life. Victory in such a struggle was to be looked for more from the reckless use of muscular strength than from agility or skill; so violent, indeed, did many of the matches become, that at a very early period they were put down by authority as a public nuisance. "From this court," writes James I. to his eldest son, "I debarre all rough and violent exercises, as the football, meeter for lameing than making able the users thereof."—Belgravia.

Teedism Critically Examined.—Concluded.

I want to ask you, with a universe that is supposed to be everywhere, and centre and circumference nowhere, and and that has neither beginning nor ending, how long it would take your mind ideal to reach that focal point? Has Jesus Christ, a local person that was supposed to have figured in Judea, reached that point yet? Astronomy teaches that an object flying at the rate of one thousand miles an hour, some twenty times faster than the quickest railway train, would not reach in seven thousand years the first fixed star! That is rather a long journey. But if your reputed Jesus took his passage over eighteen hundred years ago, it is doubtful whether he has reached that focal point yet? But supposing he has arrived without having been knocked into fits by some comet or other substance in space, how did you find out that point to be the centre of the universe? You state in letter sixth, that it "cannot be known that Jesus Christ is creator of heaven and earth, except on faith, till positive knowledge is acquired of the physical and spiritual universe," yet you declare in the proposition, that "Jesus Christ is not only divine but the Lord God, &c. If it is only known on faith that Christ is the Lord God, &c., you have no facts at all to stand upon but faith, and that is nothing but belief. I might have faith and believe that the moon is made of cheese, but that does not prove it cheese because I believe it. You add, "My Lord cannot come except through methods." What is this Lord that is "coming through methods of the mobilization of the anti-Christian power"? It is your bastard Lord Jesus Christ that is coming with troops, ah! (He had better keep away or Comstock will nab him.) You assert, further this bastard Lord Christ & Co., "Created heaven and earth," and add, "the structure of the earth and heavens must be known before we can determine the relation of humanity and the physical structure he inhabits," which you aver "Jesus Christ created also," but you do not prove it. You affirm further, there is a "stratum of hydrogen above our atmosphere" which presents the physical universe to the mind in a new phase" and affirm you "have arrived at the above conclusions by the application of a divinely-illumined reason." What is divinely-illumined reason? How can you arrive at such a reason from a divinity you have not proved? You add, it is "a confirmation from the following: "And God said [said who to?] Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters: and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament, and it was so" &c. Now where is the "confirmation" of your heaven between the two atmospheres? (Rather a cool place I should think for a heaven, is it not?) Have you been there with your "divinely illumined reason" ideal nothing, and know that account to be true? You cannot prove God from Genesis. You cannot prove Genesis to be the word of a god, no, not even God himself from that book. Oh, what bosh! I cannot accept anything from the Jew-book till it is shown to be what it is represented. But,

> "Such foolish, childish tales as these,
> A barbarous race of men might please;
> But sure such tales can never claim
> From Reason's sons of truth the name."

You state, "Hydrogen is a water-producer according to the term employed to designate it," &c. It is a well known fact that water is composed of oxygen and hydrogen in certain proportions, and I do not believe that with your "divinely illumined reason" you can prove that water can be produced from hydrogen alone. But if you think you can, try the experiment and see how much water you can produce from your hydrogen. But I see you contradict this and take exception to the statement of a correspondent in The Truth Seeker, that "water is oxygen and hydrogen in certain proportions," and you assert in reply to said correspondent that neither are water producers, nor both combined, but claim that "water is composed of light and heat on one octave, and that hydrogen is light and heat on another octave, and that one is male, and the other is female," and then state, "I am sorry the world is so full of fools!" Cannot you tell me who is the biggest fool?

In your seventh letter you state that "the various systems of religion that are, or have been in existence have had their foundation in knowledge." Now I deny the assertion that religion ever had, or ever will have, any foundation in knowledge, or ever "evoluted in science" only to put it down. Religion is neither more nor less than a system of faith and divine worship—it has always persecuted science and knowledge, if there is any truth in history. You assert, that "the religion of the Romans is founded upon a phase of the Pythagorean system of astronomy." That is a great mistake, for Pythagoras never taught any system of astronomy. You aver, "the religions of the past ages and the present age are facts." I deny it. Where are your proofs? You give nothing but your assertions, and that gives no facts at all. You add, "Jesus had a thorough knowledge in the beginning of the age now coming to its close, and that he was familiar with the laws of involution and evolution may be known from the fact that he taught them both in their highest phases." Where are your "facts that he taught them"? You give none. You do not even know that there was such a person as Jesus, to say nothing about his knowledge of involution and evolution. You add, "nothing can be proved to a mind not open to conviction." Will not that apply very well to yourself? Do you not know that it depends on evidence whether a man believes in a thing or not? You aver, "the fact that there is a stratum of hydrogen above our atmosphere I have proved." Where are the facts of your theory—where, show me where? You say, "Creation," and a little farther on you claim "the universe has had a perpetual existence." If it had a perpetual existence, how could it be created? Did that contradiction come from your "divinely illumined reason?" Where are your proofs that "the heavenly bodies are foci?" or that they "converge through refraction and reflection of the forces at given points in space, and connect with the earth?" and that "they are not at a great distance from us?" and that they "constitute the windows of heaven?" (The heavenly bodies form the windows of heaven, ah! How ridiculous). I want you to show what is "refraction and reflection of forces," and not recite one assertion after another without proof of anything whatever. Your Jesus Christ who "created the heavens and the earth," is like you; he did not know anything of astronomy, geology, chemistry, mathematics, biology, philology, psychology, or any of the sciences or branches of knowledge. If you think he did, give me your proofs. A pretty Creator, indeed, who did not know the earth was a globe, and that it revolved around once every twenty-four hours. Where is your proof that the "universe has a center or sensorium," and that "humanity is the product and creator." Your letter is so disgusting and so full of balderdash, absurdities, and ridiculousness, that it is not worth examining any further.

In your eighth letter you claim that "God is a being embodying, in one perfect structure of human organism, father, mother, son; in one central function being, the mental, spiritual, and psychical activity through processes of law," etc. Now, if God is a being, he is matter, and therefore must have parts, and consequently must be something; but, you add, he is mental and psychical activity, which are nothing in themselves but properties, therefore can have no parts; and as a consequence your God is nothing, and at the same time you say he is father, mother, and son, which all know to be something. Was there ever anything more ridiculous!

You say "create" signifies to produce from a "word of speech." Now, I claim that a word is nothing more than a sound—such, for instance, as the sound of a bell; the sound is nothing independent of the bell; therefore your creation is nothing but sound, which is nothing. If you claim it is something more, you must give your proofs before I admit it. You aver that "the bare fact that Jesus existed is the millions of professed Christians and Mohammedans are proof that he lived." Numbers are no proof at all. Was there not a time when but one man (Galileo) believed the truth, and all the rest of the world believed falsely, besides other things that have been believed in, such as witches, fairies, etc., which nobody who is sensible believes in now. You add: "The contact of mental, spiritual, and psychical energies antagonize and combine by the same definite law." I want you to explain what you mean by mental and spiritual energies, antagonized and combined by the same definite law. That is, how can nothing antagonize and come into contact with nothing?

> Teed, is not the pleasure as great
> In being cheated as to cheat?

Now, let us suppose the theory of your "Jesus, Divine God, & Co." creating the heaven and the earth, and embodying the perfect structure of human organism, father, mother, son, etc., in one central being, involuting and evoluting his mental, spiritual, and psychical energies, combining and antagonizing with definite law, etc.—which must play the most singular pranks we can conceive, sometimes praying, sometimes cursing, sometimes affirming, sometimes denying his own existence; calling that blasphemy here which he proclaims to be true religion somewhere else; promising heaven at the equator for that conduct and opinion which at the poles he pronounces worthy of hell.

Such a divine God would be everything by turns, and nothing long—at one moment the sanctified sinner, "who plunders widows' houses, and for a pretense makes long prayers," and at the same moment a mocker and a scorner of all prayer, as thrice double ass-ism; a divine God filling up the knowledge box of Cyrus Romulus R. Teed, who feels that such a divinely illumined, spiritual, involuted, evoluted God exists, and urges on obstinate Atheists, like ourselves, who deny that such a God exists. As divine and spiritual energy is fond of praying to a God, here we have a God praying to himself, which would be comical enough were it true. All Atheists who, like ourselves, think all that has been written about a God or gods is the veriest twaddle that ever abused and bemuddled the human intellect, here we have a divine God energetically denying his own existence. But, as though, to use the cant phrase, the divinely illumined energetic god of Mr. Teed's must, if there be virtue in his divine energy, be a tenant at will in the heads of calves, frogs, toads, asses, skunks, and certain insects, useful, no doubt, but rather too dirty to mention—that even bugs have a strong divine affection for each other; and as for us, we have sometimes intolerable proof. So that here we have a pretty kettle of fish. The divinely illumined, spiritual, involuted, evoluted piece of him snugly housed in the tail of a louse, the snout of a hog, the hindquarters of a frog, or the head of an ass! You are a fine reasoner, Mr. Teed, to tell us such ridiculous balderdash concerning your constituted universality of things called a God, or Jesus Christ. I should think you must be greatly hobbled with such a divinely-illumined-spiritual-energetic-involuted-and-evoluted God, or a non-energetic-divinely-illumined-spiritual-involuted-and-evoluted God or Christ.

I am, Mr. Teed, with all due respect,

Your well-wisher, J. Petty.

Free Speech and the Right of Association—Their Latest Denial.

Editor of The Truth Seeker: "Forsaking not the assembling of ourselves together" was judiciously urged by St. Paul upon truth seekers of his time; the right of the people to assemble to confer together respecting individual and collective welfare is inherent in the nature of things, carefully asserted in fundamental law, and indispensably necessary to progress. During the last three years we have wrestled against invasive unreason in the form of mobs from the streets, and lastly, as religio-lascivious fanaticism masked under United States law. Tyranny has invented another trick. Monday, April 15th, while I was compelled to be away to testify in a law case in New York, and had left Mrs. Heywood as the acting manager of the Freelove Convention in Boston, "an officer of the law" came in and forbid her taking admission fees, a collection at the door, "without a license"! The right to permit free speech implies, of course the right to forbid it, and whenever they do not like our sentiments they will refuse to grant "a license" to meet, thus indirectly but most effectually suppressing dissent. The following from the Boston Daily Globe, of April 17th, states so impartially the issues involved that I wish you would reprint it:

"One of the great reasons why the Pilgrims sought a home in the New World was that they might enjoy civil and religious liberty, and especially that of free speech. Free speech has been thundered forth for the last twenty years in this community, yet free speech means anything but what it implies. We are led to say this much in consequence of the action of the city authorities in interfering with Mr. E. H. Heywood and Mrs. A. T. Heywood in holding a convention at Nassau Hall on Monday last. The police claimed that as an admission fee was charged at the door, the convention came under the head of a show, and that it was necessary for the parties interested to obtain a license. It was a convention which comes under the head of free love. Yet the meeting was orderly, and the doctrine of free love was to be set forth as a moral, social, and religious belief. And we do not see why those people should not have the privilege of holding their meetings if they see fit, without any interference from the license commissioner or of the police authorities.

"We know nothing of the objects sought to be obtained by these people, and can only say that if they see fit to meet in public and to discuss their peculiar notions upon social, moral, or religious affairs, they should have the liberty of doing so without a license, so long as their meetings are conducted in decency and in order."

Since taking admission fees, or a collection at the door, is the readiest way to cover expenses, it is often resorted to by all schools of reformers, and the legal right to do it is never questioned except where the ideas to be discussed are notably unpopular. We had a case of this kind in Boston, February, 1873, when Mayor Pierce (the present incumbent) undertook to suppress a convention of the New England Labor Reform League because Victoria C. Woodhull was to be one of the speakers! He said we should not charge an admission fee to cover expenses without a license from the city government; and if we asked for a license he did not propose to give it; so indirectly, but slily we were to be squelched! I called on the mayor, told him the convention would be held as advertised and collections would be taken at the door as usual. He replied that he should "enforce the laws" but what laws he was not so clear about. The convention was held, admission fees were charged, and Mrs. Woodhull spoke in five different sessions. The policemen sent by the mayor, in citizens dress, to watch us, paid fifteen cents each Sunday evening, and fifty cents each Monday night to get in. The Baptist brethren of Tremont Temple concluded to send the League a check for $250.00 to cover damages for closing their hall against us, and thus ended that effort to suppress Freethought by the "license trick."

In the case which has just occurred, Mrs. Heywood promptly declined to recognize official terrorism as law, dismissed the convention, and will at an early day in Boston, assert the right of the people to assemble for speech and discussion "without a license." As this subtle phase of tyranny is likely to be attempted elsewhere, I hope you will give the above a place in your columns and am sure you will gladly do what you can to help us put down this latest eruption of invasive, disorderly Puritan bigotry.

Truly yours, E. H. Heywood.

Hickory-nut Cake.—Two cupfuls sugar and one of butter well rubbed together; four eggs, whites and yolks beaten separately; one cupful cold water, three cupfuls of sifted flour, one teaspoonful soda, two of cream of tartar, two cupfuls of kernels of hickory-nuts. Another way.—One pound sugar, one-half pound butter, five eggs, one cupful milk, one pound flour, one teaspoonful soda, two of cream tartar, one pound raisins, one pound of nuts. Another way.—One cupful butter, two cupfuls sugar, four eggs, three-quarters of a cupful of milk, half teaspoonful soda, one teaspoonful cream-tartar, four cupfuls flour, half pound hickory-nuts slightly broken. Beat the butter and sugar; add the milk, in which you have dissolved the soda; then add the yolk of the eggs, well beaten; then the flour, with the cream-tartar well mixed with it; then the whites of eggs beaten stiff, and finally the nuts. Bake in a moderate oven, and ice when done.

Letters from Friends.

COL. R. G. INGERSOLL.

The following letter and extract were refused insertion by the editor of the Cannelton Inquirer and Reporter:

CANNELTON, IND., May 3, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Whilst attending what passes here for divine service some time during the last winter, the speaker took advantage of the occasion, to give utterance to some of the most bitter invective and foul aspersions against the above named gentleman. And while the speaker was berating the Col. in his peculiar vehement religio-fanatical style, a comparison between the speaker and the Col. was passing in review through my mind; and the result arrived at was such as we would quite naturally draw between the glorious orb of day, and the faintest speck of a star that inhabits our solar system. On the one hand, we see the Col. giving out of the proceeds of a farewell address $2,300, and in the other case, we, to our shame and disgust, behold the would-be reverend, submitting to the very questionable subterfuge of raffles, midnight suppers, and street beggary by little school girls, and more mature persons of the female sex, with, "Give a nickel for our supper, and take a chance in our cake; only ten cents; all for the minister," etc. In order to let a large portion of your readers get a more exalted idea of the standing and the estimation in which Col. R. G. Ingersoll is held, both at home and abroad, I hand you the following, and ask for it a place in the Inquirer and Reporter.

ANON.

"COL. INGERSOLL EXPECTED IN ENGLAND.—Our readers will remember that we lately expressed a wish that Col. R. G. Ingersoll, the justly celebrated American Freethought lecturer, would visit this country. We are glad to be in a condition to state that, in all probability, this desire will soon be gratified, as it is announced that the Colonel will be in England early in the coming summer. To many Freethinkers in this country the name of Robert G. Ingersoll is unknown. By profession he is a lawyer; and, during the last ten years of his practice as a jury lawyer in the Western courts, he has averaged about $40,000 per year, the greater portion of this large income arising from the fact of his being the attorney of several of the principal railway lines of the West. His proper home is in Peoria, Illinois, although he has a house in Washington (District of Columbia), and is often resident in the city of Chicago. His principal lectures have been given at intervals, during his professional journeyings, at places where he has been compelled to stop for the night. He has been offered higher sums for a series of anti-theological addresses than any other public man of the age. He has lately, however, contracted with Mr. James Redpath, who has guaranteed the Colonel a reward of between $300 and $500 per night; and it is in connection with this engagement that Col. Ingersoll is expected to visit England.

"He received last winter 3,000 invitations to lecture from nearly every district in the Union; and his portion of the proceeds of a farewell address, given recently in San Francisco, was about $2,300. It appears that the Colonel has no crochets anent the "social question." He maintains that marriage is the only sacred institution upon the earth; sacred, because it is the corner stone of the domestic life upon which all the domestic and social virtues are superimposed. With absolute marital equality for women, and with equality of rights for children, "the democracy of the fireside" is the fountain from which will be obtained the materials necessary to establish and guarantee the future democracy of the world. As an orator, Ingersoll is unexcelled. By turns witty, pathetic, and emotional, he is also a perfect master of the English language, and holds his hearers enthralled by his marvelous eloquence. We are sure that this gifted man will receive a cordial welcome in this country, and we believe that his appearance in our midst cannot fail to expedite the progress of mental emancipation, and to give increased momentum to departing superstition. We advise the Christian Evidence Society to elect a champion to confront this Apostle of Liberty."—London Secular Review.

ROSENBERG, PER TAMPA, FLO., April 14, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: My correspondence in TRUTH SEEKER No. 13 has brought me so many inquiring letters from truth seekers, that it almost surpasses my time and ability to answer them all separately; I am, therefore, with your kind permission, compelled to intrude again upon the valuable space of our beloved TRUTH SEEKER, hoping in this way to satisfy the inquiring friends, and to please many others besides. Points already explained in my first letter, I will leave untouched, and for the balance will confine myself to objects in regard to which some elucidation is desired.

Places with improvements range from $100 to $3,000. The improvements consist in a log house and some outbuildings, cleared land from one to ten acres, and in the orange grove. An orange tree at its beginning of yielding fruit is counted worth from $25 to $50. $800 to $1,000 would buy a place, where a small family could live from the fruit trees, if raising their own sweet potatoes and vegetables. New comers with less means have to rely partly upon outside work on the plantations of others, until their homestead will support them. The yield of the orange trees will double itself in every two years. A failure of the orange crop is unknown thus far. No mechanic can rely upon making a livelihood here by following his trade; tannery, pottery, and glass-manufacturing would be remunerative. Of venomous reptiles there are two poisonous snakes known, but the children are rambling all the year round barefoot in the woods, and we haven't heard of a snake bite yet. In fact, there are people here who never wore stockings. All is very primitive yet, and you will seldom find in a household a thing that deserves the name "furniture," many people having neither a lamp nor a time-keeper. But in three to five years from now the aspect will be quite different. Houses have sometimes such large cracks between the logs that the wind will blow stockings, etc., out of the room into the yard, but that don't matter much if the roof is but good. Mosquitoes are always here, but not so troublesome by far as I found them in the North; people that have mosquito bars don't use them. For two truth seekers of the medical profession I reply: In a circuit of about three miles radius we have five physicians, none of whom are practicing, because there are no diseases here except fever and ague which were very prevalent last summer, on account of much new land being cleared and broken. That will soon change for the better we hope. Our doctors are farming and cultivating their orange groves, bananas, guavas, figs, etc. The mortality in Hillsborough county for the last year has been one per cent, of which the most died without the assistance of a doctor. Taking into account that Florida in general is a hospital for sickly Northern people, we will find this figure very low. And still it will be brought down some when people will have plenty of fruits and abandon the thrice-daily use of the abominable hog meat. The tendency of our splendid climate to make its inhabitants indolent, can hardly be denied; but two or three hours' manual labor daily all the year round, will amount to as much as the Northern farmer's all day's labor during about six months, where he has to provide for family and animals for the rest of the year. And here are vegetables growing all the year round, and very rare is a cow that willl eat when fed. Clearing of land costs from $12 to $30 per acre. Our market place is sixteen miles off, connected with our settlement by sailboats. From Tampa are going twice weekly steamboats to Key West, Cedar Keys, and New Orleans. A railroad is projected and at present surveyed, from Tampa across the peninsula to Jacksonville. The fare from New York to Tampa is $25; for families and clubs it will be less. Freight from New York to Tampa, 70 cents to $1, per dry barrel. Flour costs from $9 to $12; corn $1 to $1.50; sweet potatoes, 40 cents to $1; dried apples of the most inferior kind, 12 1-2 cents a pound. A splendid opening for a store is here on our Alfia river, where there is but one, and some people have to come thirty miles, and then often don't get what they need. I have not yet found one Freethinker here, and therefore feel sometimes lonesome. Before the new-comer accepts any service from anybody in this country, let it be distinctly understood what he has to pay. I was charged by a religious man $25.30 for half a day's work and $5 a day for board. The rate for boarding is $15 a month.

In regard to our Spiritualistic relative, who "stopped the paper," I think an editor is not a machine, greased and set running by the subscribers, but a sentient being partaking in the universal right of using his own judgment. Thus far I did not find in the articles from your pen one sentiment that disagrees with my way of thinking, though I sometimes wish to find something I might contradict, as it would enliven my interest, and keep me from getting drowsy now and then. You will soon get another money order from Germany for me, and please deduct the amount of my indebtedness and $3 besides to make up for the loss of our intolerant kinsman, and send THE TRUTH SEEKER to some poor man or dispose of the $3 as you deem best, or for my part, drink a glass of lager beer for your "stomach's sake." As regards Spiritualism nobody can be more desirous than I am that there might be truth in it, but what I have observed in these seances was most certainly a deception. Go on, my highly esteemed friend, in following the light that shineth in you, and believe me to remain, your sincere admirer,

KARL ENGLER.

RAMSEY, ILL., April 24, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find one dollar for continuation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If at any time I should be a little slow in remitting, don't stop your paper, but send it right along, and you shall have your money.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best radical journal I have ever met with. I like to read the thoughts of men and women who break through mere conventionalities, and come out boldly for the truth. Your writings, together with those of such as Clifford, Mrs. Slenker, and others, are destined to bring about a revolution in thought.

S. A. PRATER.

HARDIN, April 23, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Sir: Inclosed you will find three dollars, to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER last year, and one dollar on this year. I can not do without THE TRUTH SEEKER now. It is doing lots of good here. It has opened the eyes of many to the "error of their ways."

MRS. M. E. RILEY.

NEW YORK, April 28th, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Is the Liberal League a political organization? If it is not, we think it should be, for it is time we had men of Freethought in our legislative halls and in minor offices throughout the length and breadth of the land, and for this end Liberals should be a unit in politics. If they would act harmoniously, what could hinder them from being a mighty moving power? We never can have a "new heaven and a new earth," until this obtains, when so many thieves and robbers hold office, who are members of churches, and who, with their sanctimonious faces, have been enabled to deceive so many thousands. Would it not be better to have responsible positions filled with the men and women who have faith and trust in their own divine morality and sense of justice? Sins are too easily forgiven by these Christians' Savior, for it is only "look and believe," and lo! the black heart is bleached as white as snow—only to relapse into a geater blackness.

Self-respect is of no value to such, but one drop of blood is of infinite importance, albeit it has deteriorated in quality since you have wielded your powerful pen in the analyzation of its elements, yet it now gives a license to sin. One more question. Is it true that Comstock advised the trying to get a law passed to "repress free speech?" and is it true that the said Comstock lied and deceived for the sake of snaring the unwary and harmlesss? I think there must be some mistake about this, for certainly no decent man would stoop to such low and wicked scheming.

Friend Bennett, may your very able pen never lose its power so long as a self-righteous Pharisee remains to be lashed by its keen strokes. Yours for truth and justice.

THEODOSIA.

ATKINSON, ILLINOIS, Apr. 21, 1878.

DEAR SIR: I see by the TRUTH SEEKER some Liberals are inclined to treat you illiberally on account of some of your experience in Spiritualism. Is it Liberalism or liberality to forbid a narrative of facts without an expression of opinion as to causes? Must all opinions except strict materialistic ones be denounced, and must all statements except those squaring exactly with Materialism be dubbed as falsehood? Would a paper so acting be a truth seeker or a truth suppresser? I belong to no Spiritualism nor to any other ism, yet hold myself at liberty to go into a seance or to any other place for investigation; and, further, I feel at liberty to report facts. Now, Mr. Bennett, I am willing to state what I saw of Spiritualism on two occasions last Autumn, and to share the odium of daring to say what I saw.

I saw my mother, who had been dead four years, and spoke to her face to face. The subject matter of the conversation was such that none other than my mother could have mentioned. There were a number of persons present who were just as certain of seeing and speaking to their deceased friends as I was to mine. If these statements are scouted merely because they do not square with some persons' opinions it is not my fault. Here are certain facts which I have no pet theory to back up with. I was told the spirits of the dead were there, and until a better explanation is given I cannot but believe so. My sentiments were very materialistic up to the time of which I speak but then received a check as here stated, so as at least to need reconsideration, and caution in molding future opinions.

Yours truly, F. J. EMARY

A GOOD PREVENTIVE.—EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The Society for the Suppression of Vice have for several years past waged unceasing war againt medical gentlemen and others who have been engaged in the business of advertising and selling a "preventive against conception."

Samuel Colgate is the president of the society, and Anthony Comstock is the hired secretary, and through the activity of these two officials many persons have been prosecuted and punished, several of them with great severity, among whom we might mention Dr. E. B. Foote, who was, fined $3.500, and Madame Restell who was driven to suicide on account of her persecution by the society for selling Comstock a preventive to conception.

The firm of Colgate & Co., 53 and 55 John Street, of which Samuel Colgate is the senior member, have been for several months past actively engaged in advertising and selling a preventive of conception under the name of Vaseline, in connection with another article, of which they publish the receipt in pamphlet form and send by mail to all applicants.

The attention of the undersigned being called to this fact by Mr. Thomas, who had written for and received by mail in reply one of the aforesaid pamphlets, and having submitted it to several physicians and lawyers all of whom without exception pronounced it a flagrant violation of the law, the matter was laid before United States Commissioner Betts, who received the affidavits and said the District Attorney must be consulted before warrants for arrest would be issued. Mr. Butler and Mr. Fiero, assistants to the District Attorney, both pronounced the matter a violation of the mail law and referred it to the United States District Attorney, Stuart L. Woodford, who after consulting with Mr. Colgate concluded to dismiss the charge. Mr. Woodford informed the undersigned that Mr. Colgate confessed that he was guilty of sending the pamphlet containing the advertisement of the prevention of conception, but he did not know what was in the pamphlet and had no intention of doing wrong. Therefore District Attorney Woodford decided that he would not permit a warrant to be served for the arrest of Mr. Samuel Colgate, ignorance being deemed a sufficient excuse for Mr. Colgate.

Mr. Woodford refused to give the undersigned his decission in writing, but said that the matter in question was a direct violation of the mail law, and any one sending out such a pamphlet by mail (except Mr. Colgate) would be promptly prosecuted to the extent of the law. C. W. S.

REMARKS.—The above is a clear case. It is plainly a violation of the law for the pious Mr. Colgate to send through the mail any instruction or intelligence as to how or where any article can be had which will prevent conception, and there is no reason why Comstock and District Attorney Woodford should not as readily prosecute him as any other man in the community. That he has violated the law has been fully brought to their knowledge, but still they refuse to commence an action against him. The most palpable favoritism is here shown. Had Mr. Colgate been a poor man, or without influence or friends, he would doubtless have been in prison long before this.

By the working of the Comstock laws, whether the principle is incorporated in the text or not, the officers of the society for the suppression of vice are not to be punished for whatever crimes they may commit. Thus, as we have seen the president, Mr. Colgate, may send out with impunity information as to what preparation will prevent conception and where the same may be procured. In the same way the secretary, Mr. Comstock may send and receive obscene and prohibited matter through the mails, and he may write by mail and induce others to commit an offense against the laws with perfect impunity. The laws, it seems, were gotten up to punish outsiders who are at least partially innocent, while the insiders though ever so guilty and designing are to go perfectly free of punishment or censure. This injustice of the laws and their administration must be apparent to the most obtuse observer.

One of the professed principles of this Society for the Suppression of Vice is, that the high and low, the rich and poor shall be prosecuted impartially, but here is the president of the society guilty of a flagrant violation of the law, and no steps are taken to prosecute him for the offense. He pleads ignorance, but that plea does not avail in most cases. Many an unfortunate has been sent to prison under these laws who were not only equally ignorant with Mr. Colgate but who had in fact by craft and duplicity, been led to commit the offense for which they were imprisoned. If it was right that they should be tried and punished it is but right that the President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, who has been equally guilty of violation of the laws, should be treated in the same manner. If equal justice were administered he would be.—ED. T. S.

ATLANTA, IDAHO TERRITORY, Feb. 28, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I would like to have your, or some other Freethinker's solution of these questions: Theologians, Spiritualists, and others who pretend to look beyond the veil of the future and to read its most treasured secrets, claim eternal life for the spirit soul of man. Now how can that be eternal which has not been eternally? Is it not inevitable, in the constitution of things, that whatever has a beginning must have an ending. Does not eternal life imply a life extending from eternity to eternity? If this is the unavoidable inference, has the soul of man (his spirit) lain dormant through all the millions of ages of eternity past, to begin its eternal march on the dunghill of this little earth, totally oblivious of its past? Is it life to live forgetful of the past? Does not the life cease when we forget, and is not all that we feel, know, or experience, thereafter incidents in a new life, and does a new life necessitate the creation of a new being also? Must not the memory live and bear with it through all its cycles of being a recollection of the events and scenes through which it has passed, or the individual die? Is not the memory of the impressions one receives, and remembers, that which distinguishes him from other persons—individualizes him?

If all witnessed the same scenes, suffered and enjoyed the same experiences, received and remembered the same impressions, would there be such a thing as individualization?

Would it be possible? If the mind is not the immortal part of man—not the man—what is? And if the mind is the immortal man, where is the immortal part of the idiot? Is the mind, the immortal part of the imbecile, dead, and if so, is it resurrected after the body dies; and would the circumstance of death and resurrection interfere with the proposition of eternity of life? T. J. SUTTON.

VAN BUREN, MO., April 16, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: THE TRUTH SEEKERS came to hand, and I am delighted with them. I think it is the best paper of its class published. It beats any other Liberal work I ever read. I handed a few copies to the county attorney, and he was pleased and astonished at the masterly manner in which you handled your subjects. Inclosed find two dollars, which place to my credit. I don't think I will ever be without THE TRUTH SEEKER again, if I can get it. You will hear from me again soon.

Yours in truth, W. F. SHORT.

A NEW RELIGION WANTED.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: Why cannot we establish a new religion—one suited to the wants of this nineteenth century? The religions of Menu, Minos, Moses, Confucius, Jesus, Buddha, Zoroaster, Mohammed, Swedenborg, Smith, etc., were all adapted to certain periods in the history of mankind, and certain races. And it seems to me that we really need, and must have, a religion for this age, and for the American people. We want one got up in a grand style, and attested by miracles of the most undoubted character. All new religions must be founded by some one having the power to work miracles. This is the only way a religion can be proved true. Therefore we must have a prophet and we must have one superior to all those who have preceded him. I have been thinking seriously on this subject, and I see no good reason why we should not have a new religion.

There are many reasons, known only to myself, why I cannot inaugurate this new church myself. But I see no reason why you, brother Bennett, should not declare yourself the last of all God's prophets, and found a church worthy of the American people.

And, if, upon careful consideration, you should decide that my head is level upon this subject, I wish to make a few suggestions that may be of use to you.

I would have you write a revelation yourself, and be sure you write it so that it is consistent in all its parts. If you should get Ingersoll, Draper, Frothingham, and Underwood to write each of them parts of the new revelation, I am afraid you would not agree, and the old proverb "too many cooks" etc., would be fulfilled. Write it all yourself, and then have each of the above-named gentlemen read it, and make suggestions, before publication. In this way I think you can get up a revelation that shall not contradict itself more than a thousand times, and this would a great improvement on the one we have.

I would suggest next that when you get the power to work miracles, you make good use of it, and work those of a useful and permanent character. This is where all the ancient prophets have failed. Moses made frogs and lice and flies and locusts. I hope you will not imitate his example as we have enough of all such now. Joshua made the sun and moon to stand still; but it is generally believed that they started on again after standing a few hours, and consequently no lasting good results were obtained by this miracle. Samson killed a lion, tied the tails of some foxes together, killed some men with the jaw-bone of an ass, pulled a large house down etc., but no permanent benefit to us remains from any of his works.

Elijah went up to heaven in a chariot of fire; but it would have done as much good if he had gone up in a balloon. Elisha healed a leper; but the leper is dead long since, and the cure fails to help lepers nowadays.

Christ made some water into wine; but the wine is long since drank up. He chased some devils into the hogs; but the hogs are long since dead, and the worst devil that remains in the pigs is the trichina spiralis. This is probably the only miracle he worked that has been permanent. He raised some dead folks; but they must have died again long ago, as we fail to find them now on earth; and the dead seem to sleep as sound now as they did before the birth of Christ. He opened the eyes of some blind folks; but the blind of our day are as blind as the blind of two thousand years ago. He fed some hungry people with a few loaves of bread and two fishes; but the bread and the fishes are all used up long ago, and are of no account to us.

We conclude, therefore, that no results of Bible miracles remain to benefit us, unless we admit the trichina to be the remains of the devils in the pigs.

Let us suggest to you, then, brother Bennett, that should you become the founder of a new religion, you shall work miracles of a more enduring and beneficial character. Why not cause the Hudson River to flow port wine to the end of time? Why not have the waters of Lake Erie changed into milk, with a good stiff cream two feet thick on the top, churning itself into fresh butter as it passes over the falls of Niagara continually? Why not have the Mississippi changed into gruel, and the Columbia into golden sirup? Why not have the Potomac changed into honey, and the Delaware into whiskey? Why not cause the maple and the sycamore trees to grow fresh loaves of bread every morning so long as the world stands? Why not have the basswood and the elm to grow pancakes, and the pine to grow cotton, and the hemlock woolen goods ready to wear? Why not change the Rocky Mountain chain into piles of silver and gold coin, for the benefit of the new church? Why not have the Lookout Mountain changed into a solid diamond for the same noble purpose? Why not have three good ship canals put through the American continent from east to west on three well-selected parallels of latitude?

This could be done as easily as to cause a mountain to be plucked up by the roots and planted in the midst of the sea, and it would be of much more use; and you know it only requires faith of the size of a grain of mustard-seed to remove the mountain. A few such miracles as these would immortalize you, and make an entire end of skepticism and Infidelity. The people of this country would bless you more than the Irish do St. Patrick, who merely banished the snakes and the toads from the island.

I would suggest, also, that you appoint twenty-four apostles—twelve for the Old World and twelve for the New—and give each of them power to work all kinds of useful miracles, similar to those above mentioned, in all parts of the earth to which they are sent. But I would advise that they be strictly forbidden to raise people from the dead, as the earth is being filled up rapidly enough in the natural way, without working miracles to increase the population. I would also suggest that the apostles be instructed not to shake off the dust of their feet against those who reject them, as this would seem too foolish, and the people would not care much for a little dust. Why not rather turn their rivers into dirty, undrinkable water? This would increase their faith, and cause them to treat the apostles with greater civility. Should they remain stubborn after this, why not have them all struck by lightning?

Should you not wish to become the founder of the new church, do you not think Colonel Ingersoll would accept the nomination? I am inclined to think he is the next best man. Yours in the faith, M.

LA HARPE, ILL., April , 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have been for nearly forty years an accredited minister in the Presbyterian Church, but have long since ceased to preach its distinctive doctrines. I have devoted much time to delivering lectures, with the hope of harmonizing truth with the Church, but find it impossible. The Church has not liked my Liberal views, and has driven me to poverty. I now cease all effort to aid so unworthy a cause. I am fully convinced that modern orthodoxy is not the truth. As it claims to be based upon divine revelation, whatever may be true or untrue in regard to the Bible, as orthodoxy claims to be based upon its teachings, I deem that I serve the cause of truth by attacking that falsehood first which is their weak point. Afterward we can examine the claims of the Bible as a separate question. I propose to devote the little remnant of my life to public lectures, whenever and wherever Liberal men will help me to a place; and my principal subject is, that Nature is God, her laws are the laws of God, and, if properly studied, afford all that we can know of the will of God. I also give everywhere the following challenge:

A CHALLENGE.

The orthodox religion, as taught by the prominent denominations, is not Christianity, is not sustained by the Bible in doctrine, organization, practice, or moral influence. If the orthodox religion is not sustained by the Bible, as they claim it is, then it is the most stupendous fraud ever imposed on the human race. R. B. BEMENT.

ESCANABA, MICH., April 29, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A very rabid friend of mine met me the other day with the announcement that he had a good thing on us Infidels, and read the following:

"It is easy enough for the lovers of sin to Believe in no heaven they cannot get into,
And natural, too, for the wicked to doubt of
A hell which they fear that they cannot keep out of."

I immediately wrote him this reply, and told him to take a copy of it, but he was afraid he might die, and would not like to have that found in his pocket, lest the devil might catch him:

They cannot get into no heaven, 'tis true—
Perhaps that's the heaven in waiting for you;
And a fear that can make you so humble a tool
Is the natural fear of a natural fool!

No heaven, no hell; no hell or no heaven;
No knowledge of either to man has been given.
You would send me to hell for not thinking as you;
You say I'll be damned; I'll be damned if I do!

You Christians are sure of your heaven at last,
In providing for others why are you so fast?
If you by your creeds, I by actions as well,
Am content that the devil alone goes to hell.

But the need of the Church, at the close of its revel,
Is a sulphurous hole, where they keep a pet devil,
Where the doubters of dogma are hastily crammed,
Whom a merciful God has so tenderly damned!

ISAAC A. POOL.

SALEM, May 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You must be very patient and hopeful, and charitable also, to send your paper, as you have done, to an old woman of nearly a hundred years, wicked as an Infidel, blind as a bat, and "poor as a church mouse," with no hope of improvement. It appears to me that it would have been good policy for an all-wise and all-powerful God to have made the race capable of improving not only up to a certain time, but to the end of their life, so that length of days should be a perpetual joy. And then it might have been creditable to have not only made man perfect, as he is said to have done, but to have prevented the possibility of deterioration.

There is no doubt, in my opinion, that the stealing of your mail list was a Payneful operation. When circulars were sent to me, and, later, a paper and more circulars, it was very natural to think the address was obtained through a neighborly source and a supposed friendly one. It seems desirably that Liberal papers should multiply, if it can be done honestly, with original matter enough to render them palatable.

Accept, if you please, sir, my best thank-offering for printing the petition, etc. It has since been presented in the Salem Post, and may appear next week in Boston. A curious affair, indeed; yet far more popular than was expected. The most intelligent women are the most interested in the subject. Respectfully, M. U. FERRIN.

WATHENA, KAN., April 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed I send you an order for $3.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Linton's "Specific Payments," "Conversation on Finance," and your "Hour with the Devil." I must say your "Letters from the Devil," the principal of all evil to priests, are becoming quite philosophical in the macrocosm as well as the microcosm of the universe in accordance with the most enlightened research of advanced investigation. God heretofore has been accorded the most power, but has manifested the greatest ignorance of the position that man occupies in nature, while the devil, under your spiritual guidance, will bring the truth out all right, as it is in nature, showing that the much-despised devil is the wisest and best of the two. God has reigned long enough for the good of mankind; now let the devil take his place as the Prince of Light instead of darkness, as you ably make it. The fact is that God is and has been the biggest and centralized humbug of all humbugs combined, and only can be banished from the mind of man by the study of nature. The God idea of being all-powerful is the chimerical center of all superstitions. It is true, as Hobbes says, that all religions are but superstitions in fashion and that all superstions are religions out of fashion; so that all religions are superstitions, the centre of which is an imaginary god, which the enlightenment of man will banish from the mind. It is also true that fears have made his devils and weak hopes his gods. Gods with their unlimited power have been a thousand times more destructive to man's happiness than all the devils. So down with the gods and up with the devils on trial, and give us all the devil has to say, for thus far he is far superior to his great opponent, Jehovah God. Yours in behalf of truth,

JOHN GRABLE.

P. S.—Why can't you give your readers a picture of the devil to see what he looks like?

Notwithstanding I could not spring up a discussion on finance with G. F. Train in your paper, I will give you a few items:

1. To get up the honest dollar without monopoly.
2. To reduce interest without usury laws.
3. To stop taxation from running into confiscation.
4. To put an end to selling bonds on any account.
5. To put an end to all stock gambling.
6. To put an end to borrowing money at a loss of principal and interest to the borrower.
7. To put an end to panics.
8. All investments must be for productive capital.
9. All usury laws must be repealed.
10. It will preclude the necessity of a protective tariff, etc. J. G.

YOUNG'S POINT, CUSTER COUNTY, MONTANA TER., March 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am heartily glad you have continued THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address for I have got one occasionally, and also glad you got out of the coils of that contingent remnant of mortality, Anthony Comstock. While I was fighting Indians you were fighting superstition, the greatest enemy of the two. Take courage, brother Bennett, for you have many friends even here in these mountains and valleys. The hardy mountaineer and the trapper are your friends, for I have scattered the seed of Freethought in your tracts and paper and you are yet to receive from them a liberal support.

Many of this class of persons have been forced from the States on the account of Christian civilization and hypocrisy and therefore hate the very ground that Christian preachers walk on. I have sold the very last copy of "Lord Amberly" and would like you to send me a very nice one to keep in my family, and also a copy of the "Truth Seeker Collection." I expect soon to go to Bozeman, where and when I can have the privilege of remitting to you and squaring up our accounts. Yours with hope, A. J. YOUNG.

BOSTON, April 28, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I rejoice in your disposition to break down that stupendous fraud, Christianity, and its bulwarks, the Church and the Bible, which I have been interested in for years; and by my challenge to Moody and Sankey I lay my axe down to the root of the tree, so that its branches are fast withering. I work with you to the best of my abilities, always to hit its main branches, so that we learn that existence is dual, i. e., double; that there is not a part without its counterpart, and so that principle goes out into language, that there is not a word without its opposite; a word that has no opposite does not mean or express anything. As darkness expresses the absence of light, so belief only expresses the absence of knowledge. So when you tell me that you believe so or so, you simply tell me that you do not know. So that as long as these priestly gamblers can keep the people ignorant, so they will swallow down all their dirty nonsense, believe all they say, they will keep us in subjection to them, and hand out, and hand out to build up yonder costly edifices, with their tall steeples, filled with foolish people, dedicated to God, and protected from his wrath with a lightning-rod. Heathen idolatry, nothing more or less.

Very respectfully yours, N. H. DILLINGHAM.

TECUMSEH, MICH., April 29, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Respected Sir: I have taken your very valuable paper about three months, and like it better every day. At present I am attending school at Tecumseh, (which is some distance from my home) and this takes considerable money that would otherwise be expended in several of those valuable books of yours. I find here a great many who do not believe all the Christian religion but yet they are afraid to come out and declare their honest opinions. My knowledge at present is so limited that I am but a poor help to the Liberal cause; but by the aid of your papers and tracts I have put a few new ideas into the minds of some of my schoolmates. Yet this must all be done outside of the schoolroom, for this is a Christian school, I would have you understand. We are requested to have declamations, and to-day I presented the poem entitled, "Burying the Scarecrow" to the teacher, and asked that I might be permitted to speak it; but she thought it would not be suitable to the minds of the pupils, notwithstanding the greatest liberty is given to declamations and essays on the opposite side. We had quite a lengthy conversation on the affair; but the teacher is "boss" of course, and I must be contented to speak some piece about the great and holy Jesus. But let the good work go on, and when I am my own captain I shall be with you in this great reformation. Yours respectfully,

JOHN B. WHELAN.

RALEIGH, N. C., April 29, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A friend of mine kindly loaned me his copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER you sent him, and I must say, without an exception, it contains the most powerful, logical reading matter of any Liberal paper I ever saw. I was astonished at its comparatively low price of subscription, considering there is so much matter in it.

As far as I know, my friend and myself are the only avowed unbelievers in this city, and since I have read the works of Paine, the lectures of Ingersoll, and your paper, I have become so enthusiastic on the subject of which these works and your paper treat, that I have been free, bold, and outspoken, and have not hesitated to mention the matter to several of my friends and acquaintances. There is but very little Liberalism in the South, I presume—that is, my intercourse with many sections justifies me in this opinion, and our city is no exception to the rule. I know everybody here, and I think I can venture the assertion that I do not believe there are a dozen individuals here that know that a paper like yours, and books like you publish on Liberalism are in existence. I shall welcome the day when a copy of your valuable paper will be in every family in the land, and more especially in those of my own State, the members of which are still groping their way along the paths of superstition. Rest assured, sir, that I shall always be a hearty worker in the vineyards of Liberalism, and that I shall leave no stone unturned to advance your interests, as well also as that of the great cause for which you are battling, and that so successfully.

The following is a list of names of persons I have talked with who like your paper and the doctrines it teaches, but who never heard of such a paper. I think it advisible for you to send each a sample copy: W. E. Weaver, Ruffin Roles, M. V. B. Gilbert, Samuel Thompson, Charles Allen, and Walton Busbee. Direct all to Raleigh, N. C. If agreeable to you, that is, if you think well of the plan, I will send you more names as soon as I have an opportunity of conversing and reasoning with many whom I believe would join us, and make good, gallant soldiers. With my good wishes for your unbounded prosperity, and for the wide spread of the truth, I am, fraternally yours, M. A. M.

After the Battle.

The drums are all muffled; the bugles are still;
There's a pause in the valley—a halt on the hill;
And the bearers of standards swerve back with a thrill
Where sheaves of the dead bar the way;
For a great field is reaped, heavens's garners to fill.
Stern Death holds his harvest to-day.

There's a voice on the wind like a spirits low cry—
'Tis the muster roll sounding—and who shall reply?
Not those whose wan faces glare white to the sky,
With eyes fixed so steadfast and dimly;
As they wait that last trump which they may not defy.
Whose hands clutch the sword-hilt so grimly.

The brave heads, late lifted, are solemnly bowed,
And the riderless chargers stand quivering and cowed,
As the burial requiem is chanted aloud.
The groans of the death-stricken drowning;
While Victory looks on, like a queen, pale and proud,
Who awaits till the morrow her crowning.

There is no mocking blazon, as clay sinks to clay;
The vain pomps of the peace-time are all swept away
In the terrible face of the dread battle-day;
Nor coffins nor shroudings are here,
Only relics that lay where thickest the fray,
The casque rent and headless the spear.

Far away, tramp on tramp, peals the march of the foe
Like a storm-wave's retreating—spent, fitful, and slow,
With sounds like their spirits that faint as they go
By yon red-flowing river whose waters
Shall darken with sorrow the land where they flow
To the eyes of her desolate daughters.

They are fled—they are gone; but oh! not as they came,
In the pride of those numbers they staked on the game.
Never more shall they stand in the vanguard of fame;
Never lift the stained sword which they drew;
Never more shall they boast of a glorious name,
Never march with the leal and the true.

Where the wreck of our legions lay stranded and torn,
They stole on our ranks in the mists of the morn,
Like the giant of Gaza, their strength it was shorn
Ere those mists had rolled up to the sky;
From the flash of our steel a new daybreak seemed born
As we sprang up—to conquer or die.

The tumult is silenced; the death lots are cast;
The heroes of battle are slumbering their last.
Do ye dream of yon pale form that rode on the blast?
Would ye free it once more, O ye brave?
Yes! the broad road to honor is red where ye passed,
And of glory ye asked but—a grave!

Sorrow.

BY MATTIE SAWYER.

Sorrow is godlike; sorrow is grand;
It unbinds the spirit with wonderful hand.
In the greatest of souls it seeks for a home,
And the crown of all crowns was plaited of thorns.

Sorrow deals tenderly—never in vain;
Works out its blessings in tears and in pain;
'Tis the magical billow on which the heart rolls,
'Tis the test of all truths and the searcher of souls.

Sorrow uncovers what once was concealed;
Mystery on mystery is kindly revealed,
'Till the soul no longer a prisoner is bound,
It wakes! a new earth and new heaven are found.

How close the soul's walls! how narrow the way!
How weak are its pinions! till at length, day by day,
They widen and lengthen and tremble with power,
Then, unfledged, with new life, they heavenward soar.

Behind every note of a beautiful song—
No matter how joyous the words or the tone—
Are the relative minors; and whenever they fall
On the fine, cultured ear, they are sweetest of all.

O Sorrow! sweet angel, I know thou wilt bless;
I know thy keen blows all mean tenderness.
I will not approach thee with dread, slavish fear!
For what are the natures that ne'er suffer here?

Saturday Eve, April. 13. 1878.

An Acrostic.

BY C. FANNY ALLYN.

The war-cry of error is heard in the land,
Hell's fast-dying flames to renew.
Each note but proclaims to humanity's band:
Theology's passing from view;
Revealing the "kingdom of heaven" within,
Uncrushed by the demons of might,
Till Truth in her greatness, unfettered by sin,
Holds up her fair face to the light.
Speed onward, TRUTH SEEKER; awaken the world;
Echo back to the bigots who frown:
Eternal is right, and her flag is unfurled;
Kingdoms built upon falsehood come down!
Echo forth to the nations with misery fraught;
Redeeming salvation is found in Freethought.

Our Book Table.

CAREER OF RELIGIOUS IDEAS.—Their Ultimate: The Religion of Science. By Hudson Tuttle, Author of "Origin and Antiquity of man." "Career of the God idea" etc. D. M. Bennett, N. Y., publisher.

In this little work of 145 pages is condensed, and expressed in terse yet lucid paragraphs, information which ordinarily would be attainable only by a search through many ponderous volumes.

Here we find the earliest and rudest manifestations of the religious idea taken up and their gradual evolution into higher types described and discussed, by a masterly hand.

The work is full of such passages as the following: "Knowledge not only destroys dogmatism: it renders the existence impossible."

"It is said that we are conscious of this element (religious) within us; that by the failure of our schemes, the blasting of our hopes, the mystery which gathers arouud our lives, the limitation of our understanding, the unfathomableness of causation, we are prone to bow in submission and acknowledge a higher power governing nature. But we find, as knowledge of the laws of causation becomes more accurate, we are enabled to account for the blasting of our hopes, the failure of our plans, the mystery of our lives; are less impressed and overwhelmed with a sense of the unknown, and feel less of that dependence which some acute metaphysicians claim to be the ultimate of religious feeling."

"As the human mind cannot conceive of the existence of a higher type than itself, the gods must be human in their qualities."

But we must stop, for space will not here admit of further extracts. In future numbers we may avail ourselves of the privilege to present more copious quotations.

The book is neatly gotten out, both in paper and cloth, at 50 and 75 cents per copy. Those of our readers desiring it, can order through this office or direct of the publishers. We also offer the work in our club list.—Freethinker.

Lottery Circulars.

In the Supreme Court to-day George Dittenhoefer and L. F. Post, of New York, delivered arguments in No. 6, original ex parte, in behalf of A. O. Jackson, the petitioner, who was indicted, for sending through the mails lottery circulars, in the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York. This is a petition for habeas corpus and certiorari to bring up the case for review, the whole defense being rested upon the plea that the act of Congress under which the indictment was drawn prohibiting the putting of such matter in the mails, is unconstitutional. The argument is that the Constitution confers on Congress power only to establish post-offices and post roads and to carry the mails, but nowhere grants the power to distinguish between the different classes of matter forwarded by the people; that, while Congress has the exclusive right to provide for carrying the mails, it is bound to and cannot avoid carrying all the letters deposited for that purpose, whether the subject matter be business, love, politics, art, literature, or religion, and without regard to the views expressed. Congress has no alternative but to carry any letter put in the mails, provided the postage be paid and other proper and appropriate regulations be complied with. It is admitted that the power exists to prevent treasonable correspondence. But it is insisted that this power is inherent in all governments, and in ours is not a power derived from the postal grant in the Constitution, and hence is not involved in the consideration of this case. Congress, it is said, would have this power, or its exercise would not be open to criticisms, if the people had conferred upon that body authority to regulate public morals; but that power has never been conferred, and it cannot, therefore, be exercised except where the general government has territorial jurisdiction.

A MATTER FOR THE STATES.

This subject of lotteries and that of morals are for the States. If they tolerate them there is no power to suppress them, nor in the case of a State declaring them illegal would the general government assist in enforcing the State laws on the subject. The States may permit the business of lottery dealing, and if they do the business is legitimate, and Congress can no more exclude correspondence in relation to it than it can that relating to any bther business. The argument is based principally upon the proposition that the grant in the Constitution does not confer sovereign power over the entire postal subject as is the case with the patent, copyright, bankruptcy and other grants, but is limited to the power to devise ways and means for carrying mail matter. That this power was intended to secure a privilege to the people, and when Congress exercises the grant it must permit the enjoyment of the privilege, which is that the people shall have carried in the mail everything that was understood to be mail matter at the adoption of the Constitution, that is, all intelligence contained in letters and packets.

They referred to the memorable debate of 1836, in which Clay, Webster, and other eminent statesmen of that day, took part, when it was sought to prohibit the transportation of anti-slavery documents, Clay taking the ground that no such power existed under the Constitution.

The Attorney-General briefly replied to the arguments of counsel for the petitioner. —Washington Dispatch of April 30th, to N. Y. Herald.

The Herald on Comstockism.

In alluding to a bill now in the State legislature of New York, the Herald has this pertinent paragraph in regard to the manner of conducting business by Anthony Comstock and his sneaking aids: "There is another feature in the bill which ought to be made universal as to every alleged infraction of a statute that regulates or prohibits vice, and that is the prohibition of arrests unless there be a warrant first obtained. The dangerous practice of allowing anti-cruelty agents or Comstock officers or policemen to organize impromptu courts in the streets, and to play judges so as to decide each man on his own ipse dixit whether and when and how law has been violated, has gone quite far enough in this country. It would not be tolerated for a day in England. It would not have been tolerated here for a day before the civil war."

The Metric System.

Alexander H. Stephens has introduced in the House a bill to promote the general use of the metric system. The following are the tables which Mr. Stephens proposes:

Measures of length—100 traces make a nail.
100 nails make a meter.
100 meters make a kile.

Measures of surface—10,000 square meters make a great acre.

Measures of bulk and capacity—100 drops make a spoon.
100 spoons make a quart.
100 quarts make a cask.

Measures of weight—100 seeds make a corn.
100 corns make a nut.
100 nuts make a bi-pound or bip.
1,000 bips make a ton.

The World thinks this nomenclature could be improved upon, and proposes the following for the table of weight:

10 hunks make 1 gob.
10 gobs make 1 chunk (or dekagob).
10 chunks make 1 heap.

There is not one of Mr. Stephens' constituents who could not master this nomenclature. In long measure, again, where Mr. Stephens confuses his constituents with "seeds" and "corns," how simple and symmetrical would it be to say:

10 steps make one hopskipanjump.
10 hopskipanjumps make 1 piece.
10 pieces make 1 right smart go-by.

Here is a terminology not arrived at by fumbling in Greek dictionaries, but fresh from the people and racy of the soil. Liquid measure again should be brought home to our business and bosoms in some such way as this:

10 swallows make 1 drink.
10 drinks make 1 spree.
10 sprees make one triangle (or jims).

And an intelligible table of dry measure would be:

10 nibbles make one bite.
10 bites make one square meal, and so forth. We have no doubt that Mr. Stephens means well, and that he is trying to bring the metric system within the scope of the meanest capacity, say of two "spoons." But he should break at once and forever with the effete terminology of Europe.

THE BATTLE-AX.

Not an Axe to grind! Read it All!

Motto.—"Peace if possible, but truth at any price."

THE BATTLE-AXE has the reputation of being the bravest Paper at present printed on this Planet. To prove this of course you must see it; but we have prepared a partial Table of Contents, and you Truth Seeker readers should read it ALL, for not once in an age do you get hold of such a paper.

CONTENTS OF MAY NUMBER.

1. THE FREE-LOVE CONVENTION OF TWO. Full Reports of Heywood's 5 Sessions in Worcester, occupying over five columns with fac simile of his mammoth Poster.

2. REVIEW OF "CUPID'S YOKES," THE Book for which Comstock caused Heywood's arrest. This a sharp criticism,—points out tendencies of the work hitherto overlooked. Read it sure.

3. COMMENTS ON A WILL. The effects of a prejudice strong in life and death.

4. "REFORMERS" WHO NEED REFORMING. A trenchant article on PETERSON, PAYNE, (of the The Age of Reason) and a few others of that ilk.

5. HEZEKIAH WHETSTONE ON MOODY and "Mager Whittle," "Church Dets," &c. Have you never read Whetstone? Then you have missed a rich treat. His articles are widely read.

6. THE MATRIMONIAL NEWS & ITS SPAWN Exposure of an insidious Fraud and fountain of Vice. Should be put in the hands of every Parent in the Land, to guide the Children off the rocks and shoals of Immorality and Vice. Send for Battle-Axe.

7. HEZEKIAH ON FREE LOVE. Hezekiah visits the HEYWOODS' "Conventions" and tells what he thinks about "The Show" in a rather free manner. Although scathing, it will do great good by opening people's eyes all around.

SPRINGFIELD HYGEIAN HOME.

That others may know more of what we are trying to do, I will simply state that during the three years we have been here nearly 1,000 persons have been successfully treated by us for a great variety of diseases, both acute and chronic, including Fever and Ague, Congestive Chills, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Neuralgia, Female diseases, Insanity, Consumption, inflammatory Rheumatism, White Swellings, Paralysis, etc. But one death occurred in all that number, and every one benefited or permanently cured where the laws of life were strictly adhered to. With a fair trial, where cure is possible, we may safely promise good health to all. Please state definitely the nature and probable cause of your disease, when contracted, age, amount of drugs taken, etc., and we will give you an honest reply as to the probability of recovery.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

BY KERSEY GRAVES,

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark.

Heathens of the Heath;

A ROMANCE, BY WM. McDONNELL,

AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," ETC.

This work is rich in romantic and pathetic incidents, and exhibits with an overwhelming array of facts the atrocities committed by the Church. It shows that the purest morality exists without the Bible, and that many of the heathen philosophers were lovers of virtue. The folly of Christian ministers is fully portrayed, Hypocrisy and bigotry are clearly exposed, and the road to virtue and true happiness plainly marked out. A most pleasing romance is woven into the work, in which much opportunity is afforded the author for fine descriptions and beautiful sentiments which he so well knows how to give utterance to. The characters in the tale are invested with much interest: the hero and heroine gain the love of every reader. "On the whole, it is the work of a master hand—a work of unaffected beauty and the deepest interest." "One of the most valuable features of the work is, its positions are all proven. . . Every thinking, enquiring mind should peruse it." 500 pp., 12mo. Price, in paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

and one of the youngest may both now be had at the price of the former by any NEW subscriber to "the grand and sterling old Boston Investigator." Col. Ingersoll said: "The Investigator is the best of the Liberal papers." (This was before he read the Evolution.) We will send both papers, prepaid, one year, to any bona fide new subscriber to the Investigator, for $3.50, which is the price of the Investigator alone.

The Investigator is now in its forty-seventh year. It is a weekly of eight large folio pages, contains the news pertaining to Liberalism, reports of meetings, correspondence all over the world, abstracts, and sometimes full reports, of such Liberal lecturers as Col. Ingersoll, B. F. Underwood, Horace Seaver, and other eloquent Freethinkers.

Every Radical in America should take these two papers and induce others to take them.

In addition to the above splendid offer, we offer until May 1st to send, in addition, to any one not now a subscriber to either the Evolution or the Investigator who will send us $3.50—to reach us before May 1st—a copy of a choice edition of the Koran. Address

The Priest in Absolution,

The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition: had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

Two Great Books!

FREEMASONRY EXPOSED.—The greatest hit of the day. Generously and truthfully illustrated, and written by a man "raised" in New York. Nearly half a million copies sold in two years. It will be appreciated by both Masons and outsiders—by ladies as well as gentleman; and, in fact, no Mason's wife should fail to read this EXPOSE. 32 pages, 4to, 25 cents.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP EXPOSED.—Both Odd and even Fellows have pronounced this "expose" one of the best things that has ever come from the humorous press of America, and fully equal to "Freemasonry Exposed." 32 pages, 4to, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

LET him that would move the world first move himself.—Socrates.

ALL philosophy lies in two words, "sustain" and "abstain."—Epictetus.

HOW CHARMING is divine philosophy! not harsh nor crabbed, as dull fools suppose, but musical as is Apollo's lute.—Milton.

INGRATITUDE! thou marble-hearted fiend! more hideous when thou showest thyself in a child than a sea monster.—Shakspere.

EVERY person has two educations, one which he receives from others, and one more important, which he gives himself.—Gibbon.

IT is by what we have done, and not by what others have done for us, that we shall be remembered by after ages.—Dr. Wayland.

PHILANTHROPY, like charity, must begin at home. From this centre our sympathies may extend in an ever-widening circle.—Lamb.

THE nerve that never relaxes, the eye that never blenches, the thought that never wanders—these are the masters of victory.—Burke.

IT is this miracle of incredulity on the part of the Jews, rather than that of the resurrection, that should be taken into account.—Diderot.

PHILOSOPHY is a modest profession, it is all reality and plain dealing; I hate solemnity and pretense, with nothing but pride at the bottom. —Pliny.

A PERSON was once asked if he believed there were any real Atheists. "Do you believe," was the answer, "that there are any real Christians?"—Diderot.

ALAS! if the principles are not within us, the height of station and worldly grandeur will as soon add a cubit to a man's stature as to his happiness.—Sterne.

I HATE all bungling as I do sin, but particularly bungling in politics, which leads to the misery and ruin of many thousands and millions of people.—Goethe.

WHAT is even poverty itself, that a man should murmur under it? It is but as the pain of piercing a maiden's ear, and you hang your precious jewels in the wound.—Richter.

THE great blessings of mankind are within us and within our reach; but we shut our eyes, and, like people in the dark, we fall foul upon the very thing we search for without finding it. —Seneca.

IN all the affairs of human life, social as well as political, I have remarked that courtesies of a small and trivial character are the ones which strike deepest to the grateful and appreciative heart.—Henry Clay.

THE only true source of politeness is consideration—that vigilant moral sense which never loses sight of the rights, the claims, and the sensibilities of others. This is the one quality, over all others, necessary to make a gentleman. —Simms.

WE read in the life of M. de Juvenne that a house having caught fire, the presence of the holy sacrament suddenly arrested the flames. Very good; but we likewise read in history that a monk having poisoned a consecrated host, a certain emperor of Germany had no sooner swallowed it than he died.—Diderot.

SOME have said that it is not the business of private men to meddle with government—a bold and dishonest saying, which is fit to come from no mouth but that of a tyrant or a slave. To say that private men have nothing to do with government is to say that private men have nothing to do with their own happiness or misery; that people ought not to concern themselves whether they be naked or clothed, fed or starved, deceived or instructed, protected or destroyed.—Cato.

I KNOW these godly people; they are prompt to take the alarm. If they once think that this writing contains anything contrary to their ideas, I must expect and be prepared for all the calumnies they have thrown broadcast on a thousand better men than I. If I only letter the sentence, pater major me est (my father is greater than I), then Christ is not God. If we must understand in its literal sense the sentence, hac est corpus meum, he gave himself with his own hands to his apostles, which is as absurd as to say that St. Denis kissed his own head after it had been cut off.—Diderot.

HIS father was an excellent workman, and the son, as a matter of course, having his father's knowledge and experience to build upon, should far excel him in his calling. But stop! Is this not some apology for the inefficiency of the boy? Are you not expecting too much of him? Can the stream rise higher than the fountain? Remember the child has two parents, and is a combination of both, and consequently must differ materially from either of them. Ah! there lies the secret of the whole matter. The mother is a poor, ignorant, weak-minded drudge, knowing nothing, caring for nothing save the little round of every-day labor that constitutes her household duties, and not even beautifying them with a high or noble aspiration. Or mayhap she is a pretty petted creature of fashion, wholly interested in dress, display, and finery. Pause, then, O man and woman, before you choose who shall be the fathers and mothers of your children. Do not marry for a housekeeper, a home, a provider, or a pretty face. You should certainly have as much consideration for the credit, name, fame, and honor of your children as you would for the sort of hogs, cows, sheep, or horses which you rear upon your farms. Don't marry a fool or an ignoramus if you wish for wise, good, and talented children, who will be an honor to you and the race.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

ALMOST any sort of a fight is a do ill.

WHEN is a mother a father? When she's a sigher.

WHAT time is it when the clock strikes 13? Time to get it fixed.

A DUTCHMAN repeated the adage "Birds of a feather flock together" thusly: "Birds mit one fedder goes mit themselves."

"THE book trade is affected, I suppose, by the general depression. What kind of books feel it the most?" "Pocket-books," was the laconic reply.

"IF righteous men are the salt of the earth, why may not pretty girls be considered its sugar?" asked a gentleman of a little girl. "Because," she replied, "we are its 'lasses."

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL class in Wilmington was asked who was the author of the Psalms. Silence at first; then a little hand was held up. "I know." "Who?" asked the teacher. "Sam!"

WHEN the Princess Helen was born it was told the Princess Royal that she had got a young sister. "Oh, that is delightful!" cried the innocent royalist. "Do let me go and tell mamma!"

A YANKEE humorist was giving an account of his experience as a hotel-keeper. "Did you clear anything by it?" asked a listener. "I cleared a six-rail fence getting away from the sheriff," was the answer.

AN Irishman with a heavy bundle on his shoulder, riding on the front of a horse-car, was asked why he didn't set the bundle on the platform. He replied, "Indade the horses have load enough. I'll carry the bundle."

"YES, gentlemen, certainly," said a polite clothier; "if you want a pair of pants, step right into my pantry; if a vest, walk right up to my vestry; and if a coat—here, Jacob, show these gentlemen into the coterie. This way, this way, gentlemen."

ONE was a Baptist and the other was a Congregationalist. The waiter asked them what they'd order. "A little dipped toast," said the Baptist. "You may give me toast also," said the Congregationalist, very carefully, "but don't dip it—sprinkle it with a little butter."

AN old, rough clergyman once took for his text that passage of the Psalm, "I said in my haste, All men are liars." Looking, apparently, as if he saw the Psalmist standing before him, he said, "You said it in your haste, David. If you had been here, you might have said it after mature deliberation."

"HERE'S my wife and I," said a husband, with much complacency, to his silver-wedding guests, "who have been married five-and-twenty years, and in all that time haven't had a single unkind word with one another." "By Jove!" exclaimed one of the guests, "what a stupid time you must have had of it!"

THERE is a precocious six-year-old boy who is wonderful on spelling and definition. The other day his teacher asked him to spell "matrimony." "M-a-t-r-i-m-o-n-y," said the youngster, promptly. "Now define it," said the teacher. "Well," replied the boy, "I don't know exactly what it means; but I know mother's got enough of it."

"DEN you'se on de side of de flah an' brimstone in dis hell discussion?" "You'se right, honey! Ef you tink you'se gwine to leebe dis wurld ter play snow-ball somewhar, you'se 'rong. Dar's er warm place jess beyant heah fer de manigers of de Freedman's Bank an' chickin-lifters ginrully, else I'se gwine to swap my himbook fer er pack er kyards."

A CERTAIN judge, whose pompous and officious ways tempted some of the lawyers to acts which his honor construed to mean contempt, fined them ten dollars each. When they had paid their fines, a certain dry and steady-going old lawyer walked up to the bench and very gravely laid down ten dollars. "What is that for?" said the judge. "For contempt, your honor," was the reply. "Why, I have not fined you for contempt," answered the judge. "I know that," said the lawyer; "but I want you to understand that I cherish a secret contempt for this court all the time, and I am willing to pay for it."

SLIGHT MISAPPREHENSION.—"'A new tale for the boys just out.'" said Mrs. Partington, as she read the announcement on a bookseller's window in Washington street, and she smiled with the conceit that crossed her mind. She looked at Ike, who was gazing into the window very wistfully at some pictures. "How do you think you would like a tail, dear?" she asked, looking from him to the placard on the window. He grinned at the question, and, looking in the same direction as herself, replied, "First rate."

Though the word "tale" was legitimately spelled, her mind had accepted for it a caudal signification that rather ran behind the bookseller's meaning. Ike's readiness to answer rather alarmed her, and with an assumed gravity she remarked: "You would like to have a tail, would you? Well, well, boys are so apt to act like monkeys that they may want to look like them."

"It is a story," said Ike, who saw through the mistake she had made.

"Don't be impenitent, Isaac," said she. "Never say anybody tells a story, because it's just as bad as saying they lie. It isn't good manners."

"It's a story-book, that's just out," persisted the juvenile.

"Why," responded she, "so it is; what a mistake it was! I declare, I believe I am losing my sensations."

She moved onward, thinking what a queer mistake she had made, and Ike amused himself by moving on behind a big man, in a vain endeavor to keep up with his stride.

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 20. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, May 18, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A SABBATH-school scholar was asked what Adam lost when he fell, and he replied, "I suppose it was his balance."

MEN are frequently like tea—the real strength and goodness are not properly drawn out until they have been in hot water.

CINCINNATI Commercial (Ind.): "The straws in the wind appear to indicate that in course of time church property will be taxed."

MRS. HAYES says it's all a mistake about their not being able to get the tune to "When I can Read my Title Clear" at the White House Sunday evening sings.

AN old negro fiddler of Cuthbert "got religion" a few days ago, whereupon he shivered his fiddle on the doorstep, saying: "No man kin hab religion an' be a fiddler."—Columbus Sun.

TALMAGE performed a sermon last Sunday on the "Sick Men of the Bible." We would respectfully suggest that "Men Sick of the Bible" would furnish an excellent subject for his next Sunday's gyrations.

ALTHOUGH the temporal power of the pope is now a thing of the past, a papal army still exists. According to a German military paper, this force consists at the present time of 80 Papal Guards, 450 Palace Guards, 50 Noble Guards, 150 Swiss, and 5 firemen.

AT a prayer meeting in western Pennsylvania, a very rich, very pious, and very ignorant man by the name of Brush got up, shut his eyes, and opened prayer with, "Oh, thou eternal, almighty, obnoxious Jehovah." A titter went round that came near breaking up the meeting.

A LITTLE boy in a Sioux City Sunday-school put a poser to his teacher. The lady was telling her class how God punished the Egyptians by causing the first-born in each household to be slain. The little boy listened attentively, and, at the proper interval, mildly inquired, "What would God have done if there had been twins?"

THE London Medical Examiner states that a man named Hicks, recently suffering from hydrophobia in the Chelmsford Infirmary, has been discharged thence. The disease had apparently left him, though he was still in a weakened state. The dog which bit a boy at Stockport in England is alive and well, though the boy died of hydrophobia.

A PETITION has been filed in the Chancery division of the High Court of Justice [London], to deprive Mrs. Besant of her daughter, Mabel, on the ground that Mrs. Besant is an atheist, and writes and speaks against Christianity, and that she has published the Knowlton pamphlet and the "Law of Population." This petition has been presented by the Rev. Frank Besant of Sibsey, after he was aware that the little girl was ill in bed with scarlet fever.—The Evolution.

MINISTERIAL SCANDALS.—The latest thing out is the announcement that the Rev. I. S. Kalloch is lecturing on "Ministerial Scandals" at San Francisco. He will be remembered as the person who figured as a popular preacher in Tremont Temple, Boston, some twenty odd years age, and who fell from grace by drinking whiskey and having too much to do with "a lady in black." As a frightful example, he can in person point his lecture with the moral it conveys.

IT took one bishop, eight priests, and a swarm of Redemptionist fathers, cheered on by the presence of three thousand spectators, just four hours to consecrate two new altars in a church in this city recently. But they were difficult altars to consecrate, being alive with agate angels, swarming with silver saints, variegated with varnished virgins, jeweled with jasper Jesuses, and all overshadowed by a huge silver-plated Holy Ghost, exquisitely ornamented with gold-mounted pin-feathers and wings. The magnificence and grandeur of the consecration filled the Almighty with awe; and it is rumored in heaven that he is a little shy about taking possession of his costly residence while so many of his poor young ones are starving to death in China.

THE Rev. Mr. Vosburgh of Jersey City is now on trial for wife-poisoning. The case looks very bad for him. Vosburgh wanted children, but his wife was persistently and obstinately childless. He accuses her of using means to prevent conception. That may be a sufficient justification for poisoning in his estimation, but we will see what the jury think about it. Pity Vosburgh's mother had not received one of Colgate's prevention-of-conception pamphlets about a year before his birth.

THE English statute 37, Henry VIII., C. 17, ordains that the King's Majesty "hath full power to correct, punish, and repress all manner of heresies, &c., growing within the Church of England, and to exercise all other manner of jurisdiction, commonly called ecclesiastical jurisdiction," and that "the archbishops and other ecclesiastical persons have no manner of jurisdiction ecclesiastical but by, under, and from the royal Majesty," and that to the King's Majesty only "by Holy Scripture all authority and power is wholly given to determine all manner of cases ecclesiastical."

THE Rev. W. G. Haskell has preached his farewell sermon in the Episcopal Church in Medford, Mass. The parish requested him to resign. He says that his downfall is the result of an unfortunate combination of circumstances. One evening he took a large dose of Medford rum to cure a cold, and went to bed; but he had scarcely fallen asleep when a surprise party of young folks took possession of his house. He had to get up and entertain them. The rum and the sudden awakening dazed him, and he created the impression that he was grossly intoxicated, whereas he is sure that he was "only just a little bewildered."

THE French journal Le Pèlerin thus describes the arrival of Pius IX. in Paradise: "On entering he received from the Immaculate Virgin Mary a crown, as a reward for the crown which he had given her on earth. St. Joseph, whom he had made patron of the Church, did not fail to shake hands with him warmly, and to express his thanks. St. Peter, on seeing him, opened the choir at once. Hilarius, Francis of Sales, and Alfonso of Liguori, the three doctors of the Church, proclaimed by him, glorified by turns the deeds of his pontificate. Fifty-two saints and twenty-six beatified ones, who owe him their present positions, entertained him with a sweet concert."

THE Rev. Dong Wong, a native Chinaman, who was recently ordained to labor among his almond-eyed brethren on the Pacific coast, prosecutes his work under disadvantages. The Chinese have been so roughly treated by a great many people who call themselves Christians that they hate Christianity, and do not want its doctrines promulgated among them. In Oregon, where Dong Wong is now trying to convert his countrymen, this feeling is particularly strong. Dong has two big revolvers, and everywhere that Dong goes the revolvers are sure to go. He has not as yet shot any of his hearers, but declares that he means business, and will shoot somebody if it shall, in his best judgment, seem necessary to do so. If it comes to a choice between being shot and being converted, Dong will probably have some converts to report.

THE ENCYCLICAL.—If any one had cherished a hope that the new pope was to be unlike the old pope; that he was to be a sort of liberal, and that he desired in any way "to go back" on the acts of his predecessor, a perusal of Leo XIII.'s eloquent Encyclical, the full text of which has just reached us, would dissipate that delusion. Not one of the multitudinous briefs, bulls, or allocutions of Pio Nono excels it in vigorous assertion of the absolute necessity of the territorial independence of the pope; of the unlimited supremacy of the Church; of the wickedness and falsity of the revolt against her; and of the ruin into which the family and the world would fall should the Church abnegate her authority or be crushed into silence. Nor does the new pope fear the future; he strikes an exultant note, and predicts fresh victories and grand triumphs for the Church; victories and triumphs to be obtained through "the mediation of the Throne of God, of the Immaculate Queen of Heaven, and as intercessors St. Joseph, the celestial patron of the Church; the holy apostles, Peter and Paul; all the orders of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and all the flock of the Lord."—Graphic.

THE religious sensation in Georgia is the trial of Deacon Frank E. Block of the Central Presbyterian Church, Lawrenceville, for allowing some young visitors to enjoy a dance in his parlor on the 27th of December last. Mr. Block was arraigned before the elders of the church to answer a charge of having violated the laws of the Bible and of the Church in permitting round and square dances in his house, and was suspended from membership by a vote of four to three. The deacon was not satisfied, however, to allow this decision to remain final, and he appealed to the Atlanta Presbytery. The issue raised by the pleading is: "First, is dancing wrong per se according to Biblical law? and, second, is dancing entirely prohibited by the deliverances of the Presbyterian General Assemblies, or are lascivious and promiscuous dances only forbidden?" The defendant admits that he allowed and encouraged dancing on the occasion in question, but asserts that the dancing was neither promiscuous nor lascivious in its nature. Both parties—the deacon and the session which suspended him—are represented by able pleaders, and the result will be awaited with interest by those Presbyterians who hanker after the whirl and gayety of the ballroom.

THE people who have trotted out Pastor John Jasper as a lecturer will do a good deed by letting him return in peace to his Richmond congregation, where it seems he is beloved and honored. As a lecturer he is simply ridiculous, and he is so profoundly ignorant that when his hearers laugh at him for uttering the amazing nonsense he does, he takes it for admiration and endorsement of his views. His "lecture" is a rambling mess of statements about Moses, Joshua, and other Scripture characters, mixed up with a little of almost everything that comes into his venerable head. After working himself up to a state of excitement on these things for half an hour or more, he plunges into the subject of the rotation of the sun round the earth, which he handles to his own great satisfaction simply by adducing a few passages from Scripture which speak of the "rising and setting of the sun." Jasper's strongest point in lecturing is that in which he proves the earth to be square instead of round, as commonly supposed. For proof of his theory he relies on what he finds in Revelations vii. 1, which speaks of "four angels standing on the four corners of the earth." He triumphantly exclaims, "Dar! How can any ting wot's got four corners be round? I tell you de earf's squar, or my name ain't John Jasper!" Then the audience applaud vigorously, and the eloquent lecturer is more firmly than ever fixed in his opinion.

REV. J. W. MARTIN, pastor of the Methodist Church in Anita, Iowa, has, through the Investigating Committee, been proven guilty of the charges of "abusing his wife, and attempting to ruin her character." He was cruelly jealous of her, not on account of any love anywhere, that ennobles instead of degrades, and which worketh no ill to a neighbor, but apparently from an inherent disposition to cover faults of his own, and to account for his unmanly and malignant persecutions. He made a desperate attempt to ruin her reputation and to deprive her of friends and support by charging that she became pregnant while visiting her friends and had produced abortion, so he brought an over-zealous doctor on the stand to testify that the child had been dead three weeks when born! which wonderful statement, if true, though shown to be an unheard-of occurrence, would help corroborate the husband's gross charges. The truth seems to be that the miscarriage was caused by the cruel persecutions and direct abuse of the guilty pastor (who kept a female in the house, a personal enemy of the wife) whose testimony was far-fetched and did more towards producing the verdict rendered than all the other testimony. As one of the fair-minded committee said, "A man who would testify to such things, must either be a fool or a knave." And we agree with the Anita Times from which we condense this report in thinking that a man who would introduce such testimony against his wife is abundantly capable of committing every crime charged against him.

Events of the Week.

GENERAL DAKIN, of sharp-shooting celebrity, is dead.

EXTENSIVE forest fires are raging in Vineyard Haven, Mass.

GENERAL GRANT and family are "doing" the Paris Exposition.

THE American Indians are scalping the Mexicans now. Tit for tat.

THE National party has nominated a State ticket in Pennsylvania.

POPE LEO has been attacked with inflammation of his infallible liver.

PROFESSOR JOSEPH HENRY, of the Smithsonian Institute, died on the 13th inst.

CANADA is preparing for a Fenian invasion. Several regiments are under arms.

A JOINT resolution has been passed by the House to enforce the eight-hour law.

THE steamer Sardinia, from Liverpool for Quebec, was burned; large loss of life.

COL. INGERSOLL addressed the various intelligent citizens of Keene, N. H., on the 17th.

CHARLES MORGAN, the steamship prince, is dead. He leaves $13,000,000 to his afflicted heirs.

THE strikers in England are suffering terribly. Rioting and bloodshed are occurring daily.

THE wife of the Right Honorable John Bright died of apoplexy on the 13th, in Rochdale, England.

THE Democratic members of Congress are making herculean efforts to oust Hayes from the Presidency.

AN attempt has been made to assassinate Emperor William of Germany. It is rumored that the Jesuits are at the bottom of the plot.

VIRGINIA, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts have been visited by violent rain and hail storms; crops and fruits were seriously damaged.

BEECHER'S eldest sister, Catherine, is dead; aged seventy-eight. She was not as religious as her great brother, but infinitely more moral.

BELLEVILLE coal-miners are starving and begging for bread. The Bible Society is begging for $50,000 to pay fat salaries to its sinecure officers.

WINSLOW, the $12,000 thief, has been pardoned by the President. The $5 thieves are all in jail yet, and must serve out their terms, the wretches.

THE monotony of the famine in China has been broken by a terrible tornado, which a merciful God sent to add to the afflictions of that wretched country.

GENERAL TERRY has telegraphed to Bismarck, Dakota, for troops to be held in instant readiness to take the field. Immediate trouble with the Indians is apprehended.

RUSSIA is watching British movements; the Fenians are watching Russian movements, anxious for a chance to take a hand in the fight; and now British spies have arrived in this country to watch Fenian movements.

THE United States of Columbia has granted to a French company the right to construct an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama. The canal must be completed inside of eighteen years or the contract becomes void.

CHRISTIAN FINANCIERING.—Edwin M. Hall, President of the Merchants' National Bank of Whitehall, defaulted, $100,000; arrested.—G. R. Waterman, Lawrence, Mass., embezzled $160,000; arrested.—Harry Beadle, banker, Elmira, N. Y., embezzled over $200,000; escaped.—Several States yet to hear from.

DR. CROSBY'S Society-for-the-Prevention-of-Crime bill did not pass in the legislature. The section giving half the fines to the society was stricken out, and, as that was the only feature the speculators in crime had any interest in, they let the bill drop and returned to New York to devise some other scheme to fill their pockets at the expense of the community.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"All right," said Edith; "but I shall not promise you to fall in love with him, or his picture, for that is what you have brought, I presume."

"Yes; and now take a good look at it," said Sue, as she handed her friend a folded paper.

Edith unwrapped it, and took a step forward to where the light could fall full upon it. A good face—yes, a grand and noble one—a broad, square forehead; dark chestnut hair, just wavy enough not to seem stiff; eyes deep, dark blue, and fathomless as the ocean depths; beard decidedly auburn, but full, rich, and handsome. Every feature bespoke intelligence, character, and determination. Several moments passed, and Edith still stood, as it were, spellbound, gazing as if entranced and fascinated upon the picture.

Sue watched her eagerly, and, quivering all over with suppressed merriment and excitement, she found herself unable longer to keep silent and exclaimed in a tragic-comic doleful voice: "Farewell, Edith, friend of my girlhood! Thou art gone—forever gone! I shall never, never see thee more! Ah! ah, fatal picture, why did I bring thee?"

"Oh, Sue, do stop your bantering nonsense," said Edith, pettishly, "I don't see as marriage has sobered you down one bit."

"Sobered me? No indeed, I should hope not! Why it has just intoxicated me completely. I feel like a butterfly which has escaped from its entombment in the dark, gloomy cell of the cocoon into the glad, bright, free outside world of brightness, joy, and beauty. Why, I am so happy I scarce feel that I touch the ground as I walk, and I burst out singing every few moments, and sing inside of me all the time! Sobered me! I've had enough of soberness to last me one lifetime at least;" and clouds flitted across the fair young face as she thought of all the dark, dreary past, and its sore trials and bitter sorrows.

"Oh! do forgive me, Sue darling; I did not mean to chide you. I want you to be just as happy as you can. You don't know how it rejoices us to see you so merry and glad—such a perfect little sunbeam. Your playful bantering somehow touched a chord that jarred unpleasantly, and I spoke petulantly and impatiently on the impulse of the moment. So please forgive and forget."

"Yes, yes, it is all right, Edith; but you will keep the picture, will you not?"

"Why should I? I shall, perhaps, never see the original, and if I should, he might not please me as his shadowed resemblance here does."

"Oh yes, you will see him, Edith, for he is to be here in September on business, and will stay a week at our house, and I'm going to turn match-maker then, and make the grandest match this little town ever knew." And Sue laughed a sunny, girlish laugh as she danced across the floor. "But, Edith," she continued, looking earnestly at her friend, "you haven't asked me a single question yet as to how and where I made his acquaintance, or a thing about him. Have you no curiosity at all?"

"Certainly I have, you little witch. So just come back on the porch, and tell me all you want to, for I know you are aching to do so."

"Well," said Sue, as they were once more seated, "you see it was when we were in O——. There is a large pond or lake there near the hotel, and one day we took a sail in a little row-boat, and I was feeling my very best, so full of life and fun I couldn't sit still, and somehow in stepping about I upset the boat. Charlie couldn't swim a stroke and we were some little distance from the shore. I had sunk the second time, when I felt a strong arm grasp me, and that is the last I remember till I found myself lying on a sofa in a strange room. An old lady sat by my side bathing my face with cologne. Starting up suddenly I exclaimed, 'Where is Charlie?' 'He is safe, my dear,' said the lady. 'Pray compose yourself, and as soon as you feel able you shall put on some dry clothes and he shall come in and see you.' 'And who was it that took me out of the water just as I was thinking I had seen the last glimpse of Charlie and the bright, beautiful world?' said I, shuddering at my narrow escape. 'It was my son, Sisson Williams,' she replied. 'He saw you upset, and, fearing one if not both of you might drown, plunged in and swam to the rescue. He first brought you ashore, and then went back for your husband and the boat to which he was still clinging.' 'Oh! pray let me dress quickly,' said I, 'that I may see and thank our preserver.' 'Have patience, and it will not be long ere you shall be made presentable,' said the good woman, smiling and assisting me to make my toilet in a suit of her clothes which were a world too big and long, but with a soft, light, pink shawl over all, it did not look in the least unbecoming. You see, I've grown proud of my good looks Edith, since I've some one to admire me.' And she laughed as she continued, 'The sound of approaching steps was followed by a rap at the door, and in a moment I was laughing and crying in Charley's arms, while he reproached himself for taking his precious wife on the water when he knew he was so helpless as to not know how to swim. 'Never mind; it is all my fault,' said I. And then turning towards the young gentleman, I said, 'And this is Mr. Williams, is it? And our preserver? Oh, how can I thank you?' 'It was but an act of common humanity,' said he, 'that cost me only a wetting, so do not feel under any obligation, but allow me to say the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Mrs. Flowers is enough to recompense me for greater exertions than that.' And now, I suppose, you want to know how he looked. He was the grandest and handsomest man I ever saw in all my life. Oh, yes! Charlie is good-looking, nice, and all that, but Mr. Williams is one of nature's own noblemen. He is large, with broad, square shoulders, and is tall and straight as an arrow, and when he is pleased, a smile of ineffable tenderness beams from his countenance, while his eyes—well I cannot describe them. They are the deepest, clearest, and most beautiful eyes I ever saw. You must have felt their magic influence as you looked at his picture, for I did every time I saw it. I am sure if I had not been already in love, and a married woman I'd have fallen in love with him at once. Yet I mistrust I should have felt more of awe and reverence than of real wifely affection, for he is so immeasurably my superior in all things. I don't believe he could do a mean thing, or a wrong one; and oh, Edith, how he can talk! I could listen to him forever; and he is a splendid musician—a heap better one than even you are, and that is no small praise either, for you know you stand well in that line. He sings like a nightingale too, and I am just aching to hear you and him in a duet. We saw him several times during our stay in O——, and when we were coming away I told him I was going to hunt him up a wife in recompense for his saving my life. He laughed, and said he had been looking for one for years. You see he is thirty-five years old, but he looks as young as Charlie. I have told him lots about you, and he will be all ready to like you, and the rest will soon follow. I begged the picture as a keepsake of my preserver, but I meant it for you all the time."

"Well, your little romance is very nice, Sue, and I'm grateful to him for saving to us the life of our little sunbeam, but as for the rest 'there's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip.'"

"Aye, there'll be none here," said Sue, as the two returned to the company, who had made several ineffectual searches for the missing bride and for their favorite—Edith.

One day about three weeks after Sue's return from her bridal trip, she was sitting with her friend Jennie in the cozy parlor at the parsonage. The two had talked over all the little nothings that usually pass between very intimate friends, when a longer pause than common was interrupted by Jennie, who said: "Sue, I'm going to tell you a little bit of a secret, but I want you to keep it to yourself, and as it concerns no one but me, you can safely promise to do so."

"Of course I'll never tell any one," said Sue, laughing. "Did you ever see a woman who would not make all sorts of promises for the sake of getting at a secret?"

"Why, yes; there's Mrs. Darwin, Sue; you know she never will promise not to tell—for she says she might tell incidentally, or might feel it a duty to divulge it, so when we want to tell her a thing, all she will say is that she never tells things to make mischief or trouble, and will be as discreet about it as she can, and we all feel safer to tell her than we do to tell others who promise so much, then run right off and tell every word to some confidant under the same strict injunctions of secrecy, then she goes and tells it to her friend, and so it is repeated again and again till it's all over town, and the first revealer of it wonders how in the world it got out."

"Well, 'pon honor, Jennie, I'll tell no one but Charlie, and he's half of me," said Sue, laughing merrily at the conceit.

"Oh, men don't gossip, so I'm not afraid of him," said Jennie.

"You don't know men as well as I do," said wise little Sue; "Charlie don't gossip, it is true; he is a good man, and a lawyer besides, so there are two reasons why he holds his tongue; but I know men can beat women all to pieces at that delightful occupation when they get at it. You just ought to have heard the long lists of petty scandals and tales my brothers used to bring home some rainy afternoons when they had been listening to the store loungers. 'Little pitchers have big ears,' you know; and I've heard father and Deacon Smart tell more gossip in an hour than a regular tea-party of old maids would in a whole evening. Oh, no, of course I did not hear it honorably. Honor was something father never taught us. It was only appearances he cared for; so when he was entertaining a chatty caller, I used often to take my sewing and sit near the study door in the hall, and have a nice time hearing all about the neighbors. I'll bet I know more bits of private history than I could tell in an age, if I was one of that sort, but bad as I was, I never did like to tell things that would injure others. I thought there was suffering enough in the world anyhow. I didn't know then how nice a world it might be if people only lived right. I'm a better girl now than I was then. Charlie is making me all over again, and I am now, oh! so happy. We two could live nicely in that glass house we girls were once talking of, for we never do anything we are not willing the whole world should see. But that grand secret, Jennie? I'm all curiosity to hear it."

"Well, if you are sure you can keep from talking just one moment, I'll tell it," said Jennie.

"Go on, then; I'm mum," said Sue, pressing her lips tightly together, and bending forward in a listening attitude.

"I've lost my religion," said Jennie, in a half-serious, half-comic tone.

"Lost it? What do you mean?"

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

A further series of remarkable examples of correlative adaptation is furnished by the different animals and plants which become degenerated through parasitic life or parasitism. No other change in the mode of life so much affects the shapes of organisms as the adoption of a parasitical life. Plants thereby lose their greens leaves; as, for instance, our native parasitical plants, Orobanche, Lathræa, Monotropa. Animals which originally have lived freely and independently, but afterwards adopt a parasitical mode of life on other animals or plants, in the first place cease to use their organs of motion and their organs of sense. The loss of this activity is succeeded by the loss of the organs themselves, and thus we find, for example, many crabs, or crustacea, which in their youth possess a tolerably high degree of organization, viz, legs, antennæ, and eyes, in old age completely degenerate, living as parasites, without eyes; without apparatus of motion, and without antennæ. The lively, active form of youth has become a shapeless, motionless lump. Only the most necessary organs of nutrition and propagation retain their activity; all the rest of the body has degenerated. Evidently these complete transformations are, to a large extent, the direct consequences of cumulative adaption of the non-use and defective exercise of the organs, but a great portion of them must certainly be attributed also to correlative adaptation.

DIVISION OF LABOR.

A seventh law of adaptation, the fourth in the group of direct adaptation, is the law of divergent adaptation. By this law we indicate the fact that parts originally formed alike have developed in different ways under the influence of external conditions. This law of adaptation is extremely important for the explanation of the phenomenon of division of labor, or polymorphism. We can see this very easily in our own selves; for instance, in the activity of our two hands. We usually accustom our right hand to quite different work from that which we give our left, and in consequence of the different occupation there arises a different formation of the two hands. The right hand, which we use much more than the left, shows a stronger development of the nerves, muscles, and bones. The same applies to the whole arm. In most human beings the bones and flesh of the right arm are, in consequence of their being more employed, stronger and heavier than those of the left arm. Now, as the special use of the right arm has been adopted and transmitted by inheritance for thousands of years among Europeans, the stronger shape and size of the right arm have already become hereditary. P. Harting, an excellent Dutch naturalist, has shown by measuring and weighing newly-born children, that even in them the right arm is more developed than the left.

According to the same law of divergent adaptation, both eyes also frequently develop differently. If, for example, a naturalist accustoms himself always to use one eye for the microscope (it is better to use the left), then that eye will acquire a power different from that of the other, and this division of labor is of great advantage. The one eye will become more short-sighted, and better suited for seeing things near at hand; the other eye becomes, on the contrary, more long-sighted, more acute for looking at an object in the distance. If, on the other hand, the naturalist alternately uses both eyes for the microscope, he will not acquire the short-sightedness of the one eye and the compensatory degree of long-sight in the other, which is attained by a wise distribution of these different functions of sight between the two eyes. Here then again the function, that is the activity, of originally equally-formed organs can become divergent by habit; the function reacts again upon the form of the organ, and thus we find, after a long duration of such an influence, a change in the more delicate parts and the relative growth of the divergent organs, which in the end becomes apparent even in their coarser outlines.

Divergent adaptation can very easily be perceived among plants, especially in creepers. Branches of one and the same creeping plant, which originally were formed alike, acquire a completely different form and extent, a completely different degree of curvative and diameter of spiral winding, according as they twine themselves round a thinner or a thicker bar. The divergent change of form of parts originally identical in form, which, tending in different directions, develop themselves under different external conditions, can be distinctly demonstrated in many other examples. As this divergent adaptation interacts with progressive inheritance, it becomes the cause of a division of labor among the different organs.

ADAPTATION IS UNLIMITED.

An eighth and last law of adaptation we may call the law of unlimited or infinite adaptation. By it we simply mean to express that we know of no limit to the variation of organic forms occasioned by the external conditions of existence. We can assert of no single part of an organism that it is no longer variable, or that if it were subjected to new external conditions it would not be changed by them. It has never yet been proved by experience that there is a limit to variation. If, for example, an organ degenerates from non-use, this degeneration ends finally in a complete disappearance of the organ, as is the case with the eyes of many animals. On the other hand, we are able, by continual practice, habit, and the ever-increasing use of an organ, to bring it to a degree of perfection which we should at the beginning have considered to be impossible. If we compare the uncivilized savages with civilized nations, we find among the former a development of the organs of sense—sight, smell, and hearing—such as civilized nations can hardly conceive of. On the other hand, the brain, that is mental activity, among more civilized nations is developed to a degree of which the wild savages have no idea.

There appears indeed to be a limit given to the adaptability of every organism, by the "type" of its tribe or phylum; that is, by the essential fundamental qualities of this tribe, which have been inherited from a common ancestor, and transmitted by conservative inheritance to all its descendants. Thus, for example, no vertebrate animal can acquire the ventral nerve-chord of articulate animals, instead of the characteristic spinal marrow of the vertebrate animals. However, within this heriditary primary form, within this inalienable type, the degree of adaptability is unlimited. The elasticity and fluidity of the organic form manifests itself, within the type, freely in all directions, and to an unlimited extent. But there are some animals, as, for example, the parasitically degenerate crabs and worms, which seem to pass even the limit of type, and have forfeited all the essential characteristics of their tribe by an astonishing degree of degeneration. As to the adaptability of man, it is, as in all other animals, also unlimited, and since it is manifested in him above all other animals, in the modifications of the brain, there can be absolutely no limit to the knowledge which man in a further progress of mental cultivation may not be able to exceed. The human mind, according to the law of unlimited adaptation, enjoys an infinite perspective of becoming ever more and more perfect.

These remarks are sufficient to show the extent of the phenomena of Adaptation, and the great importance to be attached to them. The laws of Adaptation, or the facts of Variation caused by the influence of external conditions, are just as important as the laws of Inheritance. All phenomena of Adaptation, in the end, can be traced to conditions of nutrition of the organism, in the same way as the phenomena of Inheritance are referable to conditions of reproduction; but the latter, as well as the former, may further be traced to chemical and physical, that is to mechanical, causes. According to Darwin's Theory of Selection the new forms of organisms, the transformations which artificial selection produces in the state of cultivation, and which natural selection produces in the state of nature, arise solely by the interaction of such causes.

CHAPTER X.

NATURAL SELECTION BY THE STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE. DIVISION OF LABOR AND PROGRESS.

In order to arrive at a right understanding of Darwinism, it is, above all, necessary that the two organic functions of Inheritance and Adaptation, which we spoke of in our last chapter, should be more closely examined. If we do not, on the one hand, examine the purely mechanical nature of these two physiological activities, and the various action of their different laws, and if, on the other hand, we do not consider how complicated the interaction of these different laws of Inheritance and Adaptation must be, we shall not be able to understand how these two functions, by themselves, have been able to produce all the variety of animal and vegetable forms, which, in fact, they have. We have, at least, hitherto been unable to discover any other formative causes besides these two, and if we rightly understand the necessary and infinitely complicated interaction of Inheritance and Adaptation, we do not require to look for other unknown causes for the change of organic forms. These two fundamental causes are, as far as we can see, completely sufficient.

Even long before Darwin had published his Theory of Selection, some naturalists, and especially Goethe, had assumed the interaction of two distinct formative tendencies—a conservative or preserving, and a progressive or changing formative tendency—as the causes of the variety of organic forms. The former was called by Goethe the centripetal or specifying tendency, the latter the centrifugal tendency, or the tendency to metamorphosis. These two tendencies completely correspond with the two processes of Inheritance and Adaptation. Inheritance is the centripetal or internal formative tendency which strives to keep the organic form in its species, to form the descendants like the parents, and always to produce identical things from generation to generation. Adaptation, on the other hand, which counteracts inheritance; is the centrifugal or external formative tendency, which constantly strives to change the organic forms through the influence of the varying agencies of the outer world, to create new forms out of those existing, and entirely to destroy the constancy or permanency of species. Accordingly as Inheritance or Adaptation predominates in the struggle, the specific form either remains constant or changes into a new species. The degree of constancy of form in the different species of animals and plants, which obtains at any moment, is simply the necessary result of the momentary predominance which either of these two formative powers (or physiological activities) has acquired over the other.

If we now return to the consideration of the process of selection or choice, the outlines of which we have already examined, we shall be in a position to see clearly and distinctly that both artificial and natural selection rest solely upon the interaction of these two formative tendencies. If we carefully watch the proceedings of an artificial selector—a farmer or a gardener—we find that only these two constructive forces are used by him for the production of new forms. The whole art of artificial selection rests solely upon a thoughtful and wise application of the laws of Inheritance and Adaptation, and upon their being applied and regulated in an artistic and systematic manner. Here the will of man constitutes the selecting force.

The case of natural selection is quite similar, for it also employs merely these two organic constructive forces, these ingrained physiological properties of Adaptation and Heredity, in order to produce the different species. But the selecting principle or force, which in artificial selection is represented by the conscious will of man acting for a definite purpose, consists in natural selection of the unconscious struggle for existence acting without a definite plan. What we mean by "struggle for existence" has already been explained in the sixth chapter. It is the recognition of this exceedingly important identity which constitutes one of the greatest of Darwin's merits. But as this relation is very frequently imperfectly or falsely understood, it is necessary to examine it now more closely, and to illustrate by a few examples the operation of the struggle for life, and the operation of natural selection by means of the struggle for life (Gen. Morph. ii, 231).

A Champion of Christianity.

I was, to-day, drawn into a conversation upon religion with a prominent public man from the West, an official under the present administration, under circumstances that compelled me to either give my views of Christianity or prove false to my convictions. In the course of my remarks I said, "If Jesus Christ was among us now, and lived as he is represented to have lived, and advocated the views he is credited with, he would be despised as a vagabond or tramp, and denounced as a fanatical communist by the very men who profess to be his disciples."

My distinguished friend took great offense at this, and raved and swore at a furious rate. He had no patience, he said, with a man who would speak disrespectfully of the Savior of the world. I replied:

"You misapprehend my remarks, I perceive. I have not reflected upon Jesus Christ, but upon those religious teachers who, not being able to appreciate his beautiful doctrines of self-abnegation and brotherhood, or the unselfish life he lived, grasp the idea of vicarious atonement, and use Jesus as a scapegoat for their sins."

"Well," said he, "if you did not intend any insult to the Savior, I beg pardon for getting angry. But, my God! I can't hear a word said against Jesus Christ, for he is my only hope. I know I am a wicked man. I swear and gamble and drink, and take every advantage I can in trade or politics, and have other bad habits not necessary to mention; but I have always stood by the Bible and the Christian religion, and, my God! that's my only hope when I die, and that's why I am so sensitive."

Poor fellow! He has good qualities, but the soul-blasting influence of this damnable doctrine of moral bankruptcy, yclept Christianity, poisoned the fountains of his moral being in childhood, and the taint has corrupted his whole life. He is lost, and I pity him most sincerely. I pity the ignorant preacher who honestly teaches the doctrine that puts a premium upon sin; but the clerical demagogue who teaches what he knows to be false and vicious, raising hopes which he knows will fail, for the sake of position and pelf, is the most despicable character that treads the planet. Such fellows are sure of hell, Col. Ingersoll to the contrary notwithstanding. B*

True Education Concerning Sex.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: From my heart I sympathize with you, and with all who must suffer martyrdom for humanity's and truth's sake. How I rejoice to see the Liberals of the country coming to the front now, when their liberties are being assailed by the minions of orthodoxy! All true souls will stand by you and Mr. Heywood, and applaud you for your courage and manliness.

I am surprised at Mr. Abbot's position on the repeal of the laws which permit such persecution as you and others are now suffering, especially after reading his earnest and oft-repeated arguments against prohibitory liquor laws, lest they infringe upon the freedom of the individual. It seems to me that nothing less than prejudice has made him blind to the peril of the hour, and so converted him into one of the most illiberal of Liberals.

And here I wish to express my heartfelt approval of the sentiments contained in a communication from the pen of Theron C. Leland in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 5, 1878. It is a noble defense of the native purity and holiness of sex, and a brave protest against the vulgar conceptions and concealments of all that pertains to the generative life and passions of humanity. Love between the sexes is the most exalted passion of the human soul, and its fountain-spring is found in the sex-life of both men and women. If you corrupt this, you degrade the race. If you twist and distort nature, you destroy the means toward the higher civilization of being. Hence, the prevailing low, vulgar, and degraded estimates of anything so holy and beautiful as sex manifestations only prove the degeneracy of our moral sense—the sad result of our false systems of education; for in almost every home our children, in their blessed purity, are taught to be ashamed of their sex; to conceal all thought, expression, and everything the least suggestive of sex; and thus our youth everywhere grow into habits of concealment upon matters vital to their moral, as well as physical, health and happiness, and, ere we are aware, they are followed by acts of secresy and shame. Oh, it is a fearful thing not to teach our young, in a natural, common-sense way, all that we know about the mystery of sex, for knowledge, properly applied, is all that will save them from the degradation of their sexhood to vile and unholy uses. If our children were educated naturally and truthfully upon this vital question of sex, their young imaginations would never become perverted by reveling in obscene pictures and books, for they would feel no morbid curiosity to be gratified. If they were thus naturally educated, they would grow into men and women who would respect and reverence their sex-life, instead of feeling, as now, ashamed of it, which is always a long step toward its degradation. A child's body is beautiful, and no human eyes can be polluted by gazing upon it in all its naked charmingness. A woman's body is even more beautiful, because of the higher, more perfect development of sex; and the eyes of men would never look upon it but with reverent, worshiping gaze, were they taught from childhood to feel and appreciate the exceeding beauty and holiness of sex. It is just as moral as it is natural for man to admire and to delight in looking upon woman's distinctive sex-charms, and the same is true of woman toward man; and nature designs that they shall become exalted through this sweet and loving admiration each for the other; and they would so become if left to be natural and true to the finer instincts of their beings.

Thine for truth and purity, ELVIRA WHEELOCK.

Mr. Hammond Replies to Mr. Chapman.

Mr. Chapman first takes me to task for non-comprehension, but that is not new to me for the Christions often tell me that if I understood the Bible I should believe in their religion. I ask him not to be to hard on me in that line for I am just as nature made me, and I suspect that my organ of understanding must have been manufactured soon after his own, when there was not much material left. As to the "ten-acre cabbage patch" theory, I did not so much as mention the sea in that article. I therefore leave that honor with him. As to his "pity," I ask him not to be so free-hearted as to give it all away, but rather to save a little for himself as I have enough of my own to answer all practical purposes. But enough of this, for it is facts, not personal criticism that count in any controversy.

In regard to the poor taking care of themselves, and "thieves" and "gamblers" in our legislative bodies, I would say, that so long as the poor sell their votes, and are such blind partisans we must endure it. I, for one, am not so blind but that I can see the corruption in our own ranks as well as those of the rich, and I would begin to purify our own ranks first, for we are a large majority and if not corrupted by the capitalist's gold we can carry the day every time. But then we should not be hard on the rich, for they nearly all begin poor and work their way up. As to Congress giving away so much land and loaning money to railroads, I do not attempt to justify it, but still it has a bright side; there are a few acres still left, and what has been given away will cause a demand for more labor to construct those roads and keep them in repair, and so will ultimately reach the working class.

Now as to the rich practicing the crime of abortion more than the poor, I do not believe it. In all the cases that ever came under my notice nearly all have been among the poor, and all among the ignorant. It is not the money, but the ignorance of nature's laws, and of physiology that causes them, or too large families either, as to that matter. But I do not propose to discuss this matter farther in the public prints for it sometimes causes "Tony" to happen around.

Now, Mr. Chapman, if you will look over your "Errors Corrected," you will find these words in relation to beer and tobacco: "The rich man robs the poor man of his means so he cannot purchase these luxuries." You should have looked a little farther on when you quoted in reply to me and accused me of not understanding what I read, for what can be plainer than the above. I do not wish to defend the rich man, but it would be better for the poor or the rich one either if they could not purchase them.

And now, Mr. Chapman, I am very happy to see you so willing to acknowledge that there was nothing there to hit; but possibly the ball hit where the "backwoodsman" supposed the squirrel to be. But verily I do find it very like brother Bennett's experience in kicking at nothing as detailed in his reply to the Rev. Cyrus Romulus R. Teed, No. 1. And now let me give you a little friendly advice, and I hope you will receive it in the same friendly spirit.

In any discussion with me or any one else confine yourself more to facts and less to personalities It has devolved upon me to be more personal than I would wish in this reply so as to meet the same style. I had not intended this article to be so long and therefore must close before it becomes longer. FRED. S. HAMMOND.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

THE SOLAR SYSTEM.

I.

The sun, and its cortege of orbs, which do not emit any light of themselves, constitute what we call the solar system. It is composed, firstly, of the sun, which, for astronomical purposes, is generally designated by the sign ☉, the diameter of which is 108 times that of the earth, and which revolves upon its own axis once in about 25 days, 10 hours; secondly, of eight principal planets, and 128 smaller or telescopic planets, the orbits of which are embraced between those of Mars and Jupiter, at about co-equal distances from the sun.

The principal planets, enumerating them according to their increasing distance from the sun, have been called:

1. Mercury, represented by ☿, whose mean distance from the sun is 35,393,000 miles, with a revolution round that luminary of 87 days, 23 hours, 15 minutes, and a diameter two-thirds that of the earth.

2. Venus, ♀, with a mean distance from the sun of 66,130,000 miles, a revolution of 224 days, 16 hours, 48 minutes, and a diameter nearly equal to that of the earth.

3. The Earth, ⊕, with a mean distance from the sun of 91,430,000 miles, a revolution of 365 days, 6 hours, 9 minutes, and a diameter of 7,901 miles.

4. Mars, ♂, with a mean distance from the sun of 139,312,000 miles, a revolution of 686 days, 23 hours, 31 minutes, and a diameter half that of the earth.

5. Jupiter, ♃, with a mean distance from the sun of 475,693,000 miles, a revolution of 4,332 days, 14 hours, 2 minutes, and a diameter eleven times that of the earth.

6. Saturn, ♄, with a mean distance from the sun of 875,135,000 leagues, a revolution of 10,759 days, 5 hours, 16 minutes, and a diameter nearly ten times that of the earth.

7. Uranus, ♅, with a mean distance from the sun of 1,752,851,000 miles, a revolution of 30,686 days, 17 hours, 21 minutes, and a diameter four times that of the earth.

8. Neptune, ♆, with a mean distance from the sun of 2,746,271,000 miles, a revolution of 60,118 days, and a diameter nearly five times that of the earth.

The solar system is further composed of 21 planetary satellites: 1 for the earth (the Moon, represented by the figure ☽); 4 for Jupiter, 8 for Saturn, 6 for Uranus, 2 for Neptune; and comets, the number of which increases every day.

Kepler suspected the existence of a planet between Mars and Jupiter, and Father Secchi says that he was the first to discover a certain regularity in the distribution of the planets. There seemed, however, to be some anomaly in the distance which separated Mars from Jupiter, and upon this ground he predicted that some hitherto unknown star would eventually be discovered in the space between them; a prediction which was more than verified two centuries afterwards (Father Secchi on "The Sun"), for no less than 128 have already come under observation, as will be seen by the appended list, and fresh ones are being discovered every day. M. Le Verrier has calculated that they are not, put together, equivalent to a body one-third the size of the earth; for he argues that if they were larger than that their attraction would have led to greater variations in the motions of the perihelion of Mars than have hitherto been noticed (vol. xxxvii., p. 793, of the journal of the Academie des Sciences, p. 334).

II.

MINOR OR TELESCOPIC PLANETS BETWEEN MARS AND JUPITER.

1, Ceres; 2, Pallas; 3, Juno; 4, Vesta; 5, Astræa; 6, Hebe; 7, Iris; 8, Flora; 9, Metis; 10, Hygeia; 11, Parthenope; 12, Victoria; 13, Egeria; 14, Irene; 15, Eunomia; 16, Psyche; 17, Thetis; 18, Melpomene; 19, Fortuna; 20, Massilia; 21, Lutetia; 22, Calliope; 23, Thalia; 24, Themis; 25, Phocea; 26, Prosperine; 27, Euterpe; 28, Bellona; 29, Amphitrite; 30, Urania; 31, Euphrosyne; 32, Pomona; 33, Polyhymnia; 34, Circe; 35, Leucothæa; 36, Atalanta; 37, Fides; 38, Leda; 39, Lætitia; 40, Harmonia; 41, Daphne; 42, Isis; 43, Ariadne; 44, Nysa; 45, Eugenia; 46, Hestia; 47, Aglaia; 48, Doris; 49, Pales; 50, Virginia; 51, Nemausa; 52, Europa; 53, Calypso; 54, Alexandra; 55, Pandora; 56, Melete; 57, Mnemosyne; 58, Concordia; 59, Olympia; 60, Danae; 61, Echo; 62, Erato; 63, Ausonia; 64, Angelina; 65, Maximiliana; 66, Maia; 67, Asia; 68, Leto; 69, Hesperia; 70, Panopea; 71, Niobe; 72, Feronia; 73, Clytie; 74, Galatea; 75, Eurydice; 76, Freia; 77, Frigа; 78, Diana; 79, Eurymone; 80, Sappho; 81, Terpsichore; 82, Alcmene; 83, Beatrix; 84, Clio; 85, Io; 86, Semele; 87, Sylvia; 88, Thisbe; 89, Julia; 90, Antiope; 91, Egina; 92, Undina; 93, Minerva; 94, Aurora; 95, Arethusa; 96, Ægle; 97, Clotho; 98, Ianthe; 99, Dike; 100, Hecate; 101, Helena; 102, Miriam; 103, Hera; 104, Clymene; 105, Artemis; 106, Sylvia; 107, Camilla; 108, Hecuba; 109, Felicitas; 110, Lydia; 111, Ate; 112, Iphegenia; 113, Amalthea; 114, Cassandra; 115, ——; 116, Sirona; 117, Lomia.

Planets 115, 118, and the remainder have not yet been named.

III.

The revolution of the earth round the sun, etc., etc., is now well known; but what is not so generally known, and what creates some surprise amongst novices, is that the solar system—that is to say, the sun and the earth, the planets and the moons—have an incessant tendency to shift towards the constellation of Hercules.

Herschel proved that the apparently inextricable irregularities of so many special stellar motions are mainly due to the displacement of the solar system; and that the point in space towards which we are advancing each year is situated in the constellation of Hercules. These results are magnificent. The discovery of the specific movement of our system will always count as one of Herschel's greatest achievements, notwithstanding the previous conjectures of Fontenelle, Bradley, Mayer, and others. In juxtaposition to this great discovery must be placed another which seems destined to yield still more magnificent results, and which was given to the world in 1803. I refer to the discovery that certain stars are reciprocally dependent, connected with each other as the planets of our system and their satellites are to the sun.

Father Secchi has set forth in such simple yet clear terms the ideas generally accepted as correct by modern science concerning the formation of the solar system that we cannot do better than quote him:

"Astronomers of the present day are agreed that our solar system is due to the condensation of a nebula, which formerly extended beyond the limits now occupied by the most distant planets. This nebula was originally endowed with a slow rotatory motion, which must have gradually become accelerated. According to a law of mechanics, known as the law of superficies, every disengaged particle must move in such a way that its radius-vector will describe equal superficies at equal intervals; whence it follows that, the radius being gradually lessened by progressive contraction, the arc described during the unity of time must have increased, so as to keep the superficies from undergoing variation. An augmentation of centrifugal force results from this increase of speed, and when this force comes to equal the force of gravitation, rings are formed which remain suspended around the central mass. As the speed goes on increasing, these rings are broken, and the different fragments, each one in obedience to the laws of attraction, in their turn form new masses which are isolated from each other, and which become centers of action similar to the principal center. These masses have in turn been surrounded by rings of a secondary order, some of which are still in existence, while others, getting dispersed, have gone to form satellites.

"This theory, expounded by Kant, Herschel, and Laplace, has been confirmed by the ingenious experiments of M. Plateau. A mass of oil poured into a mixture of water and alcohol of the same density as itself will be seen to assume the spherical shape which molecular attraction would tend to give it. If it is made to turn around its vertical diameter at an increased rate of speed, the sphere will be found first to flatten, and after a certain time to detach a ring similar to that of Saturn. As the speed is still further increased, the ring will be broken up, and form into small spheres revolving upon their own axes and around the main mass.

"The matter which composed the primitive nebula must have been far more rarefied than that which we are able to obtain with the best of pneumatic machines, and has since become enormously contracted and condensed, leaving the planets and the satellites at various distances. The sun is the still incandescent and gaseous residue of the primitive mass. We find in the sidereal world traces of this formation, in our planetary world, the rings around Saturn, in the stellar world, the annular nebulæ. These masses are composed of a matter which is still gaseous, and they seem to constitute worlds in course of formation" (Father Secchi on "The Sun," p. 332. Also "Vestiges of Creation").

M. Inrichs arrives at the important conclusion that the law of progressive condensation is bound up with the third law of Kepler, and that the latter is itself the outcome of universal gravity acting in direct ratio with the masses and in inverse ratio with the square of the distances. Thus the law as to the formation of the planetary system would be but a consequence of universal gravity.

M. Delaunay, of the French Institute, also remarks: "The great law of universal gravity, which we owe to the genius of Newton, has introduced unity into the science of astronomy, and enabled us to attach to one particular cause all the peculiarities presented by the motions of the celestial bodies."

CONVERSATIONS ON LIFE BEGINNINGS.

DEAR READERS: I doubt not it is hard for some of you to comprehend how all the forms of life that have existed on the globe, and those that still exist, could come from one germ or one species of monera or protozoans when such a great variety in the forms of organization are now to be seen. Let me tell you, in the first place, that it was not one form of simple life alone that emerged from the plastic slime, or highly progressed state of unorganized matter that I have already told you about; but the fertility of nature at that time was so great, and the powers and forces she possessed were so perfectly adapted to the work of producing primitive life, that it was wonderful to witness her immense fecundity and how readily myriads of minute animals were produced and in what numerous varieties. The truth is, nature is the parent of all life, and when the conditions are favorable, and the forces upon which life is dependent, and the matter essential to the product are in the requisite state, it is as easy for organized life to be the result as for any other natural operation to be produced. As long as I had been observing the course of things, and as earnestly as I had been watching all the intricate operations of matter and force, I must confess that I was highly interested in the new developments that took place on your globe; and I was pleased to see that my Brother continued to feel a great amount of interest in the same direction. We held many conversations upon the events that were transpiring around us, and could you have listened to those conversations I feel sure they would have greatly interested you. But you know the phonograph had not been invented then, and there was no instrument in existence by which our conversation could be taken and recorded as by the ingenious apparatus recently invented by your fellow-citizen, Mr. Edison, which is capable of taking down ordinary conversation and keeping it intact, so it can be repeated as many times as desired—a score, a hundred, or a thousand years afterwards. I regard this phonograph to be one of the biggest inventions that has ever been gotten up; and when it is improved and modified, as it will be in the next quarter of a century, it will have more to do with the affairs of this world than you begin to dream of now.

But Jah and I had not thought of all the ingenious apparatuses that men have since devised; and I have many a time wondered how it was that two such talented individuals as Jah and your humble servant should not have been smart enough to have discovered some, at least, of the wonderful inventions that men since that time have been able to honor themselves by bringing out, and not leave it to those of our own creation to produce what we ought to have had the ability to originate. One thing I have learned; that no great results can be produced in a moment, and that time is of immense importance in producing the work and changes that have transpired since Jah and I made time, space, matter, and force (according to my version of the affair) from nothing at all.

You see, we had not even a short-hand reporter to take down our remarks, nor even a lead-pencil and a sheet of white paper with which to record them; so you will perceive in a trice that what I give you now of the conversation which passed between us must be given from memory; and, without boasting, I think I may say that I have a very retentive memory, as well as a pretty fertile imagination.

After Jah had been standing one day for fully forty-five minutes watching the interesting forms of miniature life that were coming into existence, he turned to me with a pleasant expression of countenance and said: "Luce, there has nothing taken place in this little universe of ours, since the morning we commenced business, that has interested me so acutely as these little forms of organized life that are coming into existence all around us; and although I have been watching them closely for hours and days, I can hardly make up my mind how the process really takes place, nor what the result of it all is going to be. And another thing that bothers me not a little is to decide whether it is you and I that have got up this wonderful production of animal life, or whether it sort o' does it itself." To which I replied:

"I must say, my Dear Brother, that it pleases me beyond expression to see you manifest such a lively interest in these processes that are occurring at our very feet. They attract my attention very much, but as much as my curiosity is excited, it is greatly heightened by the positive pleasure you so evidently enjoy. If there is anything in this universe that makes me supremely happy it is to see you, my Brother, enjoying yourself as you seem to be doing at this moment. I like to be happy myself, but it does me quite as much good to see you happy. As to how these developments take place, I will whisper into your ear, that it is well enough for us to flatter ourselves with the innocent delusion that we are causing what is transpiring around us, but as a matter of fact, my Brother, there is very little necessity for our doing much save to stand and look on, and simply give our approbation. We got up the universal machine in such tip-top running order in the first place that it has ever since been able to run itself, and the truth is, when stripped of all ornamentation and disguise, that you and I are mere supernumeraries in this business, and that we are not of near as much consequence in the transpiring of inevitable events as we will be glad to have the intelligent beings suppose, who are to come upon the stage of action by and by. It will, of course, be very natural for you and I to wish to claim as much of the credit for this business of originating organic life as possible, but I foresee the time is coming when we shall be viewed in our proper light and when we shall have accorded to us, by the most intelligent of those beings, but little of the credit which will, for a long time be conceded without a question."

"Oh, Luce, you are such a long-winded fellow! Why do you go on and preach such a long sermon when I wish you to come right to the point? Please tell me what is going to be the result of these curious demonstrations that we see taking place here; and how shall we be able to produce the higher orders of organic beings which are on our programme to bring out? Now, please be direct in your replies."

"Well, Jah, I can be as laconic as you please. The result of the low forms of life that we now see coming into existence right before us will continue for millions of years. These forms of life will continue uninterruptedly through almost endless ages, but they will evolve and change and modify so that in after times it will be impossible, from the forms of life that will then be presented, to arrive at anywhere near a correct conclusion as to what the beginning was. I foresee that these changes will be extremely gradual, and that from generation to generation, in all these stages of animal life, the modifications will be so slight at any one point of time that they will be imperceptible, and it will only be by looking back for thousands of years that even you and I will be able to realize the great progress that will have then been made."

"Why, do you really think, Luce, that from these little mites before us we will be able to produce the large animals we have in view, as well as the noble creature, man, which you and I have hitherto talked over?"

"Yes, Jah, you guessed it the first time, with this slight exception. We will not be under the necessity of doing much about it ourselves; we have only to continue pursuing the course we have pursued the last thousands of years, and it will all come out just about right. For a long time I thought I flattered myself that you and I were of immense consequence in this vast enterprise, and in bringing out the numberless phases of existence that, one after another, have been gradually produced, but the longer I contemplate it and examine into the facts, the more and more I become convinced, my Brother, that you and I are really of but little consequence in this whole thing, and that if you and I were to spend a few billion years over in another universe—supposing such a thing possible—that this universe would glide along just as smoothly and successfully as it does now. But inasmuch as we are here, it, of course, becomes us to put on a certain amount of lordly airs, and convince ourselves, if possible, that we are a prime necessity in the economy of the universe, and that without us the vast and complicated machine would rush into one eternal smash."

"Oh, Luce, I must say your remarks cause me to hang my head in a sense of comparative humility. It has been a very favorite feeling with me that I was of great consequence in the getting up and the running of this vast piece of machinery, and I have watched its movements many and many a time in a spirit of self-congratulation and pride, thinking to myself that I was the chief engineer of this grand enterprise. I must confess I hate to think, even to myself, that I am of such slight necessity and importance as your correct remarks show me that I am. Still, Luce, I assure you we must maintain our dignity in this whole thing; we must hold our position at the head of this grand affair; and even if it would move along just as well without us, we must try and convince ourselves, at least, that we are of immense consequence, and that were it not for us an endless series of the most terrible disasters would be the result."

"Yes, yes, Jah, I perceive how you feel, and I am disposed to humor your whims. There is probably no great harm in our playing that we are of incalculable consequence, and that without our watchful care and our vigilant optics the whole universe would collapse and rush into a state of chaos with scarce a fragment left of which to construct another universe, though on a smaller scale. Yes, you can count on me. I will not go back on you so long as you will pursue a straightforward, upright course; but when the time comes—and come I perceive it will in the distant future—I will advocate a dissolution of our firm, and propose that each does business on his own hook. But, Jah, let us not anticipate; the evil will come fast enough without our discounting the future. We are happy to-day, and let us continue on in this joyful frame of mind. We know too much to not know that the best way to get along is to derive all the happiness possible from the present and to never indulge in borrowed trouble."

"You are right, Luce. You know I have nearly always insisted that you are right in the main; and if fate has in store for us that we are at some time in the future to cease to be bosom friends, let us not—as you suggest—be so unwise as to let a foreboding of it mar our present felicity. But while we are conversing on this progressing from the lower forms of life to the higher, give me a little more definitely how the vast change is to be effected from the monad to man."

"Jah, as I have told you on other occasions, this change must be extremely gradual, and will necessarily require immense eras of time. Now, that life in an organized form is started, the work is half accomplished. You see the smaller specimens of life are constituted of a single cell, and others of a few additional cells. Here is the germ from whence thousands of varied forms may evolve. These germinal beginnings, under the vitalizing influences of light, heat, moisture, magnetism, electricity, with the other vital and subtle influences which we have not yet named, will grow and expand. New matter duly prepared for absorption and assimilation, will from time to time be appropriated and absorbed, and then under the ever-changing conditions, one change after another, one step after another, will be taken, climate and light and all the other factors having their due influences, until all the changes that we desire can be effected. The whole thing will be perfectly easy and natural, and will, as I said, work its way along, as the universe has thus far worked itself along. All we need is time and patience, and the rest will all be accomplished far better than we can effect it in any other way. But, Jah, please excuse me now. I have a little business on the other side of the globe, and I will see you later, on my return. Au revoir."

Dear readers, I have sometimes held you too long. I will not commit that error this time. I will take my leave of you till this day next week. In the meantime take care of yourselves. I will be sure to be with you again. Your own

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

The Effects of Obscenity.

If the effect of obscene books and prints upon the minds of human beings is pernicious and debasing, the minds of Anthony Comstock and his intimate friend, Joseph A. Britton, are probably the most debased of any two individuals upon this continent, for they have more of this kind of stock in their possession than all the rest of the country besides; and probably there are no two men who more thoroughly gloat over the vile stuff than these two boon companions. Who thinks more about it and takes more pleasure in exhibiting it than those two employees of the pious Society for the Suppression of Vice? If the possession of this kind of demoralizing nastiness is sufficient to send a person to prison, it would seem most fitting that those two men should spend the balance of their lives in a dungeon. There are probably no two individuals who can be better spared than this pair of "foul birds" who revel in the vilest filth to be found in the country.

It seems entirely out of place that a man who, by his own agency, is constituted a censor of the press, and the protector of the morals of the country, should himself be guilty of sending foul and obscene books and pictu res through the mail, and that he should lay plans and devices to induce innocent persons to order from him the vile stuff which should years ago have been reduced to ashes. That Anthony Comstock has engaged in this kind of business, we think we can show in a court of justice when the proper time comes.

The abominable stuff which he captured five years ago or more, and which should have been committed to the flames, he still keeps on hand, and takes samples of it with him to Albany and Washington with which to regale our pure-minded legislators, and also to stimulate the pious horror of our city editors. It is a strange philosophical fact that after our law-makers and our editors have had a good look at Anthony's nasty curiosities, they are willing to go to any length in acceding to his wishes, and are ready to swear that he is the purest saint alive. He evidently enjoys the monopoly which he holds in his hands.

Meeting of the Friends of Progress.

The New York State annual meeting of the Friends of Human Progress will be held near Waterloo, N. Y., June 1st and 2d.

Prof. J. E. Oliver of Cornell University, C. D. B. Mills of Syracuse, Prof. A. L. Rawson of New York, H. L. Green of Salamanca, Prof. T. C. Leland of New York, and many others are expected to address the meeting. A large gathering is anticipated.

Society for Ethical Culture.

The second annual meeting of the Society for Ethical Culture was held on Monday evening. Reports of the secretary and treasurer showed the society to be in a very favorable condition financially and otherwise; the members now numbering over three hundred as against one hundred and sixty-eight at the close of last season. Prof. Adler gave a very interesting account of the progress of the schools that are conducted under the auspices of the society: the School for Ethical Culture and the Kindergarten school for poor children. On the 22nd of January the Kindergarten school was opened with eight pupils; all that could be inducee to come in at the time on account chiefly of prejudice on the part of parents as to proposed religious or anti-religious teachings, but it has steadily increased in numbers and popularity, now having over seventy pupils and many have been refused admission on account of inadequate accommodations for them.

The society is doing a good work in an unpretending way, and is established on a secure footing, one of the best evidences of which is that the trustees were, last evening, by a unanimous vote, authorized to engage Prof. Adler for five years at such salary as they may deem expedient.

Hatred to The Truth Seeker.

Comstock has shown his hatred to THE TRUTH SEEKER by endeavoring to suppress it. Nearly a dozen times has he, as well as his pliant tool Britton, visited the place where THE TRUTH SEEKER is printed, watching closely, and has ordered our printers to print no more of the "vile sheet." He has threatened them with prosecution if they continue to print them, and the American News Company if they continue to send them over the country. So far he has been unable to intimidate them, and our printers have exhibited more of a disposition to accommodate us than Anthony.

There might be such a thing as his interfering too much with our business. If he throws any real impediment in our way, it might prove to be of some inconvenience to himself. It is quite as well for him as for all other meddlesome men to attend to his own business and let that of others alone.

DR. FELIX ADLER, the apostle of ethical culture, has commemorated the second anniversary of his society, and still the country is pretty much the same as it was before his captivating theories were unfolded to a wondering world.—N. Y. Herald.

With such sneers as this the daily press meets the efforts of honest men to effect a moral reformation. Mr. Adler has far more followers to-day than did Jesus Christ, after the first two years of his preaching, and Mr. Adler's followers are men of the highest culture—thinkers, and not ignorant boors incapable of telling right from wrong. Christ would have been forgotten within half-a-dozen generations of his birth had not his crucifixion stamped a certain value on the metal of his teachings. It has taken eighteen centuries of robbery and bloodshed to make the Christian Church as wealthy and powerful as it is; and all that holds it together now is the base passion of fear instead of the noble one of love. Mr. Adler preaches love instead of violence as a means of redeeming the world from sin. In founding a new religion, Mr. Adler appeals to the good sense of his followers instead of their baser passions; and he has not even murdered a man, as did Calvin, to add force to his doctrines, and he would never counsel his hearers to serve God by indulging in the horrors of an Inquisition or massacre of St. Bartholomew. Though the record of his religion is short, it has not a blood-spot nor even a tear-stain on it. Yet those whose religious records are catalogues of crime, reddened with the blood of innocent victims, and infamous as the hell over which they love to gloat, can find nothing but ridicule for the generous efforts of such men as Adler.

CONFLICT OF REASON AND THEOLOGY. By Jesse T. Reynolds.—A Poetical work, with a few pages of additional notes, making 124 pages. Full of Freethought and indisputable logic well expressed. Many of the pieces are excellent and have the true ring, and as poetical productions they possess high merit. Published by the author, Portland, Maine. 50 cents.

WE SEE by the daily papers that Mrs. Maud E. Lord, the well-known medium, has suddenly turned up missing in Boston, and it is a conundrum not yet solved what became of her. As she was in the habit of carrying some considerable sums of money with her, it is feared by her friends that foul play was used, and that she possibly has been killed. We hope this will not prove to be the case, but that she will soon appear again sound and well.

BROTHER W. S. BELL writes that he will soon start on a lecturing tour through some of the Western States. A good opportunity is thus presented to those friends in the West who wish to hear him speak. We most cheerfully vouch for brother Bell's ability and earnestness in the cause of truth. Just give him a fair chance, and he will be sure to instruct and interest you in the great cause of Freethought. Friends, give him a trial. Address him upon the subject, for a short time, at New Bedford, Mass.

LET it be impressed upon your minds, let it be instilled into the herts of your children, that the liberty of the press is the palladium of all the civil, political, and religious rights.—Junius.

Emancipation.

LECTURE BY PROFESSOR FELIX ADLER BEFORE THE SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, APRIL 21, 1878.

Now is the season of newborn life; now do the Easter bells ring forth their joyous peals over the land; now do men hear the glad tidings that death is overcome; now do they celebrate anew in rejoicings for the night of tyranny that was broken by the glorious morning of emancipation that dawned at the Passover. The lessons of the season are those of renewal. All its festivities point to the uprising of a growing power in the spiritual and in the natural world; and yet with these songs of happiness is strangely blended a doleful, melancholy strain, a cry of infinite pain and pathos breaks through the peans of rejoicing.

Already in the ancient world we find the most sombre ceremonies connected with the festival of spring. It seems that men dwelt with a peculiar emphasis at this time upon all that is sad in human life, as though a desire to make an atonement for their gladness was mingled with their joy. So we find among the Hebrews a sacrifice that introduced the festival of the Passover—the original of the Easter festival—and that these sacrifices were gloomy and dark ceremonies, accompanied with suggestions of evil, suggestions of pain. So you will remember that in the Christian churches of our day, the week that has just closed is the most mournful of the year; it is a week of passion, in which pain and suffering is commemorated, in which lamentations and songs of darkness are heard in every place of Christian worship, recalling the saddest of human experiences, the hard blows, the temptation, the agony, and the bitter end. It is the principle of sacrifice which is reflected in the religious customs of the world, the principle of sacrifice for all that is bright and great and good. That principle we see illustrated everywhere in the world about us. We see it in the seeds that are sown, of which myriads rot in the ground in order that a few only may flourish; we see it in the struggle for existence in the animal kingdom, in which thousands of lives are crushed out in order that a few may survive; we see it in the fate of nations in the sphere of human history. Throughout the world there is this secret discord grating through the harmonies of the universe, and all that have ears to hear can hear it, all that have any deep experience in their own lives will testify to this truth.

I wish to speak of the cost of emancipation, and to speak frankly and sincerely of the price we must pay for this great prize of liberty which we hold so dear. The cost of emancipation, whether of individuals or of races, sacrifice is its name. What is the cost of emancipation for you—for the individual? In the first place you must be willing to make strenuous exertions. It is not an easy task to achieve liberty. It is far easier to accept what is given us in blind, unquestioning faith, without reason, against reason, or beyond reason, as so many do. There are certain opinions that are deemed orthodox in the world, and only these have general currency. To doubt them is to be cast out of many circles of society. So long as Christian orthodoxy rises supreme over all, to doubt it is deemed sinful, to accept it is deemed meritorious. Doubt has been stigmatized as the child of sin. In our times the tables have been reversed. Doubt is to us a great benefactor of the human race. Doubt has built our railroads and telegraphs for us; doubt has raised up new industries and benefitted us in a thousand ways. There is no problem so high, there is no authority so great, that we will not call it in question. But doubt is to all an inward commotion. One involved in doubt is like a rudderless vessel cast loose from its moorings. What were esteemed everlasting certainties for ages are now no longer certain. We are launched on an unknown sea, sailing, we know not whither, and when we shall arrive we know not. The mind is dazed and dazzled by the new vistas that dawn upon it. But we are to work out our own convictions and build up our own scheme of life; and it is a hard and laborious undertaking, requiring constant work and individual struggle. How much easier is it to accept what is given us, and say we will not inquire, as so many do say, how much easier to say: We half believe the truth is on their side; but all the more because we suspect it we will draw back in time, lest we ourselves be involved in doubt; we will bury our heads in the sand, like the timid ostrich, so we will not see, and close our eyes so we will not hear. My friends, for such mental indolence there is no help, for such moral cowardice there is no answer, save contempt. But it is sometimes asked—and it requires an answer—whether you, the creators of Liberalism, are justified in sowing your opinions broadcast among men and women and children who have, perhaps, settled beliefs. Are you not throwing them into states of uncertainty and agony? Will they not halt between two opinions, neither believing the one nor the other—no longer accepting the old and not so disciplined as to accept the new? and will not their souls be marred in consequence of this doubt and hesitation? Well, if the new belief were a kind of moral idealism, differing from that which precedes it only in being more abstruse, then this objection were unanswerable and absolutely fatal. But our creed is simple, and it is for this very reason that we do not tire of contrasting it sharply with the common, because we wish to show that the scheme of our life is within the reach of all. That it is good to be good the simplest soul can understand. The benign truths of sacrifice even the poor in spirit can appreciate, often far more than the aristocrat. The aim of life is to do good and bring more blessings on earth, and that is a message that their hearts can receive, and for which no great culture is required. What we offer is so simple, and so near to all, that it requires moral, not intellectual, gifts to understand. Go on, then, with your struggles. Plunge into the dark abyss of doubt, and you will surely emerge into the light. If the agony of suspense and the pain of the struggle are mighty, they also will be noble and purifying.

There is a second great obstacle in the path of emancipation. It is domestic discord. You must not only grope after the light of truth, sometimes catching faint glimpses of it and then in utter gloom once more, but you must also risk the chance of losing all harmony with your surroundings. Strangely and intricately are the opinions of men interwoven with their convictions; and it happens that that which is mere useless chaff, the traditions of a lost truth, often derive a halo of glory from the splendor of human love that plays about them, so that it is the false symbol that is preserved, while the truth comes as a stranger and is challenged as a foe.

In the beginning of every new religious movement these discords are unavoidable. "I am not come to bring peace," said he who is called the Prince of Peace, "but a sword; for I shall set a man at variance against his father, and a daughter against her mother, and a man's foes shall be they of his own household." In every new religious movement, I say, this disturbance is inevitable; and it is then that those who are harassed and vexed by their convictions find that those whom nature has placed so near to them, seemingly for a larger and closer sympathy, are against them; and it is then that those who are so harassed and vexed yearn for a companionship that shall be congenial—for relations not of blood, but a community of soul. They yearn for the companionship of those who shall esteem what they esteem, and prize what they prize, who shall share their aspirations and join in their enthusiasm. It is this feeling that is illustrated in the story of Jesus when they said to him, "Master, thy mother and thy brothers are without, desiring to speak with thee;" and he said, "Who is my mother, and who are my brothers?" He stretched forth his hand towards his disciples, and said: "These be my mother and my brothers." But it is not easy for every son to deny his mother, even while that mother stands at the door desiring to speak with him. Nor can I, for a moment, credit that these words, which we attribute to Jesus, were really his own. I cannot believe it for the honor in which I hold the man. No, that escape from the difficulty is impossible to any generous soul. We must respect those that are akin to us; and, on the other hand, we must not forget the duties we owe to ourselves and the rights of our own individualism. Among the most precious of these are the rights of conscience. No one, however so near or dear, has the right to interfere with these. No husband has the right to say to the wife that she must barter away her principles for his sake; no wife has the right to say that to her husband. No parent is a true parent that seeks to hamper his children in the formation or the exercise of their convictions; that transcends the bounds of parental authority. Such a parent should hear such words as these: Father, or mother, I shall never cease to love and revere you, or to obey you in all things where you have a right to command; I shall always be grateful for what you have done for me; I shall always yield to you whatever it is in my power to dispose of; but my convictions I cannot yield; for they are neither mine to give nor withhold, and with faithfulness I will maintain them; for though you have given me life, you cannot take away my life, nor violate my own soul that is my life of life. A wise parent will heed such words as these; but not all are wise, and the equilibrium of the domestic circle is always more or less disturbed in consequence at these times when disputes run high, and strife and division almost unavoidably follow. But there is a way to secure harmony even there. If the bond of attachment in the domestic circle is strong, there is no danger. Love stills the passions; love can mould the understanding also. It teaches you to respect the character apart from opinions, and to respect the rights of opinion in others. Those who are truly bound to each other by these sacred ties will find a way to reach out to each other their hands over all the gulf of differences between. When that is accomplished, when human strife and division is overcome by human love, when brother and brother, mother and daughter, husband and wife, when father and son, are so united in the bonds of affection that differences of opinion cannot divide them, that is a glorious thing to look upon—that is a triumph for humanity which is imperishable and inestimable in its value. But few there are who can understand these lofty motives; and if you set out on this path of emancipation you must be prepared to meet domestic discord also. Two duties arise before us at this juncture; one is respect for the ties which nature has given, and the other is respect for the integrity of your own conscience, which no man can disregard with safety.

Christian Love.

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF EAU CLAIRE, WIS., BY C. L. JAMES.

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and soul, and mind, and might, and thy neighbor as thyself." Such, according to the founder of the Christian religion, is the whole duty of man. The saying has been praised so much, not only by Christians, but by skeptics and Freethinkers, that its claim to be considered the perfection of wisdom and sanctity enjoys a sort of general consent, and is constantly taken by Christian apologists as a fixed point of departure from which to reason. The beauty of "the Savior's law of love" is quietly and habitually assumed, as if nobody could dispute it, and is made, through the careless and uncritical acquiescence of Liberals, a secure base to which the enemy can retreat when hard pushed, and from which he can at any time renew the assault. I see no reason why we should thus allow our opponents the advantage of having the door which leads into their territory locked, and that which leads to ours open. I propose to-day to meet them on their own ground. I will show that they are right, and that further than they are willing to claim, in deducing all Christian orthodoxy from "the Savior's law of love." This same law is the cause of all these infamies and cruelties which have made Christianity so odious to the most earnest lovers of that humanity which Jesus and his followers have invariably professed. To begin with, it is clearly impossible for any man to love everybody as much as himself. In illustration of the text before us, Jesus told the parable of the Good Samaritan, implying that the neighbor who is to be loved equally with ourselves was simply any human being—even an enemy, as the Jew was to the Samaritan. But if a man loved all his enemies as well as himself, I apprehend there would be very little love left his friends. It would be altogether cheaper to be his enemy. No one but a Christian would pretend to such incredible attainments as loving his persecutors and slanderers equally with himself, and his benefactors a great deal more. The fact is that this wonderful law of love is a foolish plagiarism and absurd perversion. Moses, well knowing that a man loves himself more than he can love anybody else, laid down the original maxim, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," to which the rabbins afterwards added, "And hate thine enemy," feeling undoubtedly that without this gloss the expression was extravagant and unnatural. Now I do not defend the rabbins. To me it seems that the maxim, as Moses gave it, is reasonable enough. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, is a strong Asiatic way of saying, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as much as possible. But Jesus, with his characteristic delight in exaggeration, not only struck off the rabbinical gloss, which was well enough, I grant, but went on to talk about loving one's enemies, and in other ways to make it clear that he intended his followers to take literally what Moses had spoken figuratively. No human being can possibly act upon such principles, and thus those who profess to do so, begin their course with that hypocrisy and self-deceit which are always such marked features in the Christian character.

I would not, however, be understood to say that people do not try to act on this absurd maxim of friend Jesus. Undoubtedly they do. It would be well if they did not. I promised to show that this maxim was the cause of Christian persecution, Christian libidinousness, and Christian pauperism. To prove this, let us imagine ourselves Christians, trying heartily to carry out this "golden rule" Now then, I am a Christian; and as a Christian I love everybody as much as myself; at least I am doing my best to love everybody as much. What does this imply? Clearly it implies that I must feel the same interest in other's affairs as in my own. It means poking my nose into other people's business. Here is a man whom I think is doing wrong, and getting himself into trouble; I must feel as badly over it as I should if I myself had done wrong, and were getting into trouble; I must run after him; I must exhort him; I must bother him; I must pray for him. If by some pious fraud, or gentle violence, I can prevent him from further injuring himself, it is clearly a point of "Christian expediency" to do so. If I possess the power to keep him out of mischief at the expense of incommoding him by a brief restraint in jail, why should I not take the opportunity to benefit him so far against his will? Remember, loving and working for all mankind as I love and work for myself and family is a big job; in a world so full of tasks, and with so short a life to get on in, it is very provoking to be crossed, and there is a great inducement to take short cuts, and kill two birds with one stone! To illustrate—all Christian apologetic writers are notorious liars. But why should they be anything else? Who that loves everybody else as much as himself would hesitate to tell a lie which may prevent thousands from sinking into eternal torment for want of the true faith; even if that lie does cost him millenniums of suffering in purgatory? For ages Christians shed the blood of Infidels and heretics like water. Thousands of persons guilty of offenses against religion were imprisoned, tortured to extort expressions of repentance, and then burned alive. Why not again? On the principle that I am my brother's keeper, bound to love everybody as much as myself, bound to live for the general welfare of mankind, it seems to me self-evident that killing an heresiarch, and that in such a manner as to strike the greatest possible terror into others, is a very meritorious deed. Of course I hate to do it. I love the heresiarch as much as myself, but not any more than myself; and by burning him I save thousands, every one of whom I love just as much, from a fate much worse than being burned. Though, therefore, it hurt me as much as if I burned myself, I must do it. I do not doubt that multitudes of pious persecutors have felt very much like this; while at the same time it is easy to see what a vent for evil passions is opened, what a stimulus to lust, malice, envy, avarice, revenge, has been given again and again by this crusading, heretic-burning spirit of Christianity.

The horrid doctrine of eternal torments in hell is closely associated with the principle we are considering. "God is love," as an orthodox minister explained it to me, "and therefore he must punish the wicked." The business of feeding the sheep involves that of destroying the wolves. Because God finds his immeasurable happiness in loving, being loved, and having his children love each other, therefore his attributes must be made known, and among the rest his determination to put down and make an example of those whose characters are not in harmony with his beautiful law! Calvinist and Arminian agree that the definition of God's character given by the apostle of love, St. John, requires the existence of hell-fire.

On this planet Christian love requires the machinery of the Roman Catholic Church. It is a remarkable thing that no Christian body which renounced the communion of Rome and abandoned her masterly policy has ever managed to hold together. But the ideal of Jesus was certainly a united Church, not a hundred sects snapping and snarling at each other like cross dogs. The Catholic, therefore, is justified in boasting that Christianity cannot be made a success outside of his own denomination. He ought, however, to add that the interests of his own denomination require religious intolerance, spiritual autocracy, popular ignorance, monarchical or aristocratic institutions, and Jesuitical priestcraft. The Jesuits, in particular, are the perfect flower of that tree which Jesus planted. You know the full style of the organization is "The Society of Jesus." Never was name more appropriate. The Jesuit devotes himself body and soul to extending and preserving that kingdom of God which Jesus founded, looking for no reward, but combining in his holy zeal all the departments of this great work and all the methods that have ever been invented for the use of any.

I would not, however, be understood to say that Protestants do not exhibit the same mischievous spirit of interference in the name of their master's principles and the good which his regulations are supposed to lead to. Protestants, to the extent of their ability, have been as intolerant as Catholics. In England, for two centuries after the Reformation, all denominations were persecuted except the Established Church. The Puritans were pilloried, imprisoned, fined, deprived of their ears, deprived of their hands, and even put to death. Catholics, for doing what their faith required them to do, were almost daily punished as traitors; that is to say, hanged, cut down alive, quartered, and disemboweled. Similar atrocities were perpetrated by the Calvinistic governments of Holland, Switzerland, Scotland, New England, and the Palatinate, and by the Lutheran governments of Sweden and Saxony. Wherever the Baptist movement spread during the sixteenth century, it was the signal for insurrection, pillage, and massacre. Calvin burned the Unitarian Servetus at the stake, and Cromwell shed the blood of "malignants" with all the zeal of Joshua. Toleration, as established in modern Protestant countries, is simply a compromise. The English found out about the time of the Revolution that it did not do for Protestants to be cutting each other's throats with Rome so powerful and aggressive. The Germans made a similar discovery during the Thirty Years' War. The persecution of Infidels, however, went on until the end of the last century, when they began to form a party too powerful to be so treated under a representative government. Even in the present day, however, we have occasional instances of persecution for writings displeasing to the Church. The giant, though crippled and sleepy, is by no means dead, and his hold on the world is stronger than most Freethinkers are aware. The rights enjoyed by Liberals, even in America, are still rather a matter of precedent and connivance than of positive law. The Jeffersonian doctrine of purely secular government is as inconsistent with the common law which we inherited from the mother country as slavery with the Declaration of Independence; and, similarly, there is an irrepressible conflict between these incongruous factors of our institutions. We see it in Sunday laws, prohibitory liquor laws, Comstock laws, etc. I believe I should risk little in saying that the clergy of the North and South were mainly answerable for the horrors and misery of the war; and that, because of the self-deceiving fanaticism which their religion, with its specious pigment of benevolence to cover all angry passions, must necessarily engender. So that when we take the Christian world as a whole, we shall find few of its worthies but deserve the eulogy of Hudibras, who was

> "Of that stubborn crew
> Of errant saints, whom all men grant
> To be the true church militant;
> Of such as build their faith upon
> The holy text of pike and gun;
> Decide all controversies by
> Infallible artillery;
> And prove their doctrine orthodox
> By apostolic blows and knocks;
> Call fire, and sword, and desolation
> A godly, thorough reformation,
> Which always must be carried on,
> And still be doing, never done."

There is another side to all this. Christian love undoubtedly constrains those who feel it to relieve the physical wants of their neighbors, as well as to look after their souls. This is certainly the best feature of the Christian religion. Widely as I dissent from the philosophy of Jesus—or perhaps I should rather say of John—I admit that it was a necessary reaction from the great austerity and heartlessness of the Roman civilization. In this way it did some good. It abolished the gladiatorial show, though not until the empire had been Christian for more than a hundred years; it mitigated the horrors of slavery; it did something, at least, towards moderating the extreme ferocity of the barbarians. But, alas! the pernicious spirit of meddling, the incurable exaggeration, the inveterate disposition to 'slop over,' as we say, is just as conspicuous and mischievous in Christian benevolence as Christian cruelty. The frightful evil of pauperism was almost unknown in Europe before the introduction of Christianity. There were beggars under the ancient civilization, but they were either aged cripples or persons temporarily unfortunate, like our grasshopper sufferers. The horrible curse of an hereditarily pauper class, marrying, multiplying, and rotting in their rags and squalor, their dependence and worthlessness, their shame and vice, was unknown before the time of Augustus, and for centuries after that it was confined to Rome. It is the foolish, indiscriminate almsgiving which Jesus encouraged by precept and example that has made paupers as thick in every European village as similar benevolence has made them in China and the other Buddhist countries. I will not refer you for proof of this to John Stuart Mill and other political economists whom you may suspect of being rather cold-hearted. If you read the reports of practical philanthropists, men and women who have given up all the comforts of life to dwell in the poorest districts of London and other great cities that they may labor for the extinction of pauperism, you will find them, though they are mostly Christians, unanimous in declaring that injudicious charity is the one great obstacle in their way. This cruel kindness came in with the Church, it has always flourished especially in the Church, and it has been only very lately and very imperfectly checked through the influence of science, which is wholly antagonistic to the Church in method, aim, and spirit.

I might go on to show that Christian love is responsible for those irregularities which have always afforded so much scandal in Christian communities. But as the subject is a delicate one, as I am not equally fond of blackguarding with our Christian friends, and as this lecture has already been extended somewhat beyond what I intended, I will say no more than this: that if Belial himself were trying to invent something which should promote licentiousness, he could hit on nothing better than a religious system which encourages men and women to love each other, greet each other with a holy kiss, talk about their home in heaven and rest in the arms of Jesus; while, at the same time, it puts the sexual nature under all kinds of unnatural and arbitrary restraints.

It is time to close. But I hope that these remarks may be of use, not only in refuting one of the most popular of Christian arguments, but in correcting the onesidedness of certain philosophic systems, such as Utilitarianism and Comteism, which draw their inspiration from the Christian mania for "doing good." It is worse than useless to attempt doing good without taking care that we do no harm. The best way of doing good is to mind our own business, and to labor assiduously in the calling provided for us, not by any impracticable calculation of results, such as utilitarianism proposes, but by those tastes, instincts, and capacities which, as Mr. Bain and other modern psychologists have shown, are our inheritance from the ancestors whose characters determine ours, and which mark out the vocation whereunto each of us individually is called by the mysterious Author of existence.

Vicarious Atonement.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: The subject of a vicarious atonement, so much admired by the orthodox clergy, has just been preached for a few weeks in our city in all its ancient deformity, by one Rev. Mr. Rowland, a revivalist hired by the Methodists of this city, and his blasphemous statement indorsed as true by the local pastor and some others of the Methodist mummeries, gotten up evidently to counteract the influence of the Liberal Church that has been drawing to its fold the intellectual thinking portion of the community. Having watched its developments, and finding the fruits to be the same as all other unnatural excitements and the substitution of passion and impulse for sober thought, demoralizing in its effects, as all previous efforts of this kind have been; and as your paper, published in the aid of common sense, is taken by many in our city who will readily appreciate the above statement, allow me, although not a church member, nor even a professor, to express my views on the subject of a vicarious atonement, showing its beauties or its barbarities as described by the orthodox Church.

Suppose a governor, having the pardoning power over the criminals in his State, should issue a proclamation that he would on a certain day crucify on the cross, according to the Jewish customs, his only child, and that all criminals within the State that believed that his love for them alone induced him to commit that act should be pardoned; and when the day arrived, should actually nail upon the cross his only child, and while suffering the most excruciating agony, to add to its suffering by putting a crown of thorns upon its head, and compel it to drink vinegar and gall, and then read aloud the proclamation, and declare that every criminal condemned to death should be discharged, and every prison door should be opened if they would only believe that it was his child, and that it was done out of pure love and affection for such criminals, what would you then think of a vicarious atonement? and what would the spectators do or say on such an occasion? Would they sing "Glory to God, peace on earth, good will to men?" or would not rather the instincts of humanity compel them to assassinate the governor on the spot and release from its sufferings the innocent victim rather than submit to such brutality, which, if allowed, would be subversive of all government, and stamp upon the head of the executive the character of a fiend, a character that would cast far into the shade the most brutal act of savage barbarity. I ask, is this an overdrawn picture of the claim of a vicarious atonement.

In connection with this subject, allow me to state that many years ago, when the writer lived in western New York, at a revival meeting he heard the Rev. Samuel Church, then standing at the head of the Genesee Conference, in preaching on the beauties of the atonement, ask why it was that Christ's body lying for three days in the sepulchre did not putrify or commence decomposition, as other dead bodies would have done, and finally answered it himself by saying that sin was not only the cause of all suffering, but also of decay; and as there was no sin in his physical or moral nature, his body was not subject to decomposition; that it would have remained forever in its perfect state of preservation.

His answer seemed to satisfy his Methodist brethren, as being theologically sound, but I now ask if sin is the only cause of suffering, and if Christ had no sin in his physical or moral nature, how much did he suffer on the cross, and if he did not suffer, what was the sacrifice, and was the world redeemed through suffering, as all orthodox claim it was? Will some orthodox preacher answer?

Wages.

SIR: The question of wages and hard times never seems to me to be solved. Everybody seems afraid of the dilemma—the payment of fair prices. Now the law fixes the fees and salaries of clergymen, officials, lawyers, and congressmen, why cannot the workingmen and workingwomen have their fees or wages fixed by law also?

If you are too poor to pay a fair price, what right have you to employ any one? That's the question! A nation would prosper a great deal more on the certainty of good pay for those employed than unfair pay for everybody. But we know when pay is low less money circulates and fewer people can be employed. Uncertainty and insecurity are the curses of business, as they are the curses of litigation.

Every man ought to call his own court when wronged; and not to discourage the gentlemen, they needn't sit in court and look big. If a man wont pay me a fair price for my work, I don't see why a friend of mine with a friend of his can't go round to twelve men and ask their opinions of the market price, and attest to the decision of the majority—that is better law than any Congress can make—and if disputed the disputant should be imprisoned until he acknowledged the arbitration right. Better be thus fairly punished for a wrong than be imprisoned on the lies of a lawyer, as is done every day.

Look at the disputes about wills in New York, where swindlers rob all the litigants, where a child could decide the case in five minutes for nothing! Talk of law! Any one would think this big country was a kingdom where robbery by a class is a principle of law.

Four things are necessary to fix a reign of prosperity in this nation: 1. Coöperation of the majority of laborers; 2. Fixed salary or wages according to market price; 3. Freedom of the soil, no man owning what he can't use; 4. Arbitration for the mockery of law-practice.

Until men know how to attain these ends they must remain SLAVES. What is an employee of any kind—workman, clerk, servant, soldier, clegyman, etc.—but the slave of masters, bishops, railroad kings, high officials and other monopolists?

I am no communist, as I don't see in nature any perfectly leveling equality. But I do see in nature an equality of fairness, of supreme law, that knows no distinction of persons.

I am here watching a bill through Congress, and my impressions are none of the best. I know thousands of men who for one tenth of the salary would make more honest and intelligent legislators. Why don't their constituents pay them? Why fix their own salaries? What right have they to make laws for the people? Can't the people make their own laws?

If every man could call his own jury, I had rather trust to their honest decision for every kind of case as it comes up, than trust any body of men "without a soul," as corporations are said to be, or the decision of judges based on class prejudices, or the lies and forgeries of pleaders.

A republic implies the reign of order, fairness, and organization; the rotten old forms of kingdoms imply the reign of force—that is, class rule, class injustice, big salaries, and plundering by law.

LEARNED books are often written in too pedantic a style to become popular. But Lord Amberley was not only wise as to what he wrote, but equally so in the manner of his writing. For this very reason he will have thousands of readers, where he would have had only hundreds had he written for the D.D's. It is, however, very far from being a light book, or a book to amuse a lazy mind. It treats of the world's great problems, and requires the truth seeker to draw the water of truth if he would slake his thirst. Or, to change the figure, we may say the book is like a rich gold mine, the more you work, the greater your aquisition. —W. S. Bell.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 44.

GREAT JEHOVAH: We hear much from those who claim to speak in thy name about the supreme excellence and morality of the teachings of Jesus when he was upon the earth. Wilt thou allow us to candidly examine the matter for a few moments?

Is it not true that Menu, Christna, Buddha, Confucius, Mencius, Thales, Orpheus, Solon, Bias, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, Epicurus, Zeno, Aristotle, Hillel, Cicero, Seneca, Epictitus, Antoninus, Marcus Aurelius, and many others of the ancient sages and philosophers, taught many excellent morals, much of which was not inferior to those taught by thy Son? and were they not equally worthy of credit with him for the good things they did say?

If they were equally as pure and elevated in their morals, and aimed to benefit the world of mankind by their teachings, were they not equally as divine or god-like in their work as was Jesus of Galilee?

Were all his inculcations and moral teachings really as perfect and as free from fault as theologians are in the habit of claiming? Is it not the veneration growing out of the belief that he was the Son of God that induces people to regard his reputed utterances as being better than was ever spoken before or since?

When what are called his beatitudes, or the better portions of his Sermon on the Mount, are examined critically as human productions are usually examined, will they not be found to be not without fault or defect?

Were not many of the appeals made to the selfish propensities and prejudices of his hearers, and did he take, in those utterances, the high moral ground which it might be supposed a God should occupy?

Can it not be seen that his incentive to virtue was not the love of virtue itself in the present time—now—but the reward or recompense to be accorded to meritorious deeds in another world and at some time in the future?

Were not those who were persecuted for his sake consoled, not on the ground that they had done their duty, and from the satisfaction that ought to arise in the mind from consciousness of having performed kindness and fidelity to a friend, but wholly upon the ground of a great reward to be paid them in the future world?

Is it really true that, in the sight of God and all good men, pay at some distant time in the future is as strong and as pure an incentive to virtue and self-denial as is an innate love of goodness and virtue itself, which should actuate every intelligent being? Is not the love of goodness a higher incentive to good deeds than either the hope of a reward or of the escape of punishment?

Do not crowns of pearls and streets of gold, as incentives to a virtuous life, fall far below the higher inherent love of virtue itself, and for its own sake?

Is it not to some extent a craven who will do good deeds only because he expects to be paid for it, or because some person he looks up to as a superior being tells him to do so, or because he is afraid if he does not perform the deeds he will be cast into a roasting and perpetual fire? Dost thou not esteem that soul as higher and grander that performs good deeds all through life from the love he bears to virtue, and because he would rather do good deeds than evil deeds?

Was not Juvenal about right when he said:

> "Bad men hate sin through fear of punishment;
> Good men hate sin from very love of virtue."?

Was the injunction which Jesus gave his hearers: "Compromise with thy legal opponent quickly, lest he persecute thee and get thee cast into prison," the highest and noblest motive a man can be inspired with? and did it require a God to give such advice as that? Could not a third-rate lawyer give advice as sound and as elevated as that?

If thy questioner has a vile enemy who threatens arrest and imprisonment, and who is visiting the same almost daily upon others, shall thy questioner be governed by the fear of that enemy and of the evil he may be able, with the aid of wicked men, to do unto him? Is it not far better, rather, that thy questioner be moved and actuated by the higher impulses of love and devotion to duty and to virtue?

Was the advice to cut off a limb or to pluck out an eye for some slight offense, a mark of superior and godly wisdom? Because a man injures his eye or accidentally gets dirt into it, shall he pluck it out and cast it away?

If he lames his arm or a boil comes upon it, shall he cut it off, or employ another to cut it off for him?. Would a sensible physician give such advice as that? Would it not be a far more sensible course to remove the cause of offense and to restore the eye or the arm to health and usefulness again? Is a man of much use in this life or anywhere else with his eyes plucked out and his arms cut off?

Was not the threat of hell-fire, which the person was to be cast into in such cases if the eye was not plucked out or the arm not cut off, rather below the dignity of a God of love and mercy?

In the prohibition which Jesus made against swearing, did he either define the crime or give in explanation any good reason why swearing should not be indulged in? Would not a perfect teacher do both?

Is not the command "Be perfect, even as God is perfect," requiring more of human beings than they are capable of performing? Is it a mark of wisdom or justice in a parent or teacher to require more of a child than it is capable of performing? Is it, in any sense of the word, great or good to command an impossibility?

Was not the command to do alms in secret that God might reward openly again appealing to the same selfish, mercenary nature in man, already alluded to?

Was not the precept "Judge not lest ye be judged" of the same narrow, ignoble character?

Was not the injunction to forgive tresspasses in order to secure forgiveness in return an appeal of the same description? Would it not have been grander to have inculcated the noble trait to forgive others, and do good to others, whether the same treatment was received in return or not?

Is it strictly in the line of truth to say that a lustful look towards a woman is just as criminal as to commit adultery with her?

If twenty men should look admiringly upon a lovely woman, and but one of the number should go so far as to absolutely commit adultery with her, would they all be equally guilty?

Is it as criminal for a hungry child to look wishfully at a loaf of bread in a baker's window as to break through and steal it?

Is not the advice, if we are smitten on one cheek, to turn the other to be smitten also, simply absurd? Can any good come to a man to turn his second cheek to be smitten? Would it not be wiser for him to look up some better business and give his immediate attention to it?

Is it not equally absurd to encourage the thief who steals a coat by giving him a cloak as a remuneration for his enterprise? If that principle were carried out, would it not place all the property in the world in the possession of the thieves and scoundrels, and must it not forever be changing hands and be given to the new thieves that may constantly arise?

Is it the most sensible advice that can be given to mankind to take no thought for the morrow and to make no provision for the future? If all men acted upon that principle, would not all enterprise be destroyed and the world soon reduced to a state of mendicancy, ignorance, and barbarism?

Is it the highest pattern that men have to look to, in preparing for the frosts of winter and the helplessness and decrepitude of old age, to do as the birds and lilies do, to toil not nor spin?

Rather than to spend our days in idleness, neither sowing, cultivating, nor reaping, is it not better to be industrious, and sow the seeds in the spring, on well-prepared soil, of the grains that constitute the food of man, and to work industriously through the season in caring for the same and in harvesting it in barns in the fall, so that the wife and little ones may have aught to eat and wear through the long, cold winter? Is this not more sensible than to spend the time in idleness, as Jesus and his disciples did, strolling from place to place, without apparent object, aim, or enterprise?

Is not industry far more conducive to virtue and usefulness than idleness and vagabondism? Is not an enterprising farmer, who raises his own bread and the bread his wife and children need, far more commendable than the worthless tramp, who wanders over the country without an aim in life save to eat what the toil of others has produced?

If in this country we should do as Jesus said, and take the birds for our guide, would not the utmost destitution and degradation overspread the land? Do the birds sow and gather into barns? Do they lay up stores for their little ones for a rainy day or for a cold, biting winter? Should we do as they do, and migrate north and south twice a year with the change of the seasons, doing nought to produce anything for our support, save what we could pick up by strolling around and fishing, perhaps, now and then? Would not that course inevitably soon produce the most wretched state of savagism and degradation? Would that style of life please thee most of all?

Would it not be vastly better for man to look ahead and anticipate the needs that may arise, and by industry and frugality to provide for them in time? Is it not indeed a virtue in summer to prepare for winter, in youth and manhood for old age, and in almost every respect to act differently from the habit of the birds of the air, who live from day to day and from month to month on what they can pick up here and there?

Would it not have been just about as sensible for Jesus to have instructed his hearers to fly about in the air with wings, to make nests in the trees, and live by what worms, bugs and insects they could find, as to advise them to do as the birds do in other respects?

Is it not the highest type of men that show foresight and enterprise, that take cognizance of the needs of the future, and make preparation for the same by laying up stores for the time of need?

On the other hand, are they not merely savages and barbarians who make no provision for the future, but live from hand to mouth by hunting and fishing, and by what they can pick up in a furtive manner?

Do not schools, institutions of learning, manufactories, towns and cities, railroads, steamboats, and nearly all the advancements of civilization and science, grow directly out of the incentive to provide for the needs of the future and the disposition to be prepared for them when the needs are felt?

Does not the very doctrine of future rewards and punishments which Jesus taught, that his disciples must so live that they may reap a future reward, directly conflict with his injunction to "take no thought for the morrow"?

Is not, then, his beatitude here referred to both delusive and impracticable, and is it not most unworthy of the utterance of a great and wise teacher? In this view, can the teachings of Jesus compare for a moment with those of the old sages and philosophers mentioned?

Was not his conduct on many occasions, as well as his teachings, not what might be expected from a being all-wise, all-good, and perfect enough to create a world and a universe?

Was it a mark of wisdom or goodness to visit a fig-tree at the season of the year when he had no right to expect to find figs upon it, and because he did not find them to get angry and curse the tree, when it was not at all at fault?

Did the disappointment which he had no reasonable right to feel justify his flying into a rage and acting like a man without reason or consideration?

Would not a farmer in this day be pronounced a hopeless lunatic who should go out into his orchard in March to pick a wagon-load of apples, and because he found them not on the trees to fly into a rage and take his ax and cut them all down?

Was the conduct of Jesus much better in the temple when he became enraged at the money-changers whom he found there transacting business, as for years had been the custom, when he whipped and scourged them, and, in an angry and abusive manner, drove them out of the temple? Was such conduct fitting for a being all patience, mercy, goodness, and forbearance?

Did he not evince a similar disposition in his parable of the ten pieces of money, when he said, "But those of mine enemies which would not that I should rule over them, bring them hither, and slay them before me"?

Had he really been a perfect being, one all-powerful and wise, would he have taught his disciples that the highest moral merit depended upon a certain line of belief, when he must have known that no intelligent persons can fix up their belief at short notice and just according to order? Would he not have known that belief is always conformable to evidence, and that a person cannot believe as he is commanded, or even as he chooses himself?

Was it the perfection of justice in him that caused him to pardon the woman caught in the act of adultery on the ground that others had committed similar offenses? Did it make the slightest difference with her guilt whether others had been innocent or guilty?

Did it show an amiable or kind-hearted disposition in him to harshly reply to the poor woman not of the Hebrew nation who applied to him to heal her child, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs"?

As a divine being, father alike over all, should he not have shown the same kindness to a Samarian woman as though she had been one of the Jews? Was she any more a dog than they?

Was it not pandering to the vanity of his disciples to stimulate their hopes, by the promise that if they remained faithful to him they should all become kings, sitting on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel?

Was it impartial and divine justice that caused him to denounce whole cities in the view that some of the citizens should decline to properly receive the disciples he sent forth, when he uttered the harsh and unmerciful threat: "Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my father which is in heaven"?

Did he prove himself a true prophet when he said: "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away before all these things are fulfilled," while not only many generations, but nearly two thousand years have since passed away, and the prediction then made is still unfulfilled?

Would an all-wise and truthful being make the unreasonable promise to his adherents that they should have the power to speak with new tongues, drink the most deadly poison without harm, and handle deadly serpents with impunity?

Is it probable that thy Son would have set at naught the laws thou hadst thyself established, and have based everything upon the supernatural to the extent that his followers could drink prussic acid, and handle moccasin and copperhead snakes?

Could he have truthfully and intelligently assured his disciples that whatever they believingly asked for they should surely receive?

Could a being of infinite mercy and goodness condemn to endless punishment those who should refuse to assist believers, or be unrepentant at his coming? Would he have talked coolly of everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels from the foundation of the world, and make it necessary that more than nine-tenths of his own creatures should suffer the torments of eternal flames?

Had Jesus possessed the prescience and foresight which a divine being ought to possess, would he have been likely to choose as one of the special number of followers and body-guards, a person who would turn against him, betray him to his enemies, and thereby cause his arrest, trial, and an ignominous, cruel death?

Had he been a being of perfect goodness and benevolence, would he not have condemned in strong terms the wrongs of human slavery and all descriptions of tyranny which tend to the degradation of man and woman?

Is there any instance on record where he denounced human slavery or human despotism by which thy offspring are held in the worst conceivable forms of bondage and oppression?

Would it not have been proper for him, on the other hand, to have taught that all just governments derive their rights to govern from the people themselves? Would it have been more than right for him to have recognized the great maxims of social and political freedom which are now better understood in the world?

[TO BE CONTINUED]

More Comstockism.

On the 9th inst., Anthony Comstock, attended by his accomplice and partner Joseph A. Britton, Esq., and officer James G. Howe, visited the house of Dr. Sara B. Chase, No. 56 West Thirty-third street, and arrested that lady and took her before Judge Morgan at the Tombs, where she was held in $1,500 bail, upon the enormous charge of having sold two female syringes, gotten up expressly for cleansing and healthful purposes.

Dr. Sara B. Chase has resided in this city nearly four years, and has become well known as a lecturer on physiological subjects before separate classes of ladies and gentlemen, and also as a successful practitioner in homeopathic medicine. She has recently started The Physiologist, an excellent reform and health monthly, of which she is editor and publisher.

She has given several courses of lectures in Brooklyn, and that is the home of Anthony Comstock. It seems that not long since he opened a correspondence with the lady, upon the subject of procuring a syringe from her. He did not write in his own name, but followed, rather, the course for which he has become notorious, of writing over a fictitious name. He this time personated a Mrs. Farnsworth, who had attended Mrs. Chase's lectures and had received valuable information thereby, and wished to procure a syringe from her, but on account of illness was unable to be present on the occasion of the Doctor's last lecture in Brooklyn, and she would send her husband to the Doctor's residence for one of the instruments. In fact, Comstock himself took this letter to the lady, and passed himself off as the veritable Mr. Farnsworth whose wife wanted a syringe. He received the instrument with full directions as to how it should be used. He was so well pleased with it that, on the following day, he took his bosom friend, Joseph A. Britton, to see the Doctor and procure one of those valuable instruments for his wife. (This is the same Britton that Comstock sent to New Canaan, Conn., to induce the hotel keepers and saloon keepers of that town to sell beer and whisky to him that he might appear against them in court, and who was accused by the citizens of New Canaan of having got drunk and visited houses of prostitution and of having misbehaved himself in several ways. This is the same Britton that induced the good old Mr. Prosch, the stereopticon maker, to procure certain engravings or pictures for him, to be presented to his club of young gentlemen, and for which Comstock shamefully dragged the old man through the streets to prison. This is the same Britton that induced Charles F. Blandin, a young lawyer from Boston, to bring him a fancy photograph, and who handed out his business card as being Joseph Andrews, buyer of Rich, Rare, and Racy Books and Photographs. The same Britton that has on several occasions tried to induce innocent persons to purchase obscene books and prints from him, as well as to sell the same kinds of goods to him; the same Britton who was arraigned before Judge Duffy, of the Jefferson Market Court, for perjury, and where the charge was proved by respectable witnesses, but the Justice saw fit not to hold him because four witnesses were not there to testify against the accused; the same Britton whom numerous persons in this city hold themselves in readiness to testify in any court of justice that the said Britton did feloniously and maliciously swear to falsehoods to their positive knowledge; the same Britton that Comstock has advertised as his valuable assistant in the peculiar business conducted by the firm of Britton, Comstock, & God.)

Dr. Chase being, of course, willing to sell these valuable syringes to every married lady who wished them, cheerfully sold one to the honorable Mr. Britton; and then it was that the pure and spotless Mr. Anthony Comstock made himself known, telling the lady that he was himself no less than Anthony Comstock, and that she must accompany him to the Tombs. Before leaving the premises, however, he caused the house to be searched and overhauled in a most shameless manner. He caused the ladies of the family to be shut up in a room, and then every room, closet, drawer, and every conceivable place was examined, even to bundles of letters and correspondence. He continued the search until, in the pocket of one of the lady's dresses, hanging in a closet, he found the decoy letter he had written in the name of Mrs. Farnsworth, which he carefully took with him that the proofs of his lying and villainy might not easily be produced against him.

As an instance of Comstock's meanness, it may be stated that among the lady's private papers he found an article on "Fœticide," which was decidedly against the practice of it; but, in order to present her case as unfavorably as possible, in the statement which he furnished The Tribune, he mentioned finding the article, but changed the title to "Fœticide—When it should be done." There were no grounds for his making that change; and a man who would do such a deed would probably commit forgery, or theft.

In the same Tribune article, Comstock exhibited more of the ignoble traits of his character by attempting to prejudge the case in the public mind by placing the lady at a disadvantage by styling her a rival of Madame Restell, and making ungentlemanly and uncalled-for remarks about her mouth. On the way to the Tombs, Comstock spoke to the lady about her paper The Physiologist, and said he regarded it as an immoral paper and one that ought not to be allowed circulation. She found no trouble in giving bail, and thus the Christian Comstock was cheated out of the pleasure of causing her to be kept in the Tombs over night.

The crime which the agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice charges against Mrs. Chase, is that by the syringes which she recommends and sells, she places it in the power of wives to prevent conception. This he holds to be very criminal in any one whom he chooses to make his victim, but when the president of his society, Mr. Samuel Colgate wishes to engage in the business of selling an article which he recommends as a preventive of conception, he does not interfere in the enterprise and does not try to bring his friend Colgate to justice, and in this laudable clemency he is seconded by the amiable United States District Attorney, Mr. Stewart L. Woodford, who knows how Mr. Colgate has violated the law, but himself being an honored member of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, refuses to prosecute its honored but intolerant president. It is of course very criminal in Dr. Chase to take any means to provide persons with the means for preventing conception, but Mr. Colgate may sell tons of Vaseline, which blended with salicylic acid he recommends as being potent in preventing conception or removing the effects of it, and shall not be disturbed. He is a pious man, he supports the Church, he loves Jesus and hates Freethinkers—and he is at liberty to sell all the Vaseline he wishes. No laws or courts or Comstocks shall be sufficient to interfere with him in his lucrative career. Being a "truly good man," he is to be allowed uninterruptedly the privileges which belong only to the faithful. He may do as he pleases sitting under his own vine and fig-tree and none shall make him afraid.

This question of preventing conception is one which is bound to be discussed and passed upon by the American public as it has been by the people of Great Britain. It will be canvassed in all its aspects and it will be examined into with a view to decide whether it is criminal or not. To all intents and purposes this is an open question, and must remain so for some time to come. Anthony Comstock, seconded by the members of Congress and of our State Legislature, has attempted to close it, and to pronounce prevention as criminal, but it is very doubtful if his dictum will stand through all coming time. It is at all events, our privilege and our pleasure to examine the subject carefully.

Is it true that there are cases where the prevention of conception is not only harmless but eminently proper? Suppose a mother has ten children already, with one at the breast, is it absolutely sinful to take harmless measures that the number be not enlarged? Suppose a pair in great poverty with a house full of children half-clad and half-fed, the anxious parents driven to the greatest straits to be able to supply even this half-allowance, ought they to be sent to the penitentiary for using prudential means to stop the increase of their half-fed and half-clothed offspring? If one or both parents have the seeds of consumption in them; if three of their children have already fallen victims to pulmonary diseases, and two others are hastening on in the same road, is it wrong for them to use laudable means to prevent still others being added to this woeful number? If the father is eaten up with syphilis, or is semi-rotten with scrofula, is it sinful for the mother by a cleansing process to use such a simple preventive as will not increase the number of children to be miserable heirs to disease and wretchedness? If the father has by a long course of dissipation brought upon himself imbecility or semi-idiocy, shall the mother not be allowed to prevent an unsound mental and physical offspring to be born to such a father? If the tendency to insanity is strong in the husband's family, if his father and grandfather became hopelessly insane, and in a fit of madness butchered their wives and children, is it positively criminal for the mother to use an ablution of water applied by the use of a female syringe to prevent the miserable dangerous stock from being increased? If a mother by toil and child-bearing is broken down in health and strength until she is hardly able to drag herself around, and if in her last confinement she suffered to the extent that her life was despaired of, and her nearest friends believed that she would not survive, and could not possibly pass through another such ordeal, would she be committing a crime against God or man by using a simple means of prevention? Are there not thousands upon thousands of similar cases where prevention is not in the slightest sense wrong, but in the highest degree commendable and proper? and shall Anthony Comstock and his legal abettors send people to prison for aiding this thing? In fact, is it not right for any wife or mother to decide for herself whether she wishes to bear more children or not? Take China, for instance, where parts of that country are excessively overcrowded, where hundreds of thousands are starving to death for the want of food, and where dead children are offered in the market as food, is it criminal to prevent by sensible means the birth of more children under such circumstances? Is it not better, far better, that conception be prevented than that children be born into the world to die of starvation or to be eaten up with the vilest diseases?

In any case of prevention that may be used, even admitting that it is a crime, it is most difficult to know whether the crime has absolutely been committed, for it is impossible to be told whether conception would have taken place or not. The proportion of conceptions to the possibilities, is extremely small. It is probable the proportion is much the same as with the seeds of trees of the forest, the herbs of the field, or the ovum of the fishes of the sea—perhaps not one in a thousand produces its like. We have seen no estimate by physiologists as to what the proportion is, but probably it is not more than one to fifty or to one hundred; hence it must be seen that if the most effectual preventive is employed that can be devised, it must be highly improbable that a crime has been committed. The most effectual preventive known in the world (and we hope Comstock will not cause our arrest for making it known) is for the sexes to strictly remain apart; and of course, then, this is the most criminal of all the modes, and persons guilty of it should be sent to prison for not less than ninety-nine years.

This question has attracted the earnest attention of some of the best men and the deepest thinkers in England, and the subject is bound to arouse attention in our own country. There are some persons depraved enough to think it would be better to place some check upon the too great evils of over-population, rather than to see the distress repeated here that exists in China, in India, and in some of the overcrowded cities of Europe. Those persons do not regard with favor the introduction of miserable children into this world, whose parents are only fitted to bring a helpless or diseased offspring into existence, and, with Darwin, they think that in the propagation of no domestic animals are men so careless as with their own race. In discussing this important subject Darwin says: "Excepting in the case of man himself, hardly any one is so ignorant as to allow his worst animals to breed."

The class of intelligent persons referred to do not regard the sexual part of the human organization as being wholly vile, all knowledge of which is positively criminal and must needs be suppressed. On the other hand, they hold that the organs which constitute us men or women are as honorable, and should be as well understood, as any other parts of our bodies, and that it is not criminal to understand their uses and proper needs. It is only Anthony Comstock and such prurient minds as his that see so much that is vile and criminal in the distinguishing features that make us men and women. It is such as he who think that people ought to be sent to prison for even looking at the picture of a nude human being; and it remains to be tested whether Comstock shall be the permanent law-maker and dictator in our miscalled free country.

The subject, as observed, of population and over-population is of vital importance to the human race, present and future; it cannot be ignored, and should not be. This subject must come to the front; it must be examined; it must for some time in the future remain an open question; and we decidedly hold that neither Anthony Comstock nor his pet members of Congress and of the Legislature have any right to close it.

The most villainous of Comstock's tricks in this business is the effort to represent Mrs. Chase as an abortionist, when nothing is further from the truth. No person feels more against that crime or has spoken more strongly against it than has the lady herself. Comstock will not be able to prove anything of that kind upon her, and it is only by his despicable course in putting false headings to his Tribune articles that he can accomplish his vile purposes. It is not enough to bring odium upon the lady by causing her arrest, but he seems determined to prejudice her case all he can in the public mind before it comes to a trial. If such a man can be a good man, where, pray, are the evil ones to be found?

Is it, indeed, so great a crime to sell a female syringe that people must have their business broken up, their reputation blasted for it for life? If it is a crime for Dr. Chase to sell a syringe of this kind, every druggist in the country ought to be sent to prison for life. There is probably not a druggist in the United States who has not sold female syringes. We were in the drug business a quarter of a century, and we sold many scores of them, and did not dream that we were committing a crime by doing so. From what we know of the importance of cleanliness in maintaining the health of both sexes, we are fully convinced that these syringes should be used much more than they are. We are decidedly of the opinion that no lady's toilet is complete who has not one of them. Those who lack them are not in possession of a necessary aid to cleanliness and health. A person who supplies ladies with them is really doing a good deed to his fellow-beings. In preventing their diffusion and making it a crime, Anthony Comstock is again proving himself an enemy to his race.

Liberals of the country, just a word to you direct: Mrs. Chase is a poor woman; she is struggling to lead a useful life and to make an honest living. The arrest has already had the effect to injure her business, for no sooner does Anthony Comstock arrest a person than almost everybody becomes at once weak-kneed and cowardly; many will drop an accused person at once, for fear that Mrs. Grundy and some of the crême de la crême will not approve of their course. The defense which she is compelled to make will cost her a good deal of money. Courts of law are an expensive luxury in this city. Those who are able and feel disposed to help Mrs. Chase will confer a real favor by remitting to her what they can spare to help her in her trouble. Those, too, who feel disposed to subscribe for her monthly paper, The Physiologist, an excellent health journal, will do her a friendly act by subscribing. Price $1.50 per year. Address Sara B. Chase, M.D., 56 West Thirty-third street, New York.

CHAPTER XII.

ENTITLED YE PLAINS.

The Plain of Science.—The Favorites of the Dragons.—The Car of Freethought.—The Trees of the Plain.—Simon falls in with Unitheos.—Simon and Unitheos in the Plain.—The Vision of Unitheos.—True Communism.

1. Now, beyond the Forest, was on the right hand a great and beautiful plain, called the Plain of Science, and on the left was the Vale of Superstition.

2. And between this vale and the Plain of Science was a noble tree, like unto a banyan tree, and the name of it was Natural Wealth.

3. And upon it there grew a very great abundance of wholesome fruit; yea, all manner of fruit hung upon its branches; and it depended not upon the seasons for its fertility, nor cast its leaves in the autumn; its verdure was immortal, and its beauty was glorious. And it continually sent out new branches, which, growing outwards and downwards, at last sent down stems into the ground, which took root, and grew into trees themselves, and they in like manner sent forth their branches, which also grew into trees; and thus the tree went on, year by year increasing its dimensions, and becoming greater and greater continually.

4. Yet was its growth by no means so great as it might have been had it been cultivated as it ought, and its increase not impeded.

5. Nay, the tree could have produced fruit and food enough for all the people of Cosmos, were it but duly apportioned.

6. But it was guarded day and night by certain evil, malicious, and malignant dragons, whose names were Ignorance, Avarice, Fraud, Religion, Falseeducation, and many others.

7. And these malignant dragons continually drove away those whom they called the common people, and would scarcely permit great numbers of them so much as a mouthful, but gave the fruits to their favorites, whom they loadened with more than they needed, and more than they could by any means eat; so that while these feasted themselves gluttonously, and wasted and destroyed that which they could not eat, others, their fellow-beings, perished miserably for want.

8. And though the dragons would not give those whom they called the common people their rightful share of the fruit, yet did they make them bring soil from the Plains of Science for the nourishment of the tree, and to do all the labor, while they themselves, and their favorites, took their ease, and reaped the harvest which the others did sow.

9. And some of the guides brought soil from the Vale of Superstition, also, for the tree, and this it was that prevented the tree from flourishing as it might; for such soil did but poison the tree, and retard its growth.

10. Now, if soil had been brought from the Plains of Science only, the tree would have flourished so abundantly that there would have been enough fruit, and to spare, for every soul in the whole country of Cosmos, and every man might have dwelt at ease; for if the labor had been duly apportioned, and every one had done his share of it, then would the burden have been indeed light.

11. But instead whereof, many labored hard, and got little fruit; and many got more fruit than they could eat, and labored not at all, except it were to destroy their superabundance of fruit; and many there were that died of want, because they were driven away from the tree; and to this thousands of bleaching bones which lay about bore hideous testimony.

12. And the giants which dwelt in the Plains of Science took note of this, and made ceaseless war against the dragons, and endeavored that all should have their due proportion, and no more.

13. And the Forest of Evidences was in the way, and hindered very many from coming at the tree; wherefore they tore down the trees, and brake down the fences which surrounded it, and made constant war against the Beast and his servants.

14. And through the Plains of Science flowed the river called Inquiry (which Simon had seen before he entered the Valley of Repentance), and which fell into the Lake of Unbelief; and from this lake the river flowed onwards towards another and greater lake, called the Lake of Truth.

15. And the river and the lakes, and all the trees of the Plain of Science, gave off certain pleasant odors, but which the dragons who guarded the tree could by no means endure; for it caused them to lose their strength, and grow weaker day by day, so that they could not now guard the tree as they were wont, nor altogether keep away the people from it.

16. Yet were the dragons still very powerful, because there arose from the decaying trees in the Forest of Evidences, and from those in the Vale of Superstition, very nauseous stenches, that did hinder the odors from the trees of the Plain of Science, and from the river and lakes.

17. And for this reason did also the giants make inroads upon the Forest, and upon the Vale of Superstition.

18. And from the Lake of Truth the odors were exceedingly potent, and were especially abhorred by the dragons, and the beast and his servants, and by all the people of the Vale of Superstition; for they could not by any means withstand them, and fled from them as a man would fly from death.

19. And the giants had a certain car, called the Car of Freethought, and to the car was harnessed a certain noble and generous steed called Philanthropy. And within the car was great store of seeds, which, when the car proceeded, were thrown out into the air, and fell into the ground, and there took root, and in time grew up into stately trees, producing very pleasant flowers; and any one plucking these flowers was able with more ease to overcome and outwit the dragons and obtain the fruit of the tree they guarded.

20. And the name of one of these trees growing from the seeds thrown out of the car was Education, and the name of the flower, Knowledge; and of another the name was Research, and the flower, Discovery.

21. And the car did proceed on its way, as it were, in half circles, starting from the Lake of Unbelief and going to the Lake of Truth.

22. And it took water from the Lake of Truth, and shed it about as it went.

23. And the beast, and his servants the guides, and some of the more foolish of the pilgrims, were continually putting all manner of obstacles in its way, and endeavoring mightily to stay its course.

24. But all their malice failed to stop the car, though they delayed it often.

25. Yea, despite their utmost malice, the car still went on, in ever-widening circles, overthrowing and trampling upon all impediments, and putting to rout and confusion all that dared oppose it.

26. And the Forest of Evidences and the Vale of Superstition were in its way, but the resistless car went on, slicing off great portions of the Forest and the Vale upon every journey.

27. And the giants cast out the seeds, and shed abroad the water; and the seeds took root, and the water nourished them, and weakened the dragons, and sickened the beast and his servants.

28. And the car goeth on even to this day, and the Forest and the Vale are doomed, and will disappear; and the dragons, though still potent for evil, are losing strength day by day, and soon may their end come. Selah.

29. And within the Plains of Science were also many other trees, such as were spoken of before, from which the giants armed themselves with cudgels.

30. And these trees were cultivated because they were in themselves very beautiful, and because they furnished excellent weapons to the giants, and because their fruit was good for the eyesight.

31. And some of the trees were called Geologos, others Astrognomos, others Chronologos, others Ethnologos, others Philologos.

32. And Simon fell in with another pilgrim, called Unitheos, and had much discourse with him.

33. Now, Unitheos had not entered the City of Conversion, nor come through the Valley of Repentance, but had come into the Forest from the country of Cosmos in a direct line.

34. And Unitheos had some little understanding, and when the gutter called the Narrow-way grew too filthy, or too narrow, he stepped out and went comfortably.

35. And he had been up some of the trees, and seen little, and had grown tired of climbing.

36. And when he and Simon came out of the Forest, and upon the Vale of Superstition, Unitheos liked not the prospect, and he said unto Simon, Come out of the path, for it leadeth down yonder dismality, whither I care not to go; and see how pleasant it is on the other side, and how much more healthy and vigorous the trees and shrubs appear than they do hereabouts.

37. Yea, verily, said Simon; doubtfully it seemeth pleasant, but thou knowest the guides bid us keep in the path.

38. And Unitheos said, Kick the guides; they are men like ourselves; come out, let us examine the matter for ourselves; and if we find hurt, we will return. And he led on, and Simon followed timidly.

39. Now, they had not gone far when they perceived one of the giants busy with one of the trees called Astronomos.

40. And the giant perceiving them, inquired whither they went; and Simon said, We are bound to the great and glorious city beyond the river.

41. And the giant smiled, and plucked some of the fruit from the tree, and offered them thereof, saying, Eat; they are good for the eyesight.

42. And Unitheos partook, and lo! a film fell from his eyes, and he saw that the firmament was neither of brass nor yet of tapestry, and he began to mutter.

43. And I, Philo Alethico, listened to his muttering, and heard this, The stars are not candles, but Joshua was an ass.

44. But Simon, saying the fruit was dry, swallowed but little.

45. And the giant said to Unitheos, Where thinkest thou is the city thou searchest for, where thy guide-book telleth thee?

46. And Unitheos started and said, Nay, verily, that which I thought was the outskirts of it has vanished, now that I see better.

47. And Simon said, I fear me much, Unitheos, that this is some snare of the evil one. I do remember that I perceived trees somewhat like unto these in the Forest, but the fruit thereof was by no means like unto this.

48. And the giant answered, saying, Of a truth there are trees somewhat like these in the Forest, for seest thou yonder car which is casting out great abundance of seed? Out of that car hath seeds been carried into the Forest, and trees have sprung up; but, as thou sayest, though the trees somewhat resemble these, yet the fruit is different; and the reason is this:

49. In the Forest the guides destroy and bend the trees, and compel them to twine themselves round other trees, such as belong to the Forest, and thus they become strangled, and their growth impeded, and their fruit becometh unsound and worthless, and is never matured; whilst here the trees are under no law, but grow according to their several inclinations, and do accordingly flourish and bear their natural fruit.

50. And the giant led Unitheos to another tree, called Critical Examination; and this tree gave forth light, and its virtues were such that whatsoever was brought nigh unto it straightway became of its true color and texture, and appeared without disguise.

51. And the giant desired Unitheos to examine his guide-book thereby; and Unitheos did so, and immediately the book looked so hideous that Unitheos cast it upon the ground, and kicked it away, and began to laugh.

52. And Simon was greatly astonished, and mightily afraid, and he inquired of Unitheos why he laughed and kicked the book.

53. And Unitheos said, Verily, I laugh because I now perceive what an ass I have been; and I kicked the book because 'tis full of lies. Prithee come hither and look at it by this light, and then thou wilt kick it also; and Simon looked.

54. And Simon began to be exceedingly affrighted, and he cried out piteously, saying, Ah, Unitheos, now we are altogether undone; woe, woe, woe is me! Oh, that I, one of the chosen, should be thus entrapped! Fly, Unitheos, while there is yet time. And Simon turned him about and fled like a full-grown whirlwind.

55. And as he fled, there suddenly surrounded him on every side more than six hundred and nine imps, called Doubts, and they began to bite and gnaw him without compassion; and one of the greatest of the imps was called Unpardonable Sin, and it ran a tilt at Simon with its claws, and spitted him thereon, and held him aloft and carried him away; and the rest of the imps followed, tormenting Simon without ceasing.

56. And Simon groaned with an exceeding great and grievous dismality.

57. And sundry guides came up and battled with the imps, and sent them packing, and unspitted Simon.

58. And Simon rejoiced exceedingly, and danced for joy, and shouted aloud, and split the affrighted clouds with his vociferous howling, and got him again into the gutter, and plunged headlong into the mire and filth, and bathed himself unsparingly in the mud, and sang like a pelican.

59. And he girded up his loins afresh, and went on his way triumphantly, and held up his empty head, and strode away with valiant and lordly strides.

60. And Unitheos and the giant laughed consumedly.

61. And the giant showed Unitheos some of the wonders of the Plain, and made known to him the desire and intention of the people thereof, how they desired to cultivate the great tree called Natural Wealth, and let all men share in its bountiful produce, and debar none.

62. And Unitheos admired very exceedingly, and extolled the giants and their cause; and when the giant left him he began to ponder on the things he had heard and seen, and, pondering, he fell into a vision.

63. And he saw a new earth and a new heaven.

64. Vast plains were spread before him, studded with pleasant dwellings, and peopled with happy and smiling nations.

65. There was a man truly a man, and his fellows were his brethren. Not one was higher than another, nor one any lower.

66. The ground teemed with abundant fruit, and verdant pastures nurtured unnumbered flocks. There the sloping vale spread its charms to the glowing sun, and shimmered in silvery beauty beneath the colder glances of the moon.

67. There the towering hill lifted its hoary head to the skies, the swelling bosom thereof clad in richest verdure, and girdled with unfading firs.

68. There the crystal streamlet pursued its way, now flowing silently and peacefully through shady glades, and now murmuring in gentle cadences, like the softest notes of the air-stirred lyre, and anon leaping in mimic fright from crag to crag, and forming tiny cascades sparkling like unto a myriad gems.

69. There mighty rivers swept majestically along their rock-girt courses, now gliding slowly and placidly through verdant plains and wood-girt valleys, and now swiftly racing adown gentle declivities, and anon, in seething fury, rushing in thunderous torrents over mighty precipices, and with foam-crowned crest forcing their resistless way with surging bounds through appalling gorges, and awakening from the cavernous depths a thousand weird echoes.

70. There the feathered songsters of many-hued plumage filled the air with their melodies, and adorned the woods by their beauty.

71. There the resonant din of commerce rose to the skies, and the busy hum of prosperous cities smote on the listening ear.

72. There the craftsman was equal with the highest, and not a man dwelt in idleness, or lived by the toil of another.

73. There every man did his portion of the labor, and none labored more than was his due, or beyond his strength.

74. There every one had sufficient wherewith to provide for his needs, and none more than sufficient, and the residue was for the sick, the feeble, and the aged. Thither came not famine, for all alike shared in the bountiful outpourings of the earth.

75. There was the abode of learning and knowledge, and every man had abundant leisure to profit thereby.

76. There dwelt not crime, for the inducement thereto was vanished. No man dwelt in fear of the robber, for, all having enough, none had need to steal.

77. Thither came not pestilence, for Science was nurtured. Thither came not war, for there were neither kings nor priests.

78. There innocent mirth and youthful pleasures made the earth ring again, and the shades of night joyous.

79. There the sweet song of blithesome content pervaded the air, and the merry carolings of youth filled the heart.

80. There the swift stepping of the frequent dance gladdened the eyes, and the elastic bounding of ruddy children made men merry.

81. And the rest of the Vision of Unitheos, behold, is it not written in the book of Futurity, and in the chronicles of the To-come?

Communications.

Hypocritical Christians.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I have very recently become acquainted with your valuable paper, a companion that I have long been seeking for, and I assure you our meeting in the gloom of surrounding superstition was joyful—at least on my part. The warfare it is waging in the cause of mental freedom is noble and glorious, and the cowardly attempt of bigotry to spike its guns through a servile officer is a confession that it is doing effective work.

A vile and rotten man in the garb of piety, with avarice and lust in his heart, and a life of ease for his object, is allowed to breathe the pure air of heaven unmolested, and is protected in the enjoyments of his personal rights; while a sincere worker in the cause of truth and right, with motives pure, and conduct spotless, because he is not a canting hypocrite of superstition, is made to feel the vengeance of a desperate priesthood. It seems that their time would be better employed in purging the Church of its hypocrisy and vileness than in suppressing honest thought. A few evenings since I attended what is called divine service where the man in the pulpit, called of God to preach love and charity to all mankind, so far forgot the duty of his calling as to purposely or wickedly descend beneath the dignity of his office, and go down into the grave, as it were, and haul up the defenseless dead, and malign and defame the character of the same, simply because when living he possessed courage and manhood enough to do his own thinking instead of letting, or calling upon priests, potentates, or kings to do it for him: simply because he put his honest thoughts in a book for the consideration of all mankind, giving his views of religion, and exposing some of the frauds perpetrated under its name. I happened to have a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER with me, which contained a portion of Col. R. G. Ingersoll's defense of Thomas Paine, with his offer of one thousand dollars in gold for any minister who would prove that Voltaire did not pass away as serenely as the coming of the dawn.

This article I marked, then mailed him the paper for his edification, but still he forgets his love and charity, and continues to hurl his bitter invectives upon Col. Ingersoll and all skeptics and Infidels, wishing their books and tracts were burned, simply I presume because they differ from the books and tracts of his trade, being founded upon reason and common sense instead of faith and superstition. Where then is the Christian's boasted love and charity, if man is not entitled to the honest convictions of his own mind concerning his religion and future state of existence. It is evident the dead do not return to inform us of the latter, and that a religion whose punishments, rewards, and blessings are all in another world has no business, and is not entitled to reverence in this. I had supposed that charity was the pure fountain of the heart from whence flowed all the virtues of benignity, candor, forbearance, generosity, compassion, and liberality, but I find with most of orthdoxy it means malign your benefactors. Defame the character and reputation of all who are brave enough to stand by their honest thoughts and convictions concerning their religion. Curse with bitter anathema, all who claim the right to think, reason, and investigate the teachings of every book and creed. Ostracise all who practice justice, love, and mercy, all who devote their talents and lives for the benefit of mankind, unless they conform to orthodoxy and take stock and trade in their book of creeds, the teachings of which from their sacred alters is simmered down to this:

"Come into the Church or go to hell Believe us or be damned."

Yes, we must believe that God inspired this book of a thousand creeds and that the auther consigned the greater portion of mankind to a never ending hell, and, according to some creeds, long before they were born. What a charitable being such a God must be! what a merciful father to his non-elect! But the Rev. Mr. Emmonds, a sound orthodox, in his volume of sermons drops a few crumbs of comfort and consolation in the following: "The happiness of the elect in heaven will in part consist in watching the torments of the damned in hell. And among those it may be their own children, parents, husbands, wives, and friends on earth. One part of the business of the blest is to celebrate the doctrine of reprobation. While the degree of reprobation is eternally executing on the vessels of wrath, the smoke of their torment will be eternally ascending in view of the vessels of mercy, who instead of taking the part of those miserable objects will sing, 'Amen, hallelujah, praise the Lord." Again, he says, "When they [the saints] see how great the misery is from which God hath saved them, and how great a difference he hath made between their state and the state of others who were by nature, and perhaps by practice, no more sinful and ill-deserving than they, it will give them more a sense of the wonderfulness of God's grace to them in making them so to differ. The sight of hell-torments will exalt the happiness of the saints forever."

"Where saints and angels, from their blest abode,
Chanting loud hallelujahs to their God,
Look down on sinners in the realm of woe,
And draw fresh pleasures from the scenes below."

The saintly Bunyan gives this delectable picture to terrify and enslave mankind to a belief in this book and its merciful God: "All the devils in hell will be with thee, howling and roaring, screeching and yelling in such a hideous manner, that thou wilt be at thy wit's end, and be ready to run stark mad again from anguish and torment. . . . Here thou must lie, and fry, and scorch, and broil, and burn forever more." While the venerable and saintly Dr. Watts plays upon his golden harp and sings,

"There is a never dying hell,
And never dying pains.
Where children must with demons dwell
In darkness, fire, and chains.
Have faith the same in endless shame,
In all the human race,
For hell is crammed with infants damned
Without a day of grace."

Who then but a skeptic or Infidel would not delight in being an armor-bearer for this book and its merciful author. I am told that this young sprig of divinity in our midst who has so much to say concerning skeptics and Infidels, and their books and tracts, was asked if he believed in hell, and that his answer was, "I don't know, but it is necessary to keep it before the people," yet it seems that he has repeatedly from the pulpit dropped words of comfort to the "flock" and warned them of the hell to shun and the heaven to gain, who not long ago was tried in conference on these not very flattering charges, viz, "Sabbath-breaking, dishonesty in business, including something of the nature of forgery and unchastity," "all of which charges in the minds of the committee were sustained by the testimony." And he was expelled from the church and ministry." So I have been informed by the counsel for the church, in his trial, and yet the world of God falls from his lips from the pulpit, upon the ears of his auditors with holy unction, and not one word of protest do I hear from the members of his church against it. Then,

Who would not a preacher be
And with the Methodists stand
Since they demand such purity,
To lead their tender lambs.

Since conference tolerates such proceeding under their jurisdiction are we to infer that these are the necessary qualifications for a preacher? if not, where is Comstock? I understand the discipline of that church, says page 148, paragraph 242, "After a preacher shall have been regularly tried and expelled, he shall have no privilege of society or sacrament in the church." Is not that ordinance a farce and dead letter, or why is he there? Are we to believe that God called such preachers to keep us out of hell, and lead us into heaven? Has it come to this that skeptics and Infidels must be ostracised unless they believe a religion that will tolerate such proceedings, and that it matters not how vile the heart is if the lips speak well, and we are orthodox! It may be so, but I don't believe it, for if such be thy Gods, Oh Israel, don't reckon me among the worshipers, if you please. If I pretended to be a Christian and could follow no better guide than the most of the followers in his church do, I would almost be induced to give up my humanity as a failure and go out to grass like Nebuchadnezzer. Yours for less hypocritical piety and more virtue,

JAMES S. MEAD.

The Financial Problem.

MR. EDITOR: I see Mr. Hammond and Mr. Jones take exception to my remarks in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not see why they should unless they are too brief for their comprehension. I admit most all they state in their articles. I believe with Mr. Hammond that a "circulating medium should be for the benefit of the laborers," and "represent a certain amount of labor," and I believe too, that the present government is a fraud and a swindle. I say, let the people establish and control the banks, and the demand limit the supply. The reason I stated that the railroads ought to be owned by the government was, that when the people or working men are intelligent enough, they will own all the railroads, all the banks, and compose the government and have everything their own way when they are destitute of everything but good common sense.

I stated that the working men are a majority and that they have the ballot in their hands, and whenever they become intelligent and rational they will send the most enlightened men in their own ranks to Washington to legislate and enact laws for their own good, and not as now, for the good of rascals and cheats. Mr. Hammond says, "The laborers ought to own the railroads who built them." They would, for the laboring men would be the government, as they would compose it, so that it would be a government of the working men. Have I not denounced the present government in my article as a "kennel of rascals, swindlers, and cheats." Mr. Jones does not appear either to understand the drift of my article. Why I stated that money should be based on the government, and managed and controlled by it was, to have a government of honest and intelligent men from the ranks of the working people to represent us in the government, which would put an end to all mammon, all rascals, dead beats, and swindlers.

I say with Mr. Jones, "Just as little governments as possible." And as for a government of "waste or fraud," there would be neither if we were an intelligent people. Why, Mr. Jones, are you opposed to an honest and enlightened government going into the railroad business? You add, "Usury on money is as legitimate as the profits of the merchant." That is true, but the object in my article is to stop all profit-mongery, and let every man live by an honest and legitimate business both in supply and demand.

You aver, "It takes two to make a contract, and if they are satisfied, everbody should be." Men should never be satisfied short of just and honest dealings. It is dishonesty which makes slaves and tyrants. I have said nothing upon the subject of schools, but I must say, there is a site of rottenness in both private and public schools. We have had what is supposed to be "free trade, free government, just laws," and free and just everything but a sensible people, till we are as bad off or worse than the black slaves of the South ever were, and it is ignorance and superstition that is at the bottom of it all. Yes, it is the selfishness and ignorance of every "tub" that is, and has been that is killing us at the present time.

Hoping that my two critics will not misrepresent me again if they should see fit to make another reply,

I am, with all due respect, your well wisher, J. PETTY.

The Piety of Pleasures.

As summer returns to us, more and more indications are given of the fact that most people have forgotten the old puritanic method of spending Sunday and are bent upon getting out of it as much pleasure as possible. Children are no longer brought up in the belief that there is a special and peculiar hell for little girls and boys, and that if they do not go to church and Sunday-school twice on Sunday they will surely wind up with that undesirable locality. On the contrary, there is a growing desire to keep children free from the teachings of mere dogma and to instruct them in the essence of religion instead. During the last ten years Central Park and all the numerous environs of this city have been more and more enjoyed as the Sabbath came around, and though the churches have by no means been deserted, the conviction has strengthened itself, particularly among poor working people, that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath. We think that this feeling will strengthen. It is a healthy one. It perceives in Sunday a day not only for physical and mental rest, but for moral growth indirectly through innocent pleasure and regalement. Sometimes men's souls are refreshed by means of that change of air and scene which the overworked body is capable of enjoying.—Telegram

LAYING THE GHOST.—It is pleasant to perceive that the public are taking very little interest in the reawakening of the Beecher scandal. We were dosed and saturated with that question a few years ago, all the combinations in that disgusting moral kaleidoscope were shown to us over and over again, and the world has at last got offended at the prospect of any new charges being presented. We cannot affirm that never in the history of the world was such wide publicity given to a transaction limited to two individuals, for to do so would imply that we were perfecly familiar with the complete history of all the scandals that have ever agitated the world since humanity appeared upon it; but we can safely claim that never before in the history of the United States has such an unpleasant and immoral savor arisen from the mutual relations of two individuals in private life. Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Tilton, and that insuperable and inexpressive Being to whom we apply the name Deity, alone are cognizant of the quality and whole extent of those relations. The public are, and ever will be, quite in the dark in the matter, and the whole thing will probably be forever relegated to the realm of discussion in which ignorance will hold the principal place.—Telegram.

Reply to Moses.

MR. EDITOR: Is it criminal to be "disappointed" in the real character of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER? And if so, how am I to make adequate atonement without a burnt offering or a vicarious sacrifice that violates my conscience? It seems that the pommeling you gave me for my disappointment did not satisfy the warmer heart of Moses Hull, for no sooner are you exhausted than he takes up the cudgel, and whacks away as though I was "like religion, intended for nothing but to be mended." Well, there is no doubt I need mending badly, and I am deeply grateful to Moses for his generous assistance in the operation, however severe may be the process. He must have had a rather slim opinion of the flagellation you gave me, or he would not have been so eager to help you out. No matter; I get the benefit of two beatings instead of one. I can stand anything that is intended for my good.

He proffers the important information that he has "sat with two of the Fox sisters on nearly a hundred occasions," and therefore is qualified to speak on the subject of spirit rappings. He knows

> "Where truth in person does appear,
> Like words congealed in northern air."

And is sure "the rappings were not produced by the toes." Well now, Moses, will you not be kind enough to tell us how they were made? I feel sure you can, if you will. You know as well as I that imps composed of sublimated ether, or more substantial hydrogen gas, could not produce an audible sound on stoves and other furniture. Neither could the will of man or spirits do the like.

> "How the phantoms give those solid shocks,
> With fists of moonshine, all our logic dishes,
> That sound like thumpings on a rotten box."

Moses, you must be the very man to explain all this, if you will only be so kind as to do it. On the bended knees of my spirit, if I have one, I implore you to do it. Oh, please do, and be assured your welcome solution of the mystery will not be excluded from a truth-seeking paper. Do this, and you may call my talk "a piece of impertinence, seldom witnessed outside of the Vatican," as much as you please. Only do it, and I shall live and die happy.

In hinting that the raps might be made by the medium's toes, I had in mind a work published in 1851, by Herman Burr, in which he exposes the tricks of all the noted mediums to be found at that time in five different States. He smoked out their various methods, and became such an adept in the art of imitating them, as to be able to say, "I can now produce mysterious rappings in seventeen different ways, which tricks I have learned by the detection of so many mediums. . . . Those who have witnessed my exposures of the rappings know that perfect showers of sounds can be produced by the use of the joints." If Moses will consult "Knocks for the Knockings," he will find an overflow of such "counter facts" as he asks me to present. They have inclined me "in the other direction."

Moses very modestly alludes to me as "a man who probably never in his life put himself in a way to get at the truth of the matter." Rather cool that. "Probably!" Yes, probably that is so, for I never sat with the Fox sisters or Katie King a hundred times, therefore what facilities have I had to know anything about it? After reading a number of books and countless essays on both sides of the question, attending numerous lectures and seances, I find myself quite out of "the way of the truth of the matter," if there is any truth in it. Deception, I have witnessed to repletion. That and nothing more. I have often been advised to investigate it, as though I had not done so. But how shall I proceed, if what I have done amounts to nothing? I do not believe I have the kind of sense necessary to begin such an investigation as Spiritualists would have me pursue. The functions of my brain are not adapted to a task so prodigious. When people talk to me about investigating such a subject, they seem to be using a big word without any definite meaning, or they are only trifling with my dull comprehension. Perhaps Moses can tell me exactly how I should start out, and in what way I may learn to get the raps and the key to their interpretation.

Moses mistakes my meaning when he infers that I have indirectly accused you, Mr. Bennett, of trading in spirit manifestations. As "one of the merchants," he must know something of the "healing medium" swindlers to whom I alluded. I might say more on this topic, but forbear.

In speaking of the fourth lecture of Dr. Lawrence, he asserts positively that "it says not one word about Spiritualism." If what it says does not cover the whole ground, then he will not regret seeing it in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which will give its readers a chance to confirm or reject his imposing dictum.

In parting (sadly) with Moses, I am glad I can join him in saying, "Let THE TRUTH SEEKER remain as it is, open to all sides of every question."

Although disappointed on finding the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER a Spiritualist, I am not at all displeased with the discussion of that subject now going on in the paper. On the contrary I am delighted with it, yet with no desire to participate much in such a muss. I did my duty in the matter more than thirty years ago. Such writers as "D. W. C.," Mrs. Slenker, Dr. Rockwell, and others, will, in my opinion be abundantly able to cope with all Spiritualists, living or dead. If they are not, then let the clergy and the mediums continue to ride the public ass.

In conclusion, permit me to observe that the spirits of Bennett are not spirits at all, but corporeal animals, having organized brain, flesh, blood, and bones composed of ethereal gas, diluted moonshine, or something still more thin—too thin to wash in morning dew. Still there is no need for them to go dirty, for there may be plenty of aqueous ether, subtle and nectarious, in which they may bathe and disport themselves.

Now, as they are living material beings they must be subject to the universal law of correlation. How do they live or move in the atmosphere that surrounds our earth? It must be awfully dense and heavy to them. Can they inhale it, or make it vibrate in conversation. It would be as easy for us to live, move, breathe, and talk, while immersed in an ocean of mercury. Are they so small that they can pass through our common air without bumping their heads against a single particle? They are not so represented.

They must consume food to keep up vital power. If they expend force in the motion of their organs, it must be renewed in some way, or they would become exhausted. How can they exercise the functions, of living bodies without finally wearing out? Is not decay as necessary as growth? Rest and food are correlatives of animal motion, death a correlative of life, and when rightly viewed an equal blessing.

What do such gaseous bodies live on? The odor of earth's most delicate flowers would be too coarse and strong for their stomachs. The perfume of roses and violets would be more gross diet to them than raw cabbage or corn fodder to one of our new-born infants. Do they dress in gay attire or go nude? Do they make love, marry, keep house, and have babies? How is it possible for such subtle creatures to manifest themselves to our senses? One of the biggest of them might dance a jig on the raw surface and naked nerves of man or woman, without being felt. How then can their impalpable fluid arms make a perceptible impression on our bull necks?

These unnatural creatures may be very precious to their projectors who "probably" brood over them with parental affection, but, for myself, I have no fancy for a tribe made of such poor, weak, and miserably thin material. If doomed to live forever, I should greatly prefer my present body, old as it is, with a portion of Chester Co., Pa., to stand on, to such fragile attenuated stuff floating about in the abyss of inter-planetary space. I cannot conceive of a greater calamity than to be turned into hydrogen gas, or a more imponderable fluid, and compelled to peak and pine in that shadowy form without the power of committing suicide.

They may be a delightful set to such as have given them birth, but I do not like them, and therefore am not sorry that they do not bear the faintest resemblance or relation to the human family now existing, or that ever did exist on this planet. Bennett gives the living organized brain of man credit for all mental phenomena, and if that be true, it follows that we are utterly destitute of spirits, or souls to be saved or damned, such as Christians believe in. Consequently, his spirits of sublime gas are not our familiar spirits, or the spirits of our departed friends whose office it once was to give them life and intelligence. All that, he attributes to bodily functions, and thereby disconnects the race of mortals from his new-fangled race of immortals. So let them remain as long as each race can get along well enough without the other.

Finally, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not affirm or deny anything touching the existence of Bennett's material ghosts, because I know not what he or nature is capable of producing. I frankly admit that Bennett, Moses, and the universe, can do much. S. STEBBINS, M.D.

Unionville, Chester Co., Penn.

REPLY.—We will take but very little space to reply to Bro. Stebbins' facetious and rather sensible remarks, and leave the task to Moses, whose eyes will doubtless fall upon the foregoing. To us the Doctor seems to have very little respect for any form of matter that is not crude and coarse enough to be seen, handled, weighed and measured, and that possesses the quality of being perishable and short-lived. We may be totally in error as to the theory of a future existence to which we have given our adhesion, but we feel confident that half of the real universe is invisible to our organs of sight, and that with all the unaided ability we possess cannot possibly be discerned with the seeing apparatus we have. We accept much of matter and much of force that neither Dr. Stebbins nor ourself are able to perceive with our limited powers of vision. The microscopic realm, both organized and unorganized, is as wonderful and as real as what we can perceive, and facetiousness will not change the facts. The most potent forces known in the universe are entirely beyond our powers of discernment, and the simple fact that we are unable to see them does not prove their non-existence.

Shakspere probably was not wholly in fault when he put in Hamlet's mouth this remark:

> "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
> Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

We will not undertake to tell our friend whether spirits wear clothes or go naked, whether they eat or go hungry, for we have no knowledge upon the subject; we will leave that for Brother Moses to clear up.—[ED. T. S.]

BRO. BENNETT: Allow me, through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to ask all the Liberal speakers, wherever they address the people, to give notice of the great Freethought gathering to be held at Watkins, Aug. 23, 23, 24, and 25, and invite all to attend.

We desire to make that meeting an "ecumenical council" of the Liberals of America. But to accomplish that, every Liberal must do his and her duty. H. L. GREEN.

P. S. Your offer to furnish THE TRUTH SEEKER three months for fifty cents is very liberal, and every regular subscriber should obtain a list of new names for that period.

WANT of prudence is too frequently the want of virtue; nor is there on earth a more powerful advocate for vice than poverty.—Goldsmith.

Letters from Friends.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., March 25, 1878.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: There seems a gratifying and unmistakable advance in the Liberal cause in Michigan. The Michigan State Association of Spiritualists, which has existed with no very marked exhibition of vitality for some years, closed its annual session here yesterday. The call was addressed to Spiritualists and Liberalists and the title of the organization was changed, so as to include Liberalists as well as Spiritualists. A resolution was adopted tendering and soliciting coöperation with all Liberal organizations, both in and out of the State. In Michigan, the Spiritualists constitute much the larger percentage of the outspoken Liberal element, and with the large number of speakers present, the spiritual philosophy received a due share of attention, but the addresses were generally on popular and reformatory topics, and the platform of the Liberal League was brought prominently to the front. The meeting was a most gratifying success, both in point of numbers, representative character, tone, and harmony of action. A decided organic spirit was manifested, and it seems apparent that the Liberal element is ripe for organization and concentration of its power. Most of the prominent speakers at the meeting were ex-ministers: Rev. S. H. Stewart, of Kindalville, Ind., Dr. J. L. York, formerly of California, present post-office address, Ionia, Mich., and Rev. A. J. Fishback, now settled at Battle Creek, Mich. Mr. J. B. Owen, who also gave a valuable address, was, I believe, formerly a minister, or divinity student. Two or three other ministers were constant auditors and attentive listeners during the four days' session. There is a marked Liberalizing and creed-dropping tendency in the pulpits all over Michigan, while there are a number of ministers in the State who are known to be ready to step entirely out from their outgrown theological sentiments as soon as occasion offers. Dr. A. B. Spinney was re-elected president of the association, and S. B. McCracken, secretary, both of Detroit.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: One year ago last February, I received two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I suppose it was sent by some friend, and it has come weekly ever since. Who ordered it, or whether it was paid for or not I do not know. But this I do know: that it is the most able, spicy, and Liberal paper that I have ever read. Times are hard, and money is scarce, but I love and must have THE TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed find three dollars; please give credit as far as it will go. Yours for the truth, E. D. PHELPS.

FLORENCE, IOWA, May 6, 1878,

BROTHER BENNETT: I was very well pleased to see your editorial "Criminal Misrepresentation," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 4th. Suppose that this petition had not been circulated, still we would have been charged with this same immorality. The Christian world has always assumed that Freethinkers were necessarily vicious, and now all who are attempting to place our social life upon the abiding foundation of natural law, must expect to be assailed by the whole orthodox world as the abettors and promoters of vice and obscenity. Even though we should grant the right of Congress to specify what shall be the moral character of matter which may be permitted to go in the mails, yet, if we shall find, that in the enforcement of this right, the dissemination of useful knowledge upon this most important of all subjects—human physiology—is prevented, then we must devise some other means whereby to prevent really pernicious literature from reaching the hands of our children. Popular "virtue" is directly responsible for the publication and circulation of obscene books and pictures. All that pertains to our sex-nature has been considered as low and disgusting. To have any real knowledge of ourselves, has been, and is to-day, held to be disgraceful. It is almost impossible to conceive of the ignorance which, in consequence of this sentiment, prevails in regard to all which is so intimately and vitally concerned with our health and consequent happiness. Not half of the men and women who enter the marriage relation have the first atom of real knowledge concerning the care and use of these organs upon which depend their future happiness or misery. And this is called "virtue." Is it not the most fruitful soil in which to scatter the seeds of obscenity? And yet, whenever we attempt to lessen this dense mass of ignorance by the circulation of physiological works, we come under the operation of this delectable law. Not only are physiological works interdicted, but the brave words of the advocates of social freedom are seized by the agents of this same law. Let repeal be the word. Yours for natural virtue,

E. C. WALKER.

ROCKFORD, ILL., May 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: I am really surprised, as well as chagrined, at the manner in which some of our Liberal brethren are taking you to task for allowing the subject of Spiritualism a chance to have a hearing in THE TRUTH SEEKER. And the arguments (if they may be called arguments) used by some calling themselves Atheists and Materialists are really amusing. One claims that it ought not to be discussed because it is something new, styling it "the unknown." And yet you, and I, and he ought to know that there are hundreds of thousands of people, both in this and other countries, who are anxious to know something about it. Yes, there is a vast multitude of thinking, reading people who are exceedingly anxious to know whether this earthly existence is all there is of life; whether we are to have a perpetuity of existence, or are to be cut down like the grass and consumed like the stubble; and thousands are ready to exclaim that if this is all there is of life, then it were better that we had never been born, and that the whole plan of human life is a failure. And they are not satisfied with what they find in books and fables of bygone ages, which come claiming to have been written or dictated by some infinite intelligence, and therefore authoritative, telling them what their condition in the future life is to be, but which, at the same time, does not accord with their aspiration after a future life: and consequently they are inquiring after something that more accords with reason and judgment.

Another fault-finder claims that Spiritualism should be tabooed in THE TRUTH SEEKER because, forsooth, the Bible tells about spirits in ancient times, in the days in which it is said to have been written. I would ask, Is a truth any the less true because it is found in the Bible or any other book, either ancient or modern? Like pearls, truth never loses its value.

Until seeing these letters recently in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I had always supposed that all Atheists and Materialists were Liberalists. But I begin to think that I have been mistaken. I have no recollection of an instance where a Spiritualist stopped his paper (though it were avowedly a Spiritualist sheet) simply because some person of any other Liberal belief wished to give his views an airing. No, brother Liberals, let us quit staking off grounds in the arena of knowledge and investigation, and let us give any subject a fair and impartial hearing before we condemn it. For twenty-five years I belonged to an orthodox church, and I was a Pharisee of the Pharisees. For the past eight years I have belonged to a society of Freethinkers, with no other creed or articles of faith than to seek after and continually strive to live a better life. And our doors stand open to all of every creed to come, and also to those who have no creed. The cause of this step into the light was, that our church had a pastor who could no longer be tied down to the old effete theologies of the past, and his teachings led to a split in the church, and the larger portion of the church and congregation went out with him, and, in conjunction with the Unitarians, Universalists, Spiritualists, and other Liberalists of our city, organized a new society on the broad platform of seekers after the truth, ever holding inviolable the rights of opinion, remembering that opinions are not criminal nor virtuous, but that the mode in which they are maintained or combatted may be. And thus far our society has been prosperous, constantly growing in knowledge and increasing in numbers. Occasionally I have had some of my old orthodox friends say to me, "Well, Follet, what will you become next? You have been a Baptist, then a Liberal, and are now a Spiritualist; and what do you expect to be next?" And my reply has almost invariably been, "The very best I can find. I have no desire to stop advancing or relinquish my search after the truth. Show me something better than Spiritualism—as it comes to me, and as I view it, in all its reasonableness, in its accord with natural law and the law of our being, with its elevating and ennobling incentives to strive for a pure, true, and virtuous life, and to ever seek after and choose the fittest and the best—and I will take it and adopt it, and try to live up to its teachings. For such is Spiritualism to me, as it points me on to fields of knowledge awaiting my attainment in the future. And if these teachings are to be driven from the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will say to our Atheistic and Materialistic brethren, who are workers with us in the cause of advancement and the elevation of humanity, Give us something better if you have it, and we will take it, and thank you for it, and work with you for its promulgation. But if you can give us nothing better than a blank annhilation, then, in the name of suffering, struggling humanity, I implore you not to close the door of honest inquiry in our faces, and say, Thus far shalt thou go, and no further. Do not imitate the orthodox by saying, We have got all of the knowledge there is for you, and what we don't know is not worth knowing.

Ever truly yours for the truth, F. F. FOLLET.

LESLIE, MICH., May 6, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It is with great interest that I have watched the progress of THE TRUTH SEEKER from its first entrance into being to the present. Its numerous correspondents of most every shade of talent and mind, subjects so numerous and so profound, even touching every avenue of the human comprehension, which would not have been brought before the people, if D. M. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER had not existed in an organized capacity in earth form. To say the least, both are in time and place much needed, and could not have been dispensed with; and humanity owes them a boon of much praise. Many thanks to you, and to your many and competent correspondents. The subject that interested me most is that of the human structure of body, brain, and mind, on which much confliction of mind is apparent—no doubt in honesty too. Now, without reference to any of your correspondents, either for or against what has been written, let me say my say in this matter at this time: 1. The human body is made up of molecular cells, devised from every species of animated beings below him, either inanimate or animate, and endowed with five functional capabilities of hearing, seeing, tasting, feeling, and smelling, called the outer senses, which constitute the soul or life of the body. (In Greek, Psyche.) 2. The brain or mind machinery is external. These five sensational faculties or functions have also their five counterpart functions, such as life, heat, light, mind, and memory, the inner life, which is derived from a substance called (in Greek) pneuma, translated spirit, breath, wind, air. 3. This substance is the base of all formative things adapted to each species and kind, unchanged in nature or degree of perfection, not at any time transmuted into something else. 4. These monads or germs of life, heat, light, mind, and memory, eternally existing in the substance called pneuma, attract to themselves matter, which forms the protoplastic molecular cells, then the tisues, etc., until the external machinery is complete through which all phenomena is completed. 5. I maintain that life, heat, light, mind, or memory is a substance or thing. But a function or capacity of a substance or thing called pneuma, translated spirit, breath, wind, air, and matter constitutes the machinery through which it acts, known as hearing, seeing, tasting, feeling, and smelling, called the soul of man, not the mind or spirit. Soul is the sensational function of the body, also the sensational part of all material nature. Yours respectfully, a seeker after truth, ELIJAH WOODWORTH.

OAK RIDGE, MO., April 30, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Reading Mr. Stebbins and others upon spirit manifestations, we are reminded of drowning men catching at straws, namely, "Stop my paper! I want no spirit in mine." Send along the paper, however. Dr. Lawrence has made all plain. There can be no spirit. You are inclined to think this life is a rudimentary phase of existence. You do not know this to be so, but are inclined to accept it, and to adopt a theory in keeping with it. You had better wait until you know this before building your theory. Upon Mr. S.'s theory, had the fathers of 1776 waited for the result which followed an effort, when would liberty have come? Had Copernicus and Galileo rested with Bible cosmogony, perhaps Mr. S. would be looking upon the universe to-day like an ox, and priests enthroned upon liberty. Mr. S. and Dr. L. may have satisfied themselves and many others. We are groping in darkness, as well as when spirit-hunting. Those gentlemen have learned Teedism, namely, "That Jesus Christ is Lord God, Creator of heaven and earth," and all the whirligigs of creation. However (Mr. Teed says), it cannot be known except on "faith," till a positive knowledge is acquired of the structure of the physical and spiritual universe. Thence comes evolution and involution, focal points in space, laws of mutation, etc., stars and suns (in which is the central astral point or focus of the physical universe) are related to one another through all the laws and forces that govern their relations, so are all minds in a corresponding manner related through soul, spirit and mental laws and forces to one another, and all minds focalize in a universal focus or central will, not outside and independent of a physical and mental organism, but within humanity. Look sharp, brother Stebbins, or you'll get behind, although you anchor to the "carwheels of Dr. Lawrence." Go forward, brother Bennett, and if you can prove to me by your attendance upon Mrs. Lord's seances, that I live after death, you will be my greatest benefactor and helper. An existence after death, in the shape of "wind" (nothing) having intelligence without a brain, is to physical man nothing. It seems a search after nothing, hard to find, and harder to comprehend, and will be valuable if found. I have lived sixty years (this is my birthday), and from my youth I have not been able to see the Christian's God. M. J. HINES.

LOWELLVILLE, OHIO, May 5, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT. Dear Sir: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER for its ability, and manly independence, and fair play in giving both sides. It is much the best way to cure both Materialists and Spiritualists of their ignorance, bigotry, and intolerance. Unless published in the same paper, but few will see or read both sides, and the many who do not will continue as ignorant and intolerant as ever, thinking that they know all about it. People may read one side of controverted subjects for a lifetime, and still be as ignorant and bigoted and intolerant as Christians. I remember very well when, after reading one side for a quarter of a century, I thought a Materialist quite a dangerous kind of animal to be running around loose in the world; but acquaintance with him, and learning his reasons for his belief, modified my views of the danger very considerably. And those who read your articles in which you give your reasons for your belief in Spiritualism will certainly have some respect for you and others who examine the subject for themselves, and believe as they can from the preponderance of evidence—notwithstanding the contempt of your correspondents who have never investigated and know nothing of the evidence. We have all been taught that human nature is dangerous, and, unless controlled or held in check by our ism, that universal desolation and ruin will be the result; hence the prevalence of intolerance and persecution, and Christendom deluged in blood. The duty of destroying heretics is taught in the thirteenth chapter of Deuteronomy and elsewhere in the so-called Word of God, and millions have been put to death in carrying out that principle. The sentiment is also naturally and necessarily inferable from the dogmas taught as Christianity; and hence the effort to get control of the Government by putting God in the Constitution, and making "His Word" the supreme law of the land.

Intolerance has been taught for ages, and pervades and permeates Christendom, and it is not strange that Liberals should be infected by it, as some of them seem to be; but there is enough for them to do in opposing superstition and priestcraft, which have cursed the world for long ages, without fighting one another about the differences of opinion that may exist among themselves. It is much better unitedly and harmoniously to fight the common enemy of civil and religious freedom now than to wait until God is anchored in the Constitution, and "His Word" upon record as the supreme law. Yes, give us both sides, and let intolerance go home to the Church, where it belongs.

Yours truly, WILLIAM WATSON.

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA, April 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have searched the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER in vain to find any communication from Marshalltown. Perhaps there is no one here brave enough to come out before the world and acknowledge himself that despised thing, an Infidel. True it is that this city is under the control of Superstition and Priestcraft. A few Unitarians are struggling to found a church, but little seems to be done to help along the great cause for which men are laboring so hard in other places. There seems to be but few Freethinkers here and those few are afraid to speak out and give the world their sentiments. As for myself I have neither the talent, means, nor influence to do very much towards liberating mankind, but my heart is in the work, and while I am permitted to dwell in this "sinful world" I shall remain a free man, and am ready to help a fellow-man to obtain the priceless boon. The profession of my sentiments has driven some of my most loved friends from me, thus causing me the keenest sorrow, but the happiness of knowing that my mind is freed from the soul-shrinking creeds of the barbaric past, and that many of the world's greatest and best men are not to be eternally punished when life's journey is over is sweeter than anything I have lost; and rather than give up this I would part with every friend on earth and live the despised of all men. Brother Bennett, you are doing a grand work and may many long years of usefulness be yet in store for you. When life is over and you have gone to rest upon the bosom of our common mother the world will miss one of its bravest and truest friends.

THE TRUTH SEEKER comes laden with choice reading every week. I find therein some articles that I cannot accept as true but I cannot expect and do not wish everybody to believe just as I do. If three-fourths of the paper was composed of matter that I regarded as untrue the other one fourth would amply repay me for all the paper costs, so do not fear that I shall say "stop my paper" for no true Liberal will do that.

THE TRUTH SEEKER and the truth sower—long may it continue to be what it is now—the best and cheapest Liberal paper in America! C. N. MARVIN.

CONCORD, MASS., April 10, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: The following I extract from the Boston Daily Journal of April 8, 1878: "Froude, the historian, is said to have written an article in which he holds that the present state of religious opinion throughout the world is extremely critical; that theologians no longer speak with authority; that those who uphold orthodoxy cannot agree on what ground to defend it; that materialism all over Europe is respectfully listened to when it affirms that the claims of revelation cannot be maintained; and that the existence of God and of a future state, the origin of man, and the nature of conscience, and the distinction between good and evil, are all open questions. He says that no serious consequences at least in England and America, are yet outwardly apparent, and that the entire generation at present alive, may pass away before the inward change shows itself in marked external symptoms; but that it is certain that religious opinion is moving with increasing speed along a track which it will never retrace, and toward issues infinitely momentous." Undoubtedly there are many who knew these things to be true, but dare not noise it abroad. The Church says "Hush!" And so it is pleasant now and then to hear a man like Froude stand forth—like one crying in the wilderness—and bear testimony to the irrepressible truth which again and again crushed to earth will rise again. If you have seen the article of which the Journal gives a synopsis, will you be kind enough to direct me where I shall find it, and greatly oblige, Yours very respectfully, WM. H. DEVENS.

The article in question was published in the two preceding numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.—[ED. T. S.]

A CORRECTION.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 4th occurs an error which theology is likely to snap at as a delicious morsel unless some Freethinker corrects it first. Elmer Woodruff, M.D., in his "Talk with the Evangelists," after citing four quotations to show what Pilate said, sums up thus: "None but Matthew mentions a word about Barnabas [Barabbas] or giving the people their choice between Jesus and any other individual." Unfortunately, this is either a misrepresentation or a gross error, which a perusal of passages cited will show. Theology will, of course, claim the former. It is often alleged that those who try to show that the Bible contradicts itself are garblers; and this looks much like it. Let us not be found guilty of either dense ignorance or willful misrepresentation; our foes will excuse the first, but neither can be safely palliated in such matters. DAMPHOOL.

The error referred to is a misprint. The sentence should read: "None but Matthew mentions a word about Pilate's proffering the people their choice between Jesus and any other individual."—[ED. T. S.]

THEORIES VS. FACTS.

BRO. BENNETT: I have watched with no small degree of interest the rise and progress of THE TRUTH SEEKER, from its inception to the present time, and I find that interest increasing, especially with the last number, of April 27th, in so much that I now feel that you might appropriately change the title of the paper to Truth Finder, a name that I have often thought of publishing a paper under, in order to promulgate just the ideas you present to brother Rockwell, in the number referred to, wherein you say, "We believe that matter and its inherent forces constitute all that is, and without matter there can be no existence, and that men do not yet fully know all the forms and conditions that matter is capable of entering into."

"If spiritualism be a fact it is perfectly independent of all these" (theology and supernaturalism). "It is simply a branch of the great universal economy." I might quote much more, but let the above suffice, for this shows the spirit of your reply, with which I am so deeply in sympathy as far as you go. After after twenty years of investigation and research into the spiritual phenomena, engaging in the meantime in lecturing (as I am now), and expressing the result of my researches through various periodical publications, I have found for myself, as you have, a material basis on which to place my feet. And while I have no language with which to express my thanks to the great spirit of nature for the agitation of Spiritualism, I have found that agitation is all there is to it.

The phenomena occur without doubt, as you saw and heard, and as I have seen and heard, not only in the presence of the little lady, Mrs. Maude E. Lord, but in the presence of at least twenty or thirty other so-called mediums, which I might mention, and more especially through my own mediumship, for I early became a medium myself in my investigations, which I began in 1858. But upon applying the test of reason and common sense, I have found no new power, made no new discoveries; but merely discovered that I always was a medium for an intelligence and force which I am not now, and perhaps never shall be able to grasp, much less explain in words, and that all human being are in the "same life boat," and cannot help it. All manifestations of life is a spiritual manifestation as well as a chemical action, and one is as capable of being scientifically explained as another, provided we know all there is yet to be learned through science. It seems to me that those who object to the eternity of the intelligent life principle in man upon scientific grounds are assuming a great deal in this infantile condition of science, and especially chemical science, about which the wisest heads know but little truly. We can know of it, but may never be able to grasp it as a whole, for it must be infinite.

There is, therefore, this infinite power and intelligence cropping out in the human form of which we can know but little, for it is impossible to know ourselves; but all that we do know can or may be explained upon scientific principles, and the life and intelligence before or after it is incarnated in the human form is no more wonderful or impossible than whilst in the form. Therefore if man would know of spirit of the body, let him acquaint himself with the spirit in the body, then instead of isms and creeds we shall have a universal science in their stead, which alone can bring "peace on earth and good will toward all man."

Truly yours, THOS. COOK.

CLINTON, MASS., April 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The Liberal association of this town wish to add their mite toward the repeal or modification of the Comstock laws, and inclose money order for five dollars, drawn in your name, to be forwarded to those who are working for the same. As a club we are but a mere handful here, and all working for a not over large income, but willing and striving to do all we can to promote the cause; and we look upon this open and public fight, as it may be called, for the repeal of the said laws as one in which great issues are involved to all classes of Liberals, and one which should be helped by every means in their power.

Apart from club business, let me say that THE TRUTH SEEKER has been in a breeze this two or three weeks past. The letters on the different phases of a future, or no future, life present to my mind one very striking fact, namely, that though, like the Christians, they would not burn or persecute bodily those holding opposite views, still, their reasoning and analyzing powers sharpened by use, when directed at all past myths and superstitions, are such that they cut with a depth of satire no other class of people could bring forward. Are Liberals to be like all other bodies which have risen, who when small in numbers have stuck firmly together, but who have turned and divided against themselves when they have become a power? The times demand that there be no jar. "United we stand, divided we fall." Respectfully, J. DOUGANS.

PREJUDICE is a mist, which in our journey through the world often dims the brightest and obscures the best of all the good and glorious objects that meet us on our way.—Shaftesbury.

An Imitation.

Silvia: What is your will?
Proteus: That I may compass yours.
—Two Gentlemen of Verona.

Ay; turn your head away from my accusing look.
I wonder not it hurt you; that you cannot brook
The honest censure of reproving eyes.
You shall not hide behind a feigned surprise.

When last we met I only had a sigh, a word.
I thought them truthful. Eagerly I saw and heard;
Happily I guessed their meaning. Did you late repent
The hours sweet that we, exchanging confidences, spent?

When, sheltered by the trees from prying eyes and summer's heat,
Seeing but you, I lay entranced at your feet;
Thrilled by the touches of that hand capricious
That gave me then a draught of poison, clear, delicious.

All the months since then my veins have been on fire,
Throbbing, by turns, with pleasing hope, despair, desire;
Only my poisoner has an antidote, her love,
All promised, half withheld, this sickness to remove.

I fear 'twas but some wizard's strange and subtle spell
That, briefly, made your eyelids droop, your bosom swell;
True passion counterfeiting so that I, deceived,
To-day find false what then, so fondly, I believed.

You say you are a prisoner; propriety
Has walled you in; your jailer is society;
Vouchsafe me, then, the least assurance
That you are not contented with such durance.

Surely there is some loophole in that jealous wall
Through which you might a token, if you pleased, let fall.
Did love but prompt your woman's wit and woman's will.
Assent; I'll scale the wall, or cheat the warder's skill.

My passion and the world stand facing with drawn swords;
This all-defiant; that with censuring looks and words;
To one I must be loyal, and it is not hard
For such a Heloise to be an Abelard.

Ah, no; no, Heloise; you doubting stand and mute,
Warely balancing between hot love and cold repute;
My love, imperious, bold, doth never hesitate,
Will nothing have of you again but love or hate.

Exposing a Medium.

CHICAGO, May 7.—The Tribune has a special from Keokuk, Iowa, which says: "Three young men from Monmouth, Ill., and one from Chicago have just accomplished a very successful exposé of J. H. Mott, a somewhat famous materialising medium of Memphis, Mo. They spent several days in Memphis, and attended a number of seances at Mott's house. The tests were not satisfactory, and the party began to suspect that Mott was a fraud. One of their number, named J. H. Potter, procured a hollow ring with a small hole in front and a tube on one side, which was connected with a hollow rubber ball, which, having previously filled with an alcholic solution of aniline, was secreted in his hand. On the third evening, feeling confident that he recognized the features of Mott in the spirit's face, he put the squirting-ring on his little finger, and when called to the aperture of the cabinet a friend appeared in whom he recognized Mott. When the curtain parted and the face appeared at the aperture near where Potter's hand rested, he compressed the rubber ball, squirting the aniline solution into the spirit's face. The face was immediately withdrawn. The assistants were called for, and there was commotion inside the cabinet. The party rushed to the door, and in the confusion Mott was heard cursing Potter for squirting something over his face. The door was opened, and the solution was found to be spattered all over Mott's face and clothing. Mott undertook to account for this by saying that the spirit came to him so quickly after the dye was thrown on it that the impression remained upon his [Mott's] face. The friends of the medium afterward held that the aniline must have been thrown directly upon him while sitting in the chair. An investigation showed the dye to be spattered on the arms, cushion, and back of the chair, thus proving that it could not have been squirted while Mott was sitting on the chair. Mott was very much enraged at this bold and successful exposure. He got a shot-gun and threatened to shoot Potter, but was dissuaded from so doing. Mott has been remarkably successful in perpetrating his spirit tricks for three years past, and people have visited him from all parts of the Union."—N. Y. Times.

Good for a Secular Paper.

BOWMANISM VS. DENTONISM.

We sincerely regret that Elder Bowman should have thought proper to answer the statements of scientific facts and theorizing of Prof. Denton in the vein of passionate abuse indicated by a condensed report of his sermon in another column of this paper. We regret it, not because we are smitten with Prof. Denton's ideas, but because passion is the symbol of brute force, rather than of keen, convincing, symmetrical logic, and also because it is unchristian and therefore eminently discourteous and unmanly. Whatever truth may have been contained in Prof. Denton's lectures, they at least possessed the merit of being politely uttered, of being based on what is conceded to be fact by a large part of the scientific world. Elder Bowman's picturing Prof. Denton as a "a ninny," "a man of no education—not even a common English education," as a "Freelover," etc. was entirely gratuitous and ungraceful, and not in accordance with fact. A man who uses the English language in its purest and most refined style, who is conversant with every department of science and literature, who is a complete master of logic, cannot surely be accounted a man of no education. Prof. Denton is certainly a man of high educational attainments, and, as far as we have been able to ascertain, his private life is unblemished. We are not living in an age when it is deemed a crime to differ with your neighbor in religious opinion. Thumbscrews were abandoned some time since; the victim is no longer broken on the wheel; religious proscription is supposed to be too contemptible to exist on this continent. A milder form of logic has been adopted; people have awakened to a realization of the fact that Christ taught gentleness, not bigotry.

There were some other peculiar phases of Elder Bowman's sermon which we will notice briefly. One curious statement was as follows:

"I defy any man, scientific or otherwise, to point out a single instance during the last two hundred years where an earthquake has seriously disturbed or troubled a Christian people."

This is a proposition worthy of an inquisitor of the middle ages. If this be true, 30,000 good Catholics who perished in the earthquake at Lisbon, the capital of Portugal, 1755, were not Christians, and the hosts of Catholics, who have perished by earthquakes in South America during the last century were pitiable heathen. If a postulate of this kind is worth anything P. P. Bliss, the evangelist should have been saved from the horrors of the Ashtabula disaster, churches should never burn or fall, the abiding place of the Christian should be exempt from the dangers of the lightning's shaft and the tornado's blast, kerosene explosions should never occur in Christian families, the grain fields and pastures of Infidels and pagans alone should suffer from the hungry grasshopper, Christian men should never be garroted by the impious in strange cities, and Christian people generally should be saved from the miseries of pauperism, and their lives be a perpetual flow of the milk and honey of prosperity. Unfortunately we do not witness any such miraculous interventions of Divine Providence in behalf of Christians or anybody else at this day, and the world is wofully given over to all kinds of selfishness, speculation, and blood-letting.

Elder Bowman appears to be particularly incensed against the theory of evolution. His antipathy is useless, however. Evolution is a fixed fact, for progress in nature is a fact, and this is what evolution means. Darwinism is not synonymous with evolution. Darwinism is only one theory of evolution among many. Nothing comes into the world full-fledged and perfect. The flower develops from the bud, the animal from the egg, and men are not born into the world with manly strength of body and mind. Everything that meets the eye develops to perfection step by step, and if this is true of such minor atoms of creation as men and beasts, and everything that is visible to us in the world, why is it not reasonable to suppose it to be true of the deeper and hidden processes of nature. The history of politics, religion, science, and philosophy all confirm the theory of evolution. The history of each of these is full of the remains of what was once accepted fact, but is now lost in the drifts of forgetfulness. The history of religion itself is as full of fossils in the shape of discarded creeds and schemes of creation as a geological stratum of the silurian period, "and still there's more to follow." Nothing in creation is immutable, neither in the earth nor in the star-drifts around it. Men will think, and by thinking change their opinions, and when the day returns that men dare not think and dare not express their honest convictions, then such bright lights as the Duke of Alva and his "Council of Blood," and his brutal soldiery will be the master minds, and the world will once more grope in the rottenness and darkness of political and religious tyranny and bigotry.

How to Prepare Ozone.

BY SARA E. CHASE, A. M., M. D

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: You request me to inform your readers how ozone may be generated in a manner to be available for practical use in our homes and so cheap that all may partake of its benefits.

I take it that your readers are posted with regard to the nature of ozone, what it is, the relation it bears to the physical world, and of its wonderful powers as a disinfectant. If they desire any further knowledge upon this portion of my present subject, they will find an exhaustive article from the pen of Dr. E. G. Cook in the April number of the Physiologist, published at No. 56 West Thirty-third street, New York, entitled Ozone, the Great Disinfecting and Sanitary Power of Nature. If the people generally comprehended the value of this agent as a protector of health and a destroyer of disease, no householder would deem it safe or wise to be without some practical method of securing its presence in the house. Many experiments have been tried by scientists to bring this agent within the reach of the people in greater quantities than found in the impure atmosphere of those sections of the country which are densely populated, and especially in the imperfectly-ventilated dwellings in which we live.

Some of these methods have been in a measure successful, but attended with so much expense as to be afforded only by the wealthy. One of the first generators presented to the public could not be afforded for less than $150, thus practically putting it beyond the reach of the masses. I know of no satisfactory way of obtaining ozone in quantities without the use of a generator which will produce the necessary conditions for its evolution.

Phosphorus must be placed in such relation to water as to produce a moist atmosphere to act on the phosphorus. This causes the phosphorus to throw off phosphorous acid and ozone. The phosphorous acid is poisonous and must be prevented from escaping into the atmosphere. It must, therefore, be condensed and allowed to pass back into the water, while the ozone which is more subtle, escapes and permeates the air. The great need, therefore, of a generator is to seperate these two substances, the one destructive and poisonous, and the other health-promoting and life-giving.

As I sit here at my office desk writing, a faint odor of violets pervades the room, scarcely perceptible except by the sense of delicious purity of the atmosphere. Any one who has ever experienced the odor of clean clothes direct from the line on a day when the atmosphere is clear and pure, will understand the precise odor of ozone, and it is the ozone which imparts to the clothes this smell of cleanliness.

The agent which produces this condition of the air in the room is an ozone generator standing yonder on the mantel, a beautifully ornamented piece of furniture, which, while it serves as an ornament, is dispensing life and health to all within the range of its influence. This generator costs the trifling sum of $15.00. It consists of a glass jar twelve inches deep, encased in an ornamental woven wire screen and set about five inches deep into a plated metallic receiver. At the top is a metallic cap, also plated, and containing numerous perforations through which the ozone escapes. Upon removing this cap or cover, we find the top of the jar filled with a cork also perforated, and over this a piece of buckskin through which the ozone must pass in order to escape.

Down through the center of this cork runs a shaft or rod, at the lower end of which is a metal disc somewhat the shape of a churn-dasher; upon this are sockets to hold the phosphorus, and it is so arranged as to be elevated or lowered to bring the edge of the phosphorus just above the surface of the water in the bottom of the jar. The slow combustion of phosphorus from the action of the moist air causes the jar to be filled with a white cloud of phosphorous acid. This is too dense to pass out through the buckskin, so it condenses and drops back into the water, while the ozone, which is colorless and subtle, passes through the buckskin and escapes. The only care required to keep the generator in action is to elevate the shalf containing the phosphorus every day so as to supply the place of what has been consumed, and once in three weeks to renew the phosphorus and the water. The whole expense being not more than one-half a cent daily after the first outlay for the generator. I will ascertain where these generators can now be obtained, and inform any one who may desire said information.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman, OF NEW YORK, AND D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

SPRINGFIELD HYGEIAN HOME.

That others may know more of what we are trying to do, I will simply state that during the three years we have been here nearly 1,000 persons have been successfully treated by us for a great variety of diseases, both acute and chronic, including Fever and Ague, Congestive Chills, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Neuralgia, Female diseases, Insanity, Consumption, Inflammatory Rheumatism, White Swellings, Paralysis, etc. But one death occurred in all that number, and every one benefited or permanently cured where the laws of life were strictly adhered to. With a fair trial, where cure is possible, we may safely promise good health to all. Please state definitely the nature and probable cause of your disease, when contracted, age, amount of drugs taken, etc., and we will give you an honest reply as to the probability of recovery.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact fac simile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is in England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on live issues with a promptitude unequaled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest, cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers.

The following are a few of the contributors: Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, Goldwin Smith, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Lionel A. Tallemache, M. E. Grant Duff, M. P., Hon. Robert Lowe, Leslie Stephen, John Morley (the editor), G. H. Lewes, Alfred R. New, Startling, and Extraordinary Revelations in Religious History, which disclose the Oriental origin of all the doctrines principles, precepts and miracles of the Christian New Testament,

and furnishing a Key for unlocking many of its Sacred Mysteries, besides comprising the History of Sixteen Oriental Crucified Gods.

BY KERSEY GRAVES,

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark.

The Priest in Absolution,

The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.

D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth St., New York.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

BEYOND THE VEIL

Gems of Thought.

BY the streets of "By and By" one arrives at the house of "Never."—Cervantes.

THE more honesty a man has, the less he affects the air of a saint.—Lavater.

HE who knows right principles is not equal to him who loves them.—Confucius.

IT is pride which fills the world with so much harshness and severity. We are as rigorous to offenses as if we had never offended.—Blair.

FROM a common custom of swearing, men easily slide into perjury: therefore, if thou wouldst not be perjured, do not use thyself to swear.—Hierocles.

THE greater a man is in power above others, the more he ought to excel them in virtue. None ought to govern who is not better than the governed.—Publius Syrus.

TO ACKNOWLEDGE our faults when we are blamed is modesty; to discover them to one's friends, in ingenuousness, is confidence; but to preach them to all the world, if one does not take care, is pride.—Confucius.

TO BE always intending to live a new life, but never to find time to set about it; this is as if a man should put off eating and drinking and sleeping from one day and night to another, till he is starved and destroyed.—Tillotson.

IT is an observation, no less just than common, that there is no stronger test of a man's real character than power and authority, exciting, as they do, every passion, and discovering every latent vice.—Plutarch.

SENECA, with two millions out at usury, can afford to chant the praises of poverty, but for our own part, we prefer the fine extravagance of that philosopher who declared that "no man was as rich as all men ought to be."—Whipple.

IT is the great privilege of poverty to be happy unenvied, to be healthy without physic, secure without a guard, and to obtain from the bounty of nature what the great and wealthy are compelled to procure by the help of art.—Johnson.

I WILL tell you where there is power: where the dew lies upon the hills, and the rain has moistened the roots of the various plants; where the sunshine pours steadily; where the brook runs babbling along, there is a beneficent power.—Chapin.

THIS life will not admit of equality; but surely that man who thinks he derives consequence and respect from keeping others at a distance is as base-minded as the coward who shuns the enemy from the fear of an attack.—Goethe.

THERE is a vulgar notion among Christians that there never were any views of morality before the Bible was composed, and that without this book we should have no idea of right and wrong. This notion is gratuitous and presumptuous. Morality existed before the Bible existed, and will exist when the Bible is obsolete.—Youth's Liberal Guide.

EVERY one is forward to complain of the prejudices that mislead other men and parties, as if he were free, and had none of his own. This being objected on all sides, it is agreed that it is a fault and a hindrance to knowledge. What, now, is the cure? No other but this, that every man should let alone others' prejudices and examine his own.—Locke.

ONCE men thought spirit divine and matter diabolic; one Ormuzd, the other Ahriman. Now science and philosophy recognize the parallelism, the approximation, the unity of the two: how each reflects the other as face answers to face in a glass; nay, how the laws of both are one, or how one is the realization. We are learning not to fear truth.—Emerson.

THE man of this age must be matriculated in the university of sciences and tendencies flowing from all past periods. He must not be one who can be surprised and shipwrecked by every bold or subtle word which malignant and acute men may utter in his hearing, but should be taught all skepticisms and unbeliefs and made the destroyer of all card houses and paper walls and the sifter of all opinions by being put face to face from his infancy with realities.—Emerson.

HOWEVER much we may boast of equality, a little common observation will convince us that men are far, very, very far, from being equal. Some are born with vigorous constitutions, strong, powerful physiques, and happy, cheerful, contented dispositions. Others come into the world with barely vitality sufficient to drag themselves around; slender, delicate, feeble, and weak; and, as an inevitable consequence of this, fretful, despondent, and unhappy. Are these last equal to the first. Have they the same facilities for obtaining intelligence, wealth, power, and enjoyment that the more favored ones have? Is the pauper and street gamin born equal to the pampered, petted child of some noble, wealthy house? If a god ruled and governed all, would he suffer such unjust inequality? Could any good parent treat so unfairly the greater portion of his children—and all for no fault of their own? Is not this difference between the favored and the extremely miserable a sure proof that no all-wise father rules and reigns? Is it not manifestly certain that every individual should be born with a full amount of mental and physical vigor and a fair chance for happiness? Let it be our work, my Liberal friends, to do all we can to bring this about, to lift up, elevate, and refine all humanity, so that some day, by a process of natural selection, and through the "survival of the fittest," the feeble, weak, and deformed, mentally and physically, shall be heard of no more among us, but, like "missing links," pass away and become utterly lost forever.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A PRESIDENT is the big fat man who promises to boss the job, and afterwards sub-lets it.

AN indorser is a man who signs a commercial philopœna with a friend, and gets caught.

A BANKRUPT is a man who gives everything to a lawyer so that his creditors will not get it.

COLLATERALS are certain pieces of paper as good as gold, due and payable on the first day of April.

BISHOP CLARK once went to see one of his parishioners, a lady with a prodigious family, which had recently been increased. As he rose to leave, the lady stopped him with: "But you haven't seen my last baby." "No," he quickly replied; "and I never expect to!" Then he fled.

"MR. VAN BUREN," said a defeated client, "is there any client so low and mean, or any case so nasty, that you won't undertake to defend him in it?" "I don't know," said John, stopping to put away another oyster, then bending down and confidently drawling out his reply in the little man's ear, "What have you been doing?"

IN the spring the husband yearneth
For his other suit of clothes,
And he searcheth through the garret,
And he swears and bumps his nose.
In the spring the young wife's fancy
Turneth back in wild despair:
She remembers that she traded
His old clothes for chinaware.

HOME SCENE.—Husband entering, and throwing himself languidly upon the sofa, as he wipes the perspiration from his brow, "O dear business is killing me; I am so tired." Wife, jumping for a pillow: "Lay down there, like a good, dear fellow, and take a little rest." Little four-year-old daughter: "Oh, papa, I fought oo'd be awful tired after I saw oo carrying the new hired girl all 'bout the titchen."

HERE is a Turkish fable: Abdullah went to the residence of Nasereddin to borrow his mule. Nasereddin, who was a ready lender, said that the mule was not at home. At that moment the mule brayed loud enough to wake the echoes. "What did you say, Nasereddin—that your mule was not at home? But I hear him." "Go thy way, false Abdullah," said his neighbor; "you are not a true friend, for you believe the mule and refuse to take my word."

A CLERGYMAN in Scotland who was conducting public worship in the open air had a portion of his notes carried away by the wind. Not perceiving the circumstance, he announced that he would now proceed to the third head or division of his discourse, hastily turned over his notes, remarking two or three times, "Thirdly, my friends; I say, thirdly;" on which an old woman sitting by ejaculated: "Thirdly, sir, is away wi' the wind; it's over the kirk-yard wa', sir."

ANOTHER KIND.—Two Irishmen, lately landed in New York, were boarding at a hotel where they were sorely troubled with mosquitos, and could hardly obtain sleep enough to satisfy nature. "Put yer head under the blankets," said Mike, "and thin they'll not bite yees." Pat did as requested, but scarcely had he found himself free from mosquitos when he was attacked by the bed-bugs that he had failed to notice. "Bad luck to me, Mike," said he; "here's another kind widout wings an' fiddles; but, begorra! they bite as hard as the others."

A SONG OF THE SEASON.

Now is the time when poets rhyme,
And bluebirds gayly sing,
While in the bog the frisky frog
Takes in the "gentle spring."
Now is the time, in this bright clime,
When serenaders sing,
Till pails of slop oft make them stop,
And take a "gentle spring."

—Omaha Republican.

A WOMAN was walking, and a man looked at her and followed her. The woman said, "Why do w me?" He answered, "Because I have fallen in love with you." The woman said, "Why are you in love with me? My sister is much handsomer. She is coming after me; go and make love to her." The man turned back and saw a woman with an ugly face. Being greatly displeased he went again to the other woman and said, "Why did you tell a story?" The woman answered, "Neither do you speak the truth; for if you are in love with me, why did you go after another woman?"

THE following specimen verses are from a twenty-six stanza idyl by an inspired young fellow who has been wrought up by the first bright beam of the spring's warm sun:

"She leaned upon the fence,
And then she hove a sy.
And for his footsteps down the lain
She waited patiently.
And presently he come to view.
And then she yelled a yell;
A heavenly howl of joy she howled.
And her bosom swelled a swell.

—Louisville Courier-Journal.

THE following poem on house-cleaning is also apropos:

The housekeeper giveth a cheerful hop,
And we hear the musical flippety-flop
Of the moisty, misty, maddening mop.

And lo! the maddening horrors rush
Athwart our souls at the soapy gush
Of the slippery, slimy scrubbing-brush.

From early morn till evening gloom
We hear the scratching in hall and room
Of the boisterous, busily-bobbing broom.

And now there cometh a woesome wail—
That augurs a generally gusty gale—
From a man with his leg in the scrubbing-pail.

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 21. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, May 25, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

AN unfortunate result of gospel meetings in Peterboro is the insanity of a respectable working woman.

PROF. COPE, the Philadelphia geologist, writes that he has found in Northern Texas specimens of vertebrates heretofore unknown.

THE Rev. Mr. Oliver said, in the Atlanta Methodist Conference, that revivalists were religious tramps, and more trouble than they were worth. Oliver's head was level one time.

REV. MR. SLATER, who preached against dancing, died last week in a fit. Fanny Elisler, the illustrious ballet dancer, is eighty-four, happy, and in excellent health. The moral is obvious.

THE Rev. Dr. Bartol of Boston went thus far toward defending suicide in a recent sermon: "When life ceases to be a pleasure, and when through long years and months much is endured and nothing enjoyed, should life be maintained? I, for one, would not thank any person to preserve my life under such conditions."

THE Rev. Jesse H. Moore, pastor of a Methodist church in Decatur, Ill., announced from his pulpit that for twenty years he has been preaching doctrines that he did not believe. Mr. Moore has been a Brigadier-General and a member of Congress. Thousands of other clergymen, were they equally honest, would make a similar confession.

A SHREWD old lady said of her minister "he never told a lie in the pulpit." This is different from the experience of the little daughter of a well known Brooklyn dominie. He was once telling a most marvelous story, at which some of his hearers expressed their doubts. The little girl said: "Now, Pop, say, is that really true, or is it only just preaching."

VERY few ministers are now preaching on hell, and the interest on the subject has almost died out. The fashionable subject now is the recognition of friends in the next world. A prominent clergyman propounds with great pleasure the theory that we shall not there be compelled to recognize any who have been very disagreeable to us during our sojourn here.

NEVER in modern times has there been such a period of famine as in the last five years. First in Anatolia (Turkey), then in India, and now in China and Brazil. Tens of thousands have died from sheer starvation. Last month the deaths from this cause in Brazil were reported to be as many as one hundred a day. Governments and individuals have done what they can, but are powerless to deal adequately with the calamity.

SIR W. THOMPSON'S soundings of the Atlantic, by means of the apparatus on board the Challenger, showed that the great ocean has three immense basins, viz., one extending from Ireland to the upper North American coast, with an average depth of 3,000 fathoms, one dividing Europe and Central America with an average depth of 3,000 fathoms; and one running from South Africa to South America with an average depth of 2,500 fathoms.

WIDOW MCLAUGHLIN dying at New York Hospital a martyr to Malthusian practices by the hands of Mrs. Worcester, who, in event of patient's death, may get severely Worcestered. —N. Y. Graphic. The witling who penned the foregoing despicable sneer at the memory of Malthus should borrow a dictionary and learn the difference between Malthusianism and abortion. He will find as much difference between those terms as there is between wit and silliness.

A CELEBRATED preacher said the other day to a graduating class in one of our principal theological seminaries: "Think nothing about filling the pews. Think everything about filling the hearts in the pews." It is on such nonsense as this that our young ministers are vainly expected to grow spiritually fat. How can there be hearts in the pews unless there are people there? What is the good of seeking to preach to empty benches? By some of these men it is considered a sin to crowd a church with interested hearers, and the man who does it is accounted a sensationalist.

A LAWYER promised an Indian a receipt for some money the red man had paid to him, on condition that the Indian would explain the nature or use of one. "S'pose maybe die; go to heben; me find gate locked; 'Postle Peter says 'Wat ye want?' 'Me want to get in.' He say 'You pay dat wampum you owe!' Wat me do? no receipt; hab to hunt all ober hell to find you!" He obtained the receipt.

GRAND CANYON, in Colorado, has perpendicular walls 2,000 feet in height. The face of the rock has narrow shelves, one of which has been enlarged, so as to make a path, by laborers on the railroad that runs through the canyon. A party was going along this dizzy path, when the horse ridden by a woman fell. She clung to the rock, but the horse went out of sight, to be surely killed, as was supposed. On looking down, however, the beast was seen standing on a shelf twenty inches wide, and hugging the wall with all its might. A rescue was effected with ropes.

EDISON'S LAST.—In an interview published in the Washington Star, Mr. Edison describes a marvelous discovery recently made. He says: "Night before last I found out some additional points about the carbon which I use in my carbon telephone. It may be used as a heat measure. It will detect one fifty-thousandth of a degree Fahrenheit. I don't know but what I can make an arrangement by which the heat of the stars will close the circuit at the proper time automatically and correctly. It is a curious idea that the heat of a star millions of miles away should close a circuit on this miserable little earth, but I do not think it is impossible."

AN effort was lately made in New Haven to prevent Col. Robert G. Ingersoll from lecturing in the Opera House on the ground that his discourse might neutralize the recent work of Moody and Sankey. Those Christians don't appear to have much faith in the soundness of their conversions; the converts need coddling to keep Jesus in their hearts. It would really be too bad if God should lose his grip on his new recruits and flee in dismay from New Haven, and perhaps from Connecticut, when the Colonel opened fire on him. Ingersoll undid much of the results of a clergyman's forty-years' labors in Harrisburg, Pa., recently, by a single lecture.

LOUISIANA LOTTERY CASE TO BE HEARD.—The opinion of Attorney-General Devens as to the powers of the Postmaster General in dealing with lottery circulars and letters does not appear to cover some of the most important points involved in the Louisiana State Lottery case recently set forth in these dispatches. Postmaster-General Key says he is undecided as to the instructions that should be given to the postmastere about detaining or refusing to transmit the lottery circulars, tickets, etc., and he has therefore notified the counsel for the citizens of Louisiana and the counsel for the lottery organization that he will hear further argument on the 20th inst.

ANOTHER RELIGIOUS HUMBUG.—We learn from Roses News, Detroit, that a sorrowful case has come to light in which the wife of one Charles R. Ford, formerly a local preacher of very pious pretensions, was deserted by him, and left to starve, after being either purposely or accidentally poisoned. She survived, and the pious deserter went to live with another woman taking two of their five children with him, though he did not confine his lustful attentions to any one female. His wife was a hard-working woman, and he begged or extorted from her who still loved him, the money which went to support other women. The wife is now reduced to poverty, and has been without food for some days.

TWO BROTHERS lived in a village in Jersey. They were twins, and their extraordinary resemblance to each other caused many queer mistakes. The following story is told of them, but we do not vouch for it. An Irishman was offended by one of the brothers, and was a long time watching his opportunity for revenge. The twins were constantly together, and although Pat was pretty well able to manage one, he considered that the whipping of both together was a luxury he could not afford to indulge in. At last, however, he met one of them alone, but was not quite sure that he had the right man. He determined to inquire into the matter. "Is that you?" said he, "or are you only your brother?" The fellow, taking in the situation, answered, "Oh, I'm only my brother." "Then it's well for you it isn't yourself that's in it," said Pat, as he walked off with a clear conscience.

AT THE CHURCH FAIRS.

No more the festive oyster swims
His lonely round in church fair stews;
Yet still the young man's optic dims
At dainties he may not refuse.

The luscious fruits of spring are here;
And savory odors fill the air;
While strawberries and cream appear,
With shortcake, on the bill of fare.

The impecunious youth, distressed
At prices far beyond his means,
His sweetheart eyes with vague unrest.
And suffers pain mid festive scenes.

THE recent conversion of a Japanese, at Springfield, to the popular Christianity of these times, is perhaps the masterpiece of Brother Moody's career. The Japanese show intense eagerness for adopting the manners; customs, appliances, and institutions of Western nations. They accept not only our mechanism, our arts, our system of education, our modes of government, but our very dress, and would fain discard their language for ours. The one thing in our so-called civilization which has seemed to them utterly unworthy of adoption is the modern Christian religion—its doctrines and fruits being apparently repulsive and ridiculous to them. This makes Brother Moody's gaining over of a Japanese an extraordinary achievement.

PARADISE AMONG THE PAGANS.—Japan seems to be a country where men never lose their temper, where women and children are always treated with gentleness, where common laborers bow and beg pardon of each other if they happen to jostle accidentally, where popular sports do not inflict suffering upon the lower animals, where a paper screen is a sufficient protection against all intrusion, even that of burglars, and where cleanliness takes such a high rank among social virtues as to be carried almost to ludicrous excess. Japanese manners are certainly very different from our own; but the Japanese are a thoroughly well-bred people. "Manners are not idle;" urbanity, gentleness, and consideration for others are not mere superficial qualities; when such national characteristics are found combined with courage, energy, and intellect, they may surely be accepted as evidence of an advanced civilization. Foreigners, after living in the interior of Japan for a considerable time, on returning into "civilized society," have even stated that the manners of their own countrymen appear to them vulgar and almost brutal, accustomed as they have become to a courtesy singularly free from servile or mercenary considerations.—Fortnightly Review.

ISAAC EVANS, colored, was hung on Friday 10th inst., at Amite City, La., for the murder of Edward Bowen in July 1877. Evans was then on a drunken spree, but he was a gambler and according to his confession at the gallows, a bad character generally. He remarked, "I do not remember as I received any direct provocation. We were both excursionists that day and strangers. We had some words, which I forget now, and feeling provoked I thought he was after his revolver, when I drew mine from a back pocket and shot him in the eye. I hope to meet my God in Heaven. I have been converted to God. I'm just goin' to slip from this world right into paradise, and rest there to-night. Mr. Bowen, I murdered your son. I'll meet him there this evening. I hope you will meet me there too. I've been wicked, and everything that is bad. God chose this way, to call me off, as he would never have got me any other way. I hope to meet you all in Paradise," and he swung off in that direction. Sinners, come one, come all, right into the arms of Jesus. His loving male "parient" shed the blood of his innocent Son for sinners—why shouldn't sinners shed the blood of other men's sons for Jesus' sake? Amen. Who ever heard of a murderer who, after there was no hope for him in this life, was not going to be jerked right into paradise? O sinners, whom Jesus loveth and died for, why not do whatever you please in this world and also in the next. "Christ's blood" is an antidote to that which crieth from your victims. How he must have loved "Bloody Mary"!

Events of the Week.

THE Paris Exposition is a success.

THE Social Science Association met on Monday in Cincinnati.

SIX hundred lives were lost by a recent earthquake in Venezuela.

RECENT letters from Cuba say that the revolution is still progressing.

EMIGRANTS to the number of 1,100 arrived in this city in one day recently.

THE Pope must spend the summer in the country. His infallible health is bad.

THE black-coated gentry are flocking to England to the Pan-Handlican Conference.

THE war in Europe is being fought on paper yet, but preparations go on incessantly.

AN English war vessel is cruising off the coast of Maine to watch the Russian transport.

VICKSBURG, Miss., has been visited by a severe hailstorm. Many buildings were destroyed.

THE Syndicate has subscribed for $10,000,000 four-and-a-half per cent bonds for August and September.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK thinks truth is obscene when naked. He is going to make it wear dra— but we refrain.

THE Third Auxiliary League of New York has been organized. It is an offshoot of the National Liberal League.

THE revolution in Mexico has failed. Bright-eyed Diaz and bright ideas are at the head of the Government yet.

THE Vosburgh poisoning case is still progressing in Jersey City. So far the evidence is very damaging to the reverend prisoner.

BALD MOUNTAIN, N. C., has had an earthquake. The mountain is split in twain. The Bald Mountaineers are alarmed.

THE dog show in the Hippodrome in this city was as great a success, if not quite as musical, as the Moody and Sankey God show.

THE Virginia Episcopal Convention has denounced dancing. Dancers are consequently shaking—their feet to the sound of the ungodly fiddle.

HEAVY frosts have caused millions of dollars' worth of damage to the fruit growers throughou the country. It was not God this time, it was nature.

LYDIA SHERMAN who caused the death of three people, died recently in the Connecticut State Prison. Anthony Comstock is still alive and at large.

LABOR riots are of frequent occurrence in England among the unemployed. Serious trouble is anticipated. Several mills have been burned already.

ST LOUIS has been visited by a tornado. One hundred houses unroofed, trees, fences, etc., scattered like chaff; several persons injured. Damage $500,000.

THE Canadians on the frontier are alarmed. Squads of strangers are numerous, and it is feared they are Fenians. The troops are preparing for emergencies.

HELL, Hayes, Humanity, Heavenly Horticulture, Hair, Heathenism, Health, and Hyporites, were among the subjects of the harangues of our preachers last Sunday.

THE Socialistic Labor party had a grand parade and picnic in St. Louis, on Sunday the 19th. The procession was half a mile long, and there were ten thousand people at the meeting.

SUNDAY last was a fine day, as the parsons found to their sorrow. Coney Island, Rockaway Beach, and the parks were thronged, but the churches were slimly attended. Sensible people prefer seeing God in nature to hearing stale, second-handed slanders about him from the pulpit.

THE Presbyterian General Assembly at Nashville, Tenn., has passed a resolution that no Church trials for any charge but that of heresy shall be brought up to the Assembly. That one crime is becoming fearfully prevalent among them, and they will have their hands full with that alone.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"Just what I say, Sue. I've lost my religion—lost my belief in Christianity; and in such an odd way. A middle-aged man came here two weeks ago to talk with father, and, as it happened, I was in the little room off the study and heard it all. It is so rarely any one goes into that room that father had no thought of my being there. You know he never likes me to hear any arguments on religion, as he says it unsettles one's faith. The man introduced himself by saying he was Mr. Lusk, and lived on the Bradford place down by the factory. That he had been in Tennesee settling up his father's estate ever since he moved his family here, some three months ago; and so had never made the acquaintance of Mr. Martin. 'But,' said he, 'I hearn you was a good man, so I thought I'd come and see you, and get you to settle a knotty p'int or two for me. I ain't much on larnin', I aint, fur I've had to work fit to kill myself, to keep my little family from starving, but now I've got money that father left, enough to pay for a home, and I'm going to see to the brain part next. That's Mrs. Lusk's way, my wife, sir; her motto is "body fust, and brain next," and it's a pretty good one, too, fur as I kin see. But to come to the p'int. I wuz inter Mr. Scott's a week or two ago, and I picked up a book and read sumthing that sot me ter thinkin'. I jist copied it off, as I didn't like ter tackle Mr. Scott about it, and his bizness is to doctor bodies, and yours to tend to souls. Wal, here is what I read, and I want you to tell me if it's true or no: "The Cushites who inhabited Arabia, India, and western Asia to the Mediterranean, and extensive regions of Africa, were highly-gifted, civilized, and enlightened nations, and though existing fully eight thousand years before Christ, were by no means the first inhabitants of the earth." There now, what do you say ter that? Is it true or no? Was there men who lived so long before Adam as these Cushites are said to have done? If so, I want ter know it. I never studied religion much, but thought it must be true 'cause everybody believed it. But since I cum here I find there is good people that say it's all humbug, leastwise some sez Mr. Darwin's family don't believe the fust word of it. They ain't mean folks, neither, like preachers sez Infiddles is—for Mrs. Darwin is a rale good neighbor, my wife sez, and all the children like her, and them as children likes is always good, yer know. Now, if Adam wasn't the fust man, and Eve wasn't made out of his rib-bone, and Cain and Abel didn't have a religious quarrel over their offerings, and Cain didn't murder his brother in a religious row, I don't want my children to be taught such lies in Sunday-school.'

"Father just sat quietly and patiently till the man was through, and then said, 'My brother, if you take up the question in such a spirit of defiance as this, I fear I can do you little good. The whole Christian world has long ago settled these questions for us. The greatest intellects of the day have pronounced the holy Bible to be God's word, and being his word, it must be true. No matter what seeming evidence there may be against its statements, they must all be false if they cannot be made to coincide with that holy and divine record. I have read of these Cushites; and the ancient ruins and monuments, and the descriptions all seem to prove them to be older than Adam, but we must learn to mistrust our own senses when they go against aught that God himself has revealed to us in his holy word. Even Jesus Christ, mild, gentle, and good as he was, tells us plainly to believe or be damned! There is no alternative for us, so why risk your eternal salvation by prying into things that does not concern you? I know it is the general practice of those belonging to our Church to argue, debate, and reason with all who differ from them in point of belief. We are so sure we are right that we fear not to face even the smartest in the Infidel ranks. But I am growing wise as I grow old. I look back to the years of my early manhood, and I see a great change and a wide departure from the dear and beloved truths taught at that time in our churches. We must keep the first principles and preach these principles just as we did then, if we would retain a full belief in them. Many of our most intelligent preachers have taken up with new notions—evoluted, they say, and become progressive—but alas! they have not evoluted towards salvation or God's truths, and my soul is prophetic of the end. Little by little they let go of the divine guide and trust to worldly wisdom, and when too late they will find themselves stranded on a desert isle.' 'In hell, I suppose you mean parson, but if, as Mr. Darwin thinks, there ain't any hell, what then?' 'It is best to be on the safe side, my brother,' said father solemnly. 'But if a man can't believe, do you think God would put him in a hell for it? if you do, I say I don't think I can love such a God. If my children could not believe me, or believe what I commanded them to, would I put them in the fire? no, sir; I'd jist try and be so true and good that they'd haf ter believe in me. Mr. Darwin tells my wife that if folks want love, honor, and respect, they must arn it, and desarve it, and so I say if God wants to be loved and believed he must make himself known to us, so we can see if he is worth it.'

"'You blaspheme the Most High by such talk, and I must insist that you use no more such irreverent language in my presence,' said my father, severely. 'God has given us all the knowledge we need of him in the Bible, and if you cannot find enough in that sacred Word to convince you, I shall be compelled to see you go to everlasting perdition. Let us pray.' 'Prayin' ain't no use, parson—I never knowed a prayer to be answered yit, and I can't waste no more time now, so good-bye,' and he left the room, while father sighed and commenced writing his next Sunday's discourse, and when he preached it the ensuing Sabbath, I could see Mr. Lusk popping up in it every little while. If father made no impression on him, I saw that he did on father.

"Well, as I said, this was two weeks ago, Sue, and in these fourteen eventful days I have crossed the Rubicon. I went that very afternoon to see Edith, and told her of Mr. Lusk's visit, and of my determination to know for myself what the other side had to say. You see I always refused to read any of the books the Darwin's lent the rest of you, for I did not like to do so against my father's wishes or knowledge, and I had so much else to do, and to read, and to think about, that I was well content as it was. But there are always epochs in life that start us upon new roads, and the events of that fateful afternoon Mr. Lusk came to the parsonage, and so strongly, forcibly, yet simply, expressed his determination to find out the real truth, decided me to go and do likewise. I told Edith all this, and asked her to lend me the 'Age of Reason.' She said as I was not yet twenty-one, she did not feel justified in doing it, as she knew my father would be so opposed to my having it. 'Well,' said I, 'to absolve you from all complicity in the act, I here take forcible possession of it;' and suiting the action to the word I slipped the book into my pocket. Edith laughed, and said I was very presumptuous to help myself in that way to her property. I took it home and read it thoroughly, and with a genuine desire to know the truth; and as all who have done this usually fall in with Paine's views, I found myself no exception. I was convinced that the Bible was a man-made book, and a collection of fables, stories, and old opinions, also of old maxims mixed in with ancient poems and heathen literature. But I did not stop there. I got Myra to go to Mr. Darwin's and get me the best Infidel book they had—you know she isn't as scrupulous about honor and all that as you are—so she went and brought me Taylor's 'Diegesis.' A book few girls would care to read, but I have been father's boy you know, and have read so much on theology that my mind was prepared for a thorough investigation of the whole subject. I had bound Myra to secrecy, and she got the book as if for herself, as I prefer to keep my present opinions a secret as long as I can. Myra is wild and willful, but true as steel, so I do not fear that she will betray any confidence I repose in her. But to my story: I found Taylor a perfect mine of knowledge. He begins at the very root of the whole question of Christianity, traces its foundation and gradual growth step by step, showing it has not a particle of fact or reality about it; he shows that it was created out of pure myth, and built up by one continuous system of fraud, deception, and falsehood. Every ancient author he proves to be a false chronicler, or to have had lies forged and interpolated into his works. He shows that this very religion called Christianity existed ages before Christ was ever heard of, and that divine saviors, too, were known in other nations and countries, and were older than ours, and just as good, holy, and wise. He tells how the Bible was got up, and shows that whole chapters have been added to it—interpolated since by pious zealots—and others altered and changed; he shows that nearly all of the most learned and Christian authors made numerous damaging admissions of a most fatal character concerning the whole subject; and in concluding his discussion of the 'External Evidence,' he says: 'Here is distress, indeed! To pursue the evidences of the Christian religion, after we have seen its incomparably most learned and able advocates thus striking on the shoals of reckless sophistry; after we have driven the strugglers for a grasp on historical fact, to the last trick of gathering together such thousand miles off may-bes' of mere possible allusion, and then showing us the lettered facts of their huge collections as "Volumes of Evidence," would be driving the drift.'"

"Any one who can believe Christianity to be a true system of religion, after reading Rev. Robert Taylor, must have a very pitiable sort of credulity. I confess he has shattered all that was left of my belief, after I had read Paine. I have not given up God or immortality though. I still think there is proof of life to come, and that a good God rules and governs all things."

"There may be," said Sue; "still I begin to be rather shaky about it all. But since I have given up hell and its horrors, I don't worry about the rest. Whatever it may be, I feel that I shall meet my just deserts, and justice is all I ask of God or man."

"I am with you, then, Sue; and now I must run out and get dinner ready, as father will soon be home."

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

NUMBER OF ORGANISMS CONSTANT.

When considering the struggle for life, we started from the fact that the number of germs which all animals and plants produce is infinitely greater than the number of individuals which actually come to life and remain alive for a longer or shorter time. Most organisms produce during life thousands or millions of germs, from each of which, under favorable circumstances, a new individual might arise. In most animals and plants these germs are eggs, that is cells, which for their development require sexual fructification. But among the Protista, the lowest organisms, which are neither animals nor plants, and which propagate themselves only in a non-sexual manner, the germ-cells, or spores, require no fructification. Now, in all cases the number of unsexual, as well as of sexual germs, is out of all proportion to the number of actually living individuals of every species.

Taken as a whole, the number of living animals and plants on our earth remains always about the same. The number of places in the economy of nature is limited, and in most parts of the earth's surface these places are always approximately occupied. Certainly there occur everywhere and in every year fluctuations in the absolute and in the relative number of individuals of all species. However, taken as a whole, these fluctuations are of little importance, and it is broadly the fact that the total number of all individuals remains, on an average, almost constant. There is a constant fluctuation, which depends on the fact that in one year or another one or other series of animals and plants predominates, and that every year the struggle for life somewhat alters their relations.

Every single species of animals and plants would have densely peopled the whole earth's surface in a short time, if it had not had to struggle against a number of enemies and hostile influences. Even Linnæus calculated that if an annual plant only produced two seeds (and there is not one which produces so few), it would have yielded in twenty years a million of individuals. Darwin has calculated of elephants, which of all animals seem the slowest to increase, that in seven hundred and fifty years the descendants of a single pair would amount to nineteen millions of individuals; this is supposing that every elephant, during its period of fertility (from the 30th to the 90th year), produced only three pairs of young ones, and survived itself to its hundredth year. In like manner the increase of the number of human beings—if calculated on the average proportion of births to population, and no hindrances to the natural increase stood in the way—would be such as to double the total in twenty-five years. In every century the total number of men would have increased sixteen-fold; whereas we know that the total number of human beings increases but slowly, and that the increase of population is very different in different countries. While European tribes spread over the whole globe, other tribes or species of men every year draw nearer to their complete extinction. This is the case especially with the redskins of America, and with the copper-colored natives of Australia. Even if these races were to propagate more abundantly than the white Europeans, yet they would sooner or later succumb to the latter in the struggle for life. But of all human individuals, as of all other organisms, by far the majority perish at the earliest period of their lives. Of the immense quantity of germs which every species produce, only very few actually succeed in developing, and of these few it is again only a very small portion which attain to the age in which they can reproduce themselves.

COMPLICATED CONDITIONS.

From the disproportion between the immense excess of organic germs and the small number of chosen individuals which are actually able to continue in existence beside one another, there follows of necessity that universal struggle for life, that constant fight for existence, that perpetual competition for the necessaries of life, of which I gave a sketch in my sixth chapter. It is this struggle for life which brings natural selection into play, which in its turn is made use of by the interaction of the phenomena of Inheritance and Adaptation as a sifting agency, and which thus causes a continual change in all organic forms. In this struggle for acquiring the necessary conditions of existence, those individuals will always overpower their rivals who possess any individual privilege, any advantageous quality, of which their fellow-competitors are destitute. It is true we are able only in the fewest cases (in those animals and plants best known to us) to form an approximate conception of the infinitely complicated interaction of the numerous circumstances, all of which here come into combination. Only think how infinitely varied and complicated are the relations of every single human being to the rest of mankind, and, in general, to the whole of the surrounding outer world. But similar relations prevail also among all animals and plants which live together in one place. All influence one another actively or passively. Every animal and every plant struggles directly with a number of enemies, beasts of prey, parasitic animals, etc. Plants standing together struggle with one another for the space of ground requisite for their roots, for the necessary amount of light, air, moisture, etc. In like manner, animals living together struggle with one another for their food, dwelling-place, etc. In this most active and complicated struggle, any personal superiority, however small, any individual advantage, may possibly decide the issue in favor of the one possessing it. This privileged individual remains the victor in the struggle, and propagates itself, while its fellow-competitors perish before they succeed in propagating themselves. The personal advantage which gave it the victory is transmitted by inheritance to its descendants, and by a further development may become so strongly marked as to cause us to consider the later generations as a new species.

OLD MAIDS AND ROAST BEEF.

The infinitely complicated correlations which exist between the organisms of every district, and which must be looked upon as the real conditions of the struggle for life, are mostly unknown to us, and are very difficult to discover. We have hitherto been able to trace them only to a certain point in individual cases, as in the example given by Darwin of the relations between cats and red clover in England. The red clover (Trifolium pratense), which in England is among the best fodder for cattle, requires the visit of humming-bees in order to attain the formation of seeds. These insects, while sucking the honey from the bottom of the flower, bring the pollen in contact with the stigma, and thus cause the fructification of the flower, which never takes place without it. Darwin has shown by experiments, that red clover which is not visited by humming-bees does not yield a single seed. The number of bees is determined by the number of their enemies, the most destructive of which are the field-mice. The more the field-mice predominate, the less the clover is fructified. The number of field-mice, again, is dependent upon the number of their enemies, principally cats. Hence in the neighborhood of villages and towns, where many cats are kept, there are plenty of bees. A great number of cats, therefore, is evidently of great advantage for the fructification of clover. This example may be followed still further, as has been done by Carl Vogt, if we consider that cattle which feed on red clover are one of the most important foundations of the wealth of England. Englishmen preserve their bodily and mental powers chiefly by making excellent meat—roast beef and beefsteak—their principal food. The English owe the superiority of their brains and minds over those of other nations in a great measure to their excellent meat. But this is clearly indirectly dependent upon the cats, which pursue the mice. We may, with Huxley, even trace the chain of causes to those old maids who cherish and keep cats, and, consequently, are of the greatest importance to the fructification of the clover and to the prosperity of England. From this example we can see that the further it is traced the wider is the circle of action and of correlation. We can with certainty maintain that there exist a great number of such correlations in every plant and in every animal, only we are not always able to point out and survey their concatenation as in the last instance.

Another remarkable example of important correlations is the following, given by Darwin. In Paraguay, there are no wild oxen and horses, as in the neighboring parts of South America, both north and south of Paraguay. This surprising circumstance is explained simply by the fact that in that country a kind of small fly is very frequent, and is in the habit of laying its eggs in the navel of newly-born calves and foals. The newly-born animals die in consequence of this attack, and the small deadly fly is therefore the cause of oxen and horses never becoming wild in that district. Supposing that this fly were destroyed by some insect-eating bird, then these large mammals would grow wild in Paraguay, as well as in the neighboring parts of South America; and as they would eat a quantity of certain species of plants, the whole flora, and, consequently again, the whole fauna of the country would become changed. It is hardly necessary to state, that at the same time the whole economy, and consequently the character, of the human population would alter.

Thus the posperity, nay, even the existence of whole populations can be indirectly determined by a single small animal or vegetable form in itself extremely insignificant. There are small coral islands whose human inhabitants live almost entirely upon the fruit of a species of palm. The fructification of this palm is principally effected by insects, which carry the pollen from the male to the female palm trees. The existence of these useful insects is endangered by insect-eating birds, which in their turn are pursued by birds of prey. The birds of prey, however, often succumb to the attack of a small parasitical mite, which develops itself in millions in their feathers. This small dangerous parasite, again, may be killed by parasitical moulds. Moulds, birds of prey, and insects would in this case favor the prosperity of the palm, and consequently of man; birds, mites, and insect-eating birds would, on the other hand, endanger it.

MEN spend their lives in anticipations, in determining to be vastly happy at some period or other, when they have time. But the present time has one advantage over every other—it is our own. Past opportunities are gone, future are not come. We may lay in a stock of pleasure, as we would lay in a stock of wine; but if we defer the tasting of them too long, we shall find that both are soured by age.—Colton.

Astro-Theology.

BY L. L. DAWSON.

"Now, turning from the wintry signs, the sun
His course exalted through the Ram had run,
And, whirling up the skies, his chariot drove Through Taurus, and the lightsome realms of love,
Where Venus from her orb descends in showers
To glad the ground and paint the field with flowers;
When first the tender blades of grass appear,
And buds, that yet the blast of Eurus fear,
Stand at the door of life, and doubt to clothe the year,
Till gentle heat and soft repeated rains
Make the green blood to dance within their veins;
Then, at their call emboldened, out they come,
And swell the germs, and burst the narrow room;
Broader and broader yet their blooms display,
Salute the welcome sun, and entertain the day.
Then from their breathing souls the sweets repair
To scent the skies, and purge th' unwholesome air;
Joy spreads the heart, and with a general song
Spring issues out, and leads the jolly months along."

—From the "Flower and the Leaf."

The story of Christ in the New Testament is but an allegorical representation of the sun's course through the different zodiacal signs every year. The sun in the Old Testament is God, and in the New Testament is Christ; and an emanation from the sun, as the rays of light and heat, producing breezes and wind, is the Holy Ghost. Thus is the trinity of God explained, of three in one and one in three. Thus is this paradoxical combination, and at the same time separateness, which for ages has been a stumbling-block to so many, easily explained.

I will begin with the sun's position on the 21st of December—St. Thomas' Day, the shortest day of the year—when for three days it appears to remain stationary in regard to the length of days; but on the 24th the sun begins to rise from the depths, and the day begins to lengthen; and on the 25th—Christmas—the sun, or Christ, is born, in the constellation whose name means a stable, in the zodiacal sign of the Goat, which represents the stable and animals, which are mentioned in the allegory of the New Testament as the surroundings of Christ at his birth.

"St. Justin, commonly called Justin the Martyr, one of the earliest of the Christian Fathers, actually draws the parallel that Christ was born on the same day when the sun takes his annual birth in the stable of Angias—that is, in the station of the celestial Goat, where we have seen is actually placed the stable of Angias in the sixth labor of Hercules" (Taylor, Devil's Pulpit, p. 42).

On the eighth day, New Year's—the day of circumcision—he enters the sign Aquarius, which is represented by a man with a jar, from which water issues; this man is St. John in the wilderness (winter is hell, or wilderness, in the allegory), and the water issuing from the urn is the River of Life. In this sign Christ is baptized. The sun, or Christ, passing through the sign Aquarius, enters the sign Pisces, or Fishes, and fasts forty days in the wilderness before entering into his ministry. These forty days represent Lent, which is kept by the Catholic and Episcopal Churches. After passing through the sign of Pisces the sun goes into the sign Aries, the Ram. "The Latin word Aries, the Ram, was derived from the Egyptian word Arery, the Sun" (Taylor, Devil's Pulpit, p. 30). And 1876 years ago, about the time Christ was said to have been born, after passing nearly through the sign, it crossed the equinoctial line, and spring began. With the showers attendant on the sun's crossing the line, and the stronger heat of the sun on account of its greater ascendency in the heavens, and on account of which the days were of greater length, vegetation began to spring up and grow, and seed-time came, giving promise of harvests that would save the people from starvation; hence the sun, on crossing the line in the spring, or vernal equinox, was hailed by the people as the savior of the world, and was called the Lamb of God for the salvation of the world because it was in the sign of the Lamb that vegetation and everything sprang up in newness of life, with the hope of future plenty and happiness, after having passed through long fasting and prayer in the wilderness of winter, when much of the crops and provisions of the past season had been consumed. This zodiacal Lamb was called the head of the Church; and if any one will look at the zodiacal signs in any almanac, it will be seen that the sign Aries represents the head. On account of the sun coming up to the equinoctial line a little earlier each year, the time of the vernal equinox is continually changing. The change in time each year being 54 1-4 seconds, it takes a little more than sixty years to make a difference of one degree; and there being thirty degrees in each sign, it takes a little more than eighteen hundred years to make a difference of one sign. This change in the position of the equinoctial line is called the Precession of the Equinoxes; and according to this precession of the equinoxes the time of the vernal equinox now comes in the sign of Pisces. "The equinox is now somewhat beyond the second degree in the Fishes" (Taylor, Astro-Theological Lectures, p. 273). And, as an illustration, I would call attention to the fact that the season of Lent (or sign of the Fishes) of late years reaches past the time of the equinox, the 21st of March. The apparent inconsistency of the vernal equinox remaining in the sign of the Lamb while the sign Pisces overlaps it is accounted for by the Church having arbitrarily fixed the time in the sign of the Lamb; the zodiacal wheel cannot turn, but each sign as it comes up to the equinox pushes its attendant constellations into the sign preceding it.

According to the precession of the equinox, at the time of the writing of the Apocalypse, where the end of the world is predicted, the equinoctial line would fall below the sign of the Lamb, and at the end would not come down to the sign of the Goat; hence at the Judgment Day the expression of the "sheep at the right hand," i. e., in heaven, above the line, and in the summer months; while the goats remain on the left hand, i. e., in hell, below the line, in the winter months.

The sun after passing the sign of the Lamb comes into the sign Taurus, the Bull; and according to the precession of the equinox in the time of Moses and Aaron, which was about fifteen hundred years before the time of Christ, the vernal equinox was in the sign of Taurus; consequently the Bull stood in the same relation to the Church of that time as the Lamb has to the Church since the time of Christ; which accounts for the making of a golden calf by Aaron for the people to worship; and it was as appropriate for the people of that time as is the worship of the Lamb by the Church since the time of Christ.

Next after the sign of Taurus comes the sign Gemini, the Twins—the little children of whom it may be said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." They were in the time of Christ the second sign above the line in heaven, and by the precession of the equinoxes they were getting higher, and would displace those that stood highest in the kingdom of heaven; which exciting the jealousy of Herod, he ordered that the infant children should be killed.

"Herod is the hero of the skin, the well-known epithet of Hercules, derived from his always being described, sculptured, painted, and distinguished as wearing the skin of the Cleonian lion. King Hercules—that is, the sun, who, in his annual progress through the signs of the zodiac, before he can reach the Lion of July and invest himself with the skin of the Lion, so as to become the Hero of the Skin, is obliged to kill all the children that were in Judea—that is, in Bethlehem and the coasts thereof—which is a definition of the zodiac. In Bethlehem, in which there are two children, Gemini, the twins of May, which this solar Herod is said to kill in our English rendering, but in the Greek to take or put away, or pass through, as the sun passes through the sign of the twins. 'In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children.' Rama is a literal name for the zodiac" (Taylor, Devil's Pulpit, pp. 22, 23).

From the sign Gemini the sun passes into the sign of Cancer, the Crab. The Crab, with the natural position of its claws, projecting out before it, represents the outstretched or everlasting arms of the most high God, promising plenty and rest to the people. The harvest came in this sign, which gave plenty for the following season; and after the harvest came rest from labor.

The sun in the sign Cancer was called the "Most High God" because it at the time of Christ was the highest in heaven, i. e., above the equinoctial line.

The sun, passing through Cancer, comes into the sign Leo, the Lion. In this sign the sun is transformed from the Lamb of God into the Lion of the tribe of Judah. These signs of the zodiac being typical of the twelve tribes of Israel, the sign of the Lamb represented the tribe of Gad, and in the course of time Gad was written God, so the Lamb of Gad became the Lamb of God. So, as the Lion represented the tribe of Judah, the sun became the Lion of the tribe of Judah, because in this sign it gave forth the fiercest heat, as in the time when the twelve tribes of Israel were in existence—i. e., the time of Moses—the sign Leo was the highest sign above the equinoctial line, and was King of Heaven; but in the time of Christ it had begun to descend, and was the Herod that was jealous of the new king that was to come into power, and to prevent which he ordered the slaughter of the infant children.

The next sign after Leo is the sign of Virgo, the Virgin. The Virgin represents Eve in the Old Testament, and the mother of Christ in the New Testament. In both cases the most exalted above all women. She holds about the same position in the ascending scale in the beginning—i. e., as Eve—as she does in the descending scale in the time of Christ, and in either case can be very appropriately called the Queen of Heaven. As the sun, or God, comes up out of the wilderness of winter, when, by the precession of the equinoxes, the equinoctial line enters the sign of the Lamb, the Virgin is overshadowed by the Holy Ghost, and after the period of gestation has passed, or in just nine months, she brings forth her first-born, Christ, on the 25th of December, in the constellation whose name means the stable, in the sign of the Goat.

LIGHT AND THE DETAILS OF SPECTRUM ANALYSIS.

I.

It is light which reveals to us the stars, and therefore it is by its aid that we must commence our study of them.

Spectrum analysis has opened up a new field to astronomy, and laid bare horizons of which no one had ever dreamed. It is wonderful to reflect that a mere ray of light—that is to say, an imperceptible movement communicated to ether in boundless space—is transformed, by the aid of modern science, into a telegram sent from the worlds of the infinite to instruct us, not only as to the nature of the elements which compose them, but as to the motions which hurry them through space, and which we should be unable to ascertain with the most perfect of telescopic instruments. These revelations, exceeding all that the wildest imagination could have conceived, are absolutely stupefying; and as an elementary knowledge of the subject is almost a necessity even for those who do not dabble in science, I may, after giving a few notions about light in general, expose very succinctly the most important points of this procedure, which is enriching astronomy each day with new and brilliant conquests.

Few sciences give rise to so many surprises as that of light, in regard to which two very different hypotheses have been formed—that of emission, to which the name of Newton long lent great authority, and that of undulations, started by Descartes, and now very generally adopted.

The hypothesis of emission supposes a luminous body to propel in different directions a material substance of extreme tenuity, so subtle as to render it impossible to ascertain its weight and solidity; a substance which, passing through certain bodies without any loss of velocity, may yet be brought to a stop by others. When this substance comes in contact with an organ of the vision, part of it makes its way into the interior of the eye, and produces the sensation of sight.

In the hypothesis of undulations, instead of supposing the transport of a material agent to great distances, it is held that the vibrations of luminous bodies are communicated to the atoms of an all-pervading ethereal fluid. These vibrations, propagated through this fluid, reach the organ of vision, which in turn transmits them to the optic nerve. In this hypothesis, the nature and the transmission of light would be analogous to the nature and transmission of sound; light being produced by atomic, and sound by molecular, vibrations.

The most recent experiments of the savants—the researches upon interferences, amongst others—have led to a general acceptance of this latter hypothesis.

II.

It is known that light declines or diminishes in force or intensity in proportion as it recedes from the point whence it emanated. This diminution is in direct ratio to the square of the distance; for instance, if the distances are 1, 2, 3, 4, etc., the quantities of light received at distances 2, 3, 4, etc., will be 4, 9, 16 times, etc., less than at distance 1.

Rœmer, the Danish astronomer, by an observation of the eclipses of Jupiter, succeeded in ascertaining the speed of light. He noticed that it always took 16 minutes and 36 seconds longer to reach the earth when Jupiter was in conjunction with the sun, upon the other side of the ecliptic, than when that planet was upon our side in opposition to the sun. Hence he concluded that light must take that time to traverse the whole diameter of the terrestrial orbit—that is to say, about 182,000,000 miles—and that consequently it must be 8 minutes 13 seconds in coming from the sun.

Until the experiments of M. Fizeau it was never supposed that the speed of light could be arrived at by terrestrial observations; but by an extremely simple procedure he proved that the luminous movement traveled 11 1-4 miles in the 1-1800 of a second. This figure is almost the same as that arrived at in antecedent observations, but a slight want of clearness in the impressions obtained prevents this measurement from being so precise as those taken in the heavens.

M. Foucault tried a new mode of measurement, in 1862, by means of a revolving mirror, and ascertained that light had a velocity of 186,250 miles a second. The procedure alluded to above gives 192,500 miles, so that there is a marked difference in the results.

Many objections have been taken to this latter method. The light had only traversed a space of 37 feet, and in this short distance it had undergone five reflections and pierced an object-glass, which, it was suggested, might have occasioned a diminution of velocity. It was urged, also, that no one can tell what is the totality of phenomena which take place in a reflection, and that, in fact, the result of the experiment did not or might not apply to light in an open space. Nor can one place unlimited reliance upon the extreme micrometrical divisions which it was necessary to make use of.

M. Cornu made some further experiments for the purpose of ascertaining the exact rate at which light travels, the results of which he has recently laid before the French Academy of Sciences.

His mode of observation is in the main similar to that adopted by M. Fizeau, except that he has perfected certain details, and amongst them may be pointed out a means of registering by electricity the speed of the notched wheel, which it is all the more necessary to ascertain, for this wheel is used for making a direct comparison as to the velocity of light. His own point of observation was an attic in the Polytechnic School, and the other point a room in the barracks on Mont Valérien. In this way M. Cornu has obtained sufficient data concerning the velocity of light to enable him to decide between the rate of 192,500 or 193,750 miles, as given in former calculations, and that of 186,250 miles, as established by M. Foucault in his experiments with the revolving mirror.

To quote his own words: "My observations concord with those of M. Foucault, though it is necessary to point out that his experiments required verification, both because their details and the mode of procedure, not having been made public, had not been subjected to discussion, and because the method of the revolving mirror is open to grave objections, into the nature of which I cannot enter at present. M. Fizeau's method is, on the other hand, free from these objections. Astronomers, again, will find in this new valuation of the velocity of light a strong confirmation as to the parallax of the sun 8″.86, which is obtained by combining this number with the constant of aberration. This was ascertained by M. Le Verrier, after three series of observations relative to the movement of the planets, especially of Mars and Venus. So we see that in astronomy it is impossible to overestimate the importance of determining precisely the velocity of light."

III.

When objects are looked at through a glass prism, not only do they appear to have been considerably displaced by the deviation of the luminous streaks which pierce the prism, but also to be covered with bands of the brightest colors.

If a prism be so arranged that a luminous streak shall fall obliquely upon one of its facets, and, as it emerges, be caught upon a screen or a picture, the result will be an oblong figure of a thousand variegated colors, which has received the name of solar spectrum.

The law of reflection and refraction, and the various ways of magnifying objects by means of the lens, were known before Newton's time, but the nature of light and the origin of colors were still a mystery. Without questioning the fact of their being produced in this way, no one had suspected that a ray of white light was composed of a large number of single rays, each of itself capable of imparting a color of its own.

There are seven shades especially noticeable in solar light as decomposed by the prism, which have on this account been termed the principal orders. Taking them in their natural order, they are: red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet.

In explanation of these phenomena, white light is looked upon as composed of an infinity of rays, differing in color, and more or less susceptible of refraction, which separate from each other as they pass through the prism.

The first point noticed in solar radiation is the light which we receive, and the heat which accompanies it; but there is also a third and very important order of phenomena, viz., chemical action. Its influences are not a thing apart, but the varying effects of one single cause, consisting simply of a series of undulations which only differ from each other in regard to their length and the rapidity with which they are produced.

The waves, whose length is comprised between 768 and 369 million fractions of a millimeter (.03987 of an inch), have the power of making our optic nerve vibrate, and thus produce the sensation of light. The diversity of colors depends only upon the length of the waves, the longest being red, and gradually toning off to violet. With the colors extending from the green to the violet, the luminous waves also have the power of separating the molecular groups, and producing chemical effects. These luminous waves extend far beyond the visible spectrum into a region whither the eye cannot penetrate, but they can be recognized by the agency of photogenical preparations. From the green to the red the waves become longer, and possess the property of agitating the molecular groups by a purely physical action, but, in most cases, without decomposing them. These waves also extend beyond the red, and thus form a second part of the spectrum, which is invisible.

We know that sound is produced by molecular, and light by atomic, vibrations, and that the general laws relating to these different kinds of vibrations are the same; but it is worthy of remark that the sound vibrations extend much further than those of light, since the latter, sensible to the eye, do not embrace more than what is known in acoustics as an octave.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. XVII.

VEGETABLE LIFE AND THE COAL PLANT.

My Dear Readers: I will talk to you in this letter a little about how vegetation began upon your planet. When the rocks, forming hills and mountains, were forced up from below the surface of the earth by the forces which were generated there, and, after vast eras of time, they had, by the action of the elements of nature, oxidized, or gradually crumbled and decomposed into the condition of soils, and when the temperature on the surface of the globe had become so reduced that vegetable life was a possibility, nature was so full of the principles and forces necessary for life, and she possessed so much fertility, that she brought forth without apparent effort a great variety of vegetable forms of life with as much ease as green mold now forms on cheese, or any other moist substance, when partially confined. Let those who think it was impossible for nature to produce from her own prolific laboratory the varied forms of animal and vegetable life which the earth has borne explain, if they please, how common mold on bread and cheese is produced; for they must know that this mold, which comes spontaneously on many substances when the conditions are favorable, is really a variety and form of vegetation. When placed under the microscope, its almost invisible parts are seen to be trees, or plants resembling trees, with trunks, branches, and roots, as really as the trees which grow in your forests. It is no more for the forces of nature to produce the mammoth trees in the vast wilderness than to cause the formation of the tiny mold I have mentioned. The large tree, however, requires a far greater period of time, and the nature of the plant is far more permanent and long-lived, retaining life, in some instances, for thousands of years. Some of the mammoth trees growing in California are found to be three thousand years old, and many which have grown out of the earth have lived to be much older than that.

I have already told you that there has been a regular rise in the gradation in the forms of animal life, from the minutest monera up to the elephant and the whale, including the mammoth and megatherium, which have long since passed out of existence. So it has also been with vegetable life. Its first developments were low or crude, and with the passing of eras and epochs an evolution took place from grade to grade, until the varied forms now existing were brought out, as well as thousands and thousands of species that have, during all these ages, passed away.

You cannot fail to perceive from what I have said that both the animal and vegetable kingdoms are arranged upon a scale starting from the simplest organized forms and passing on from stage to stage to the complex or ultimate forms. In this way the genera and species have invariably been produced. The lowest or least-developed types in the two kingdoms were so closely connected, and bore so close a resemblance, as to be distinguished with difficulty. And several of the forms were of such a character as to seem to belong to both kingdoms, having some of the features of the animal kingdom, and some, also, of the vegetable, to the extent that it was difficult, as it is still, to define accurately to which they belong. Many low forms of animal life, like the sponges and rhizopods, although really members of the animal kingdom, bore more the resemblance of vegetables than of the animal.

Vegetation in the form of moss covered the rocks that rose from the water even before soils had been produced to much extent; and, as thin deposits of the moldered rocks gave slight depth to soil, species of crude and coarse vegetation at once sprang up—some of a tough, leathery character. This was what your geologists term the Carboniferous era, after the Devonian rocks had been deposited; and during this period large ferns, coarse reeds, and many similar varieties, almost sprang into life. The warmth and the humidity of the atmosphere were so great, and it was so surcharged with carbonic acid gas—more than ten times the amount of that gas it now contains—that the growth of that rank vegetation was enormous. Many of the ferns grew in the short space of a few weeks to the great size of your largest forest-trees. Could you be shown the rapidity with which those plants grew and made woody fiber, it would astonish you greatly; and as the area of land or soil was prepared for this growth, it was fairly wonderful to see the compact vegetable growth grow up into vast forests of ferns, coal-plants, etc., etc.

This was the period when the vast strata of coal now found in so many parts of your globe were brought into existence. The superabundance of carbon that was diffused in the atmosphere was taken up by the rapid vegetation, which, quickly coming to maturity, soon fell to the earth in great quantities. The immense growth which thus fell to the earth was immediately replaced by other similar growths, which were again replaced by others, until the carbon thus taken up was collected in vast masses of vegetable matter now composing your anthracite and bituminous and cannel coal. These immense strata all over the surface of the globe, within the temperate zones, being a deposit of almost pure carbon, did not readily decompose, but compacted together. As it were, it was often borne away by the waves and deposited in strata, these again to be covered with other strata of clay and sand, which ultimately gradually changed to rock.

Your most learned scientists will tell you the same; that your coal, which now bears so close a resemblance to rock or mineral deposit, was once in the form of growing plants. Just take up a piece of bituminous coal, and if you closely examine it you will perceive what looks like fragments of charcoal, the fibers of the original wood being plainly visible. By grinding down a piece of this coal very thin and examining it through a microscope, the very vessels of the primitive wood may be clearly perceived. If, too, you will take the trouble to examine the mine whence the coal is taken, and on the surface of the shale immediately above the strata of coal, you will find innumerable impressions of leaves and branches, as perfect as your skillful artists would be able to sketch.

It has truly been said that "the most elaborate imitations of living foliage upon the painted ceilings of Italian palaces bear no comparison with the beauteous profusion with which the galleries of these instructive coal mines are overhung. The roof is covered as with a canopy of gorgeous tapestry, enriched with festoons of most graceful foliage, flung in wild, irregular profusion over every portion of the surface. The effect is heightened by the contrast of the coal-black color of these vegetables with the light ground-work of the rock to which they are attached. The spectator feels himself transported, as if by enchantment, into the forests of another world; he beholds trees, of forms and characters now unknown upon the surface of the earth, presented to his senses, almost in the beauty and vigor of their primeval life."

Additional proofs of the vegetable origin of your coal are to be found in the bed, or under-clay that lies immediately beneath it. There you can find the very roots of the original plants still ramifying through the shale, once the soil in which they grew. In many localities every seam of coal is underlaid by this under-clay or fire-clay, in which are to be found an abundant supply of what are called stigmaria-roots penetrating it and running through it. With the impressions of plants in the shale above and the roots below, you have excellent proofs of the vegetable origin of your coal beds.

When you take into consideration that in many places on the globe, the strata of solid coal are thirty feet in thickness, and that it would take some twelve feet of the green vegetable matter to make one of the matured coal, you can form some idea of the immense growth of vegetation required to make the entire structure.

But when conditions were so favorable to an immense vegetable growth, it was inevitable that the growth should take place. The heat of the earth caused the atmosphere to be very warm, the water constantly rose in profuse vapor, descending in very frequent rains, and the great redundancy of that plant-food carbon, all conspired to produce excessive luxuriance. Such a growth has never since been known upon the earth.

I fancy I hear some of you inquiring how it was that those strata of coal come to be so imbedded under an accumulation of clay, sand, and gravel. This was the way it sometimes happened. The crust of the earth was thin and flexible. When repeated crops of the coal plant had fallen, and the accumulations had made considerable weight, it gradually sunk into the earth, and water, and sand, and earth were carried in over it, and another growth of the coal-plant often took place in the same locality, and this was sometimes repeated several times in one place. This accounts for numerous strata being often found in the same location.

You must understand, also, that the land and water very frequently changed places in those times, and this resulted from internal commotion and the thinness and flexibility of the earth's surface just mentioned. When a section of the earth's crust settled below the surface of the water, it often went down hundreds of feet; and the way the mud and clay and water rushed in to fill the vacuum was interesting to witness. In this way what had been high land became a part of the sea or a large lake, and the courses of rivers were thus often changed. Where, also, deep water had prevailed, the earth would be elevated to the dignity of dry land. These changes in the topography of the earth continued for thousands of years, and the surface of your globe was changed times without number. Where high mountains once were are now deep seas, and on what are now the tops of your highest lands are found sea-shells and marine fossils, showing that they once emerged from the bed of the ocean.

To return to the coal-measures: I wish to inform you that after the depression of sections of the earth the strata of coal so submerged were often subjected to intense heat, and this produced a chemical or physical change upon the coal; and the different amount of heat which different localities were thus subjected to goes far to account for the number of varieties of coal that are found in existence today. Hence some is bituminous, some cannel, and some anthracite; the latter having been subjected to the most intense heat. The different varieties of coal-plant, which grew in different localities, had also considerable to do with producing the different varieties of coal.

This subject is extensive, and it would take a long time to exhaust it; but as I am pretty busy to-day I will not detain you longer now. Wishing you a full measure of health and happiness, I still remain your devoted friend,

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

That Petition.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll, Dear Sir: I have just read "Col. Ingersoll and the Petition" in this week's Index. I write to express the hope that you will maintain your ground and stand by the petition. I am one of the sixty or seventy thousand signers, and would sign it again with ten times the determination I felt at first. It is an honest, laudable, and defensible petition to abate a grievous injustice, and its prayer ought to be granted by Congress.

The true ground to take is that the U. S. mail is not the proper instrument to hand over to the Church party, by law, to be used for the suppression of obscenity. There are other and more efficient methods which honest and enterprising parties could adopt successfully. I would be willing to take a contract to suppress real obscenity in book or print or picture, and would bind myself to do it without calling in the aid of the Post Office, or in any way interfering with the U. S. mail. To permit that is sure to result in a practical censorship over perfectly permissible books and journals, and in the oppression of innocent parties whom there will always be Anthony Comstocks to stretch their elastic net over, and draw within their forced definitions of what is obscene. Could no other method of suppression be devised, and were the evil as all-pervading as Comstock represents it, there might be some sense in borrowing the mail of the American people as a tool for the purpose; but neither claim is true, and the use of postal authority for such a purpose should not be allowed.

The law in question is everywhere unpopular, except in the ranks of the cliques engineered by Comstock, Abbot, and Co. I have just returned from a trip West, met many Liberals in many places and the word I heard everywhere was: "Repeal the law." Mrs. Chase, arrested the other day by this last remnant of the ancient ecclesiastical tyranny, was set free yesterday without trial, just as Mr. Bennett was, the charge being held to be untenable and frivolous. The Suppression Agent finds it the hardest possible work to stretch the law and make it effective for the purpose for which he intended it when he passed it through Congress—namely to catch Freethinkers with. It is useful only to the prosecutor for the annoyance of Liberals and to put innocent parties to expense, anxiety, and irritation; and there should be no retreat from the petition to repeal or modify. I hope you and all the signers will stand by it and let Abbot and the pietists rave on. Most sincerely yours,

New York, May 18, 1878. THERON C. LELAND.

The Spiritualists of Central New York

Will hold a two days' meeting and reunion in Deansville, on Saturday and Sunday, June 8th and 9th, 1878. Good speakers will be present. The friends here will do all they can to entertain visitors. A good time is anticipated and a cordial invitation is given to all to come and have a good time with us, and invite your friends. Good board at the hotels at reduced prices.

The Waterloo Meeting.

In addition to the speakers announced last week for the Waterloo meetings to be held June 1st and 2nd, there will probably be in attendance Mrs. Clara Neyman of New York, Mr. Charles Ellis of Boston, and W. S. Bell of New Bedford.

CAPT. H. H. BROWN and M. C. Vandercook are engaged for one month at New Orleans, commencing May 19th. Address them at 254 First street, care Mrs. E. L. Saxon.

B. F. UNDERWOOD spoke at Duluth, Minn., May 19th, 20th, 21st, and will speak at Charles, Minn, 25th, 26th; Nora Springs, Iowa, May 28th to June 2d.

THE publisher of the Battle Axe has issued a large supplement to the May number which will be sent to all applicants free.

THE OBSCENITY STATUTE.—This law is capable of being used, and in fact is used, for the purpose of moral and religious persecution. It ought to be plain enough that while the United States mails are not established for the dissemination of immoral and licentious matter, neither are they to be used as hiding-places for those who seek to become censors of the press or those who would maliciously waylay others. Like all other public agencies, the mails are liable to abuse, even with the closest legitimate watching; but that is not to set up as the pretext for exercising tyranny or for wreaking vengence upon persons who may in one way or another be distasteful to the spies which the law now allows to crawl into the mail-bags.—Boston Post.

Answers to Inquirers.

P. Q.—Who is the author of the "Chronicles of Simon Christianus"? Ans.—It is not known who he is—some person in England.

A. R.—Where is this passage of Scripture to be found: "Conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity"? Ans.—Something of the kind may be found in Psalms li, 5, though it does not read as above.

R. M. C.—Did the month of February ever have five Sundays? Ans.—When in leap-year the month begins on Sunday, it would end also on Sunday, and would contain five Sundays. That, however, would not take place but three or four times in a century.

A FRIEND.—Do not Christians teach "Total Depravity"? Ans. The Calvinists do. That was one of Calvin's celebrated "Five points." Modern Calvinists—Presbyterians and Congregationalists—are getting a trifle ashamed of it, and do not insist upon it as much as formerly.

TWO READERS.—Is real estate at its present low price or U. S. bonds the best investment for persons of moderate means? Ans.—Both are good. Available real estate at reasonable prices is always good security or a good investment, but is not so readily convertible as the U. S. bonds. All things considered we give our preference to the bonds.

W. D. C. H.—Will you tell me how eels propagate? Ans.—Very much as other fish do. The females deposit the ovum in immense numbers over which the male performs his duty, and the fecundated germs are duly incubated or hatched. Some of the larger varieties of eels are said to lay 15,000 ova in one season, but of which a small number only are hatched.

PENSIVE.—What is Mr. Frothingham's idea of Deity? Ans.—We are hardly prepared to answer, not being familiar with his inner views upon that subject. Our impression, however, is that he has no belief in any personal God, whether Indian, Chinese, Egyptian, Grecian, Jewish, or Arabic, but that he accepts the theory that the universe contains all the material and all the forces that have a real existence.

A. B. C.—Why was the surname of Bulwer, the author, changed to E. B. Lytton? Ans.—Bulwer's full name is Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer. In 1844 he succeeded, on the death of his mother, to the Knebworth estates, and, on that occasion, obtained the royal license to take his mother's maiden name, Lytton, for his surname, and became henceforth known as Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton. He had been created baronet in 1835.

W. H. C.—I want to ask you if anybody can write parables equal to those written by Jesus Christ. Ans.—We do not know of anybody specially in the parable business, as that style of imparting moral lessons does not seem to be especially in demand. We are not able to see any peculiar ability in the parables attributed to Jesus, but think that there are thousands of men now alive who could surpass those parables should they give their attention to that style of composition. We are asked to give specimens in these columns; but we beg to be excused for the present, for we never attempted a parable.

W. J. S.—What is the average age of man at the present time, and what was it the furthest back there is any record of? Ans.—Thirty-three years has for a long time been estimated as the average of human life, but it is said to now be on the increase. With the improvements in the line of comfortable dwellings, healthful food and clothing, the tendency is for the average of life to increase, but as an offset to this are arrayed numerous diseases engendered by intemperance, dissipation, and various excesses and exposures. If men would always live as they ought they would have healthier children, and live to a much greater age than they have hitherto done.

H. W. N.—Who is the author of the "Holy Cross Series"? Ans.—They are by different authors. No. 1. "Priest in Absolution," is from an English work. No. 2. "The Mother of Harlots," is from Wm. Hogan's work. No. 3. "Popes and Their Doings," was compiled in this office. No. 4. "Facts about the Jesuits," written in this office but not yet published. No. 5. "The Story of the Crusades," the same." No. 6, and No. 7. "The Atrocities of the Inquisition," and "Horrible Persecutions of the Church," the same. No. 8. "Auricular Confessions and Nunneries," Wm. Hogan. No. 9. "Maria Monk," author unknown. No. 10. "Priestly Celibacy Exposed," Rev. Geo. Townsend Fox. Most of the others, the author unknown.

Emancipation.—Concluded.

BY PROF. FELIX ADLER.

There is a third deterring influence in the path of emancipation; it is a sacrifice of material prospects, which is almost unavoidable. I say there are certain opinions in the world which are deemed orthodox. These opinions are upon every one's lips because they are respectable, and it is difficult to tell who is sincere and who is not. The fear of social ostracism deters men from opposing these opinions when they doubt them, and hence they seem to possess a larger following than they really have. There are many men to-day who no longer accept their old beliefs; but these men shrink away when they hear truths they have long felt to be truths, lest any one should say they gave them their countenance. There are many men of eminent position, lawyers, judges upon the bench, men of influence and power, who are mentally strong, but morally weak; they are afraid to scorn as they should the empty shows which they know to be false. They do not know the saving power of truth; they do not know what a glorious thing it is to stand free and independent, seeming to be nothing but what you are. They deceive themselves if they believe that they have done their whole duty by merely not fighting against them that struggle for liberty. They who struggle for liberty, though a scant minority, demand that those who think with them should act with them also. But these moral cowards, by their tacit consent, throw the whole weight of their authority on the side where their conviction is not. That is the falsehood which hangs about our necks. Who is not for us is against us here. Some will say, if we announce our convictions, we are few and we only will be crushed; but we can do some good by staying where we are. But I say, friends, if only every one did his duty in these matters the leaders of independent movements would not be crushed. What a change would be wrought in affairs! what a change in public opinion would speedily be seen if all those who really sympathize with us would be frank enough to honestly declare their convictions! It is the little drops that make the streams, and the streams make rivers, and the rivers make the sea. It is the drops, therefore, that make the ocean. No one should be excused from declaring his convictions, that all may know. Each one does every act of his life for himself, and if he goes wrong he has gone wrong, as it were, for the first time in the world. You know it is not easy to yield up place and reputation. The world, it is true, will not forgive you if you offend against its prejudices. But if you will take up the fight against falsehood you must consent to the judgment of the world. You must not think too highly of your comfort and prosperity and your happiness, but of your rectitude only. There is a price that must be paid for emancipation, my friends; a price that falls heavy upon everyone, but will fall heaviest of all upon the teachers of religion. I cannot conceive of any position more difficult or embarassing than that in which a teacher of religion finds himself whose opinions have advanced and become materially changed while he is in the exercise of his profession. There are many such to-day in the orthodox churches; and I do not exceed the limits of accuracy when I say there are many. It is not just to class these men as hypocrites. Many of them have undergone wearisome struggles to find a way out of the difficulty. They seek to persuade themselves that they ought to remain where they are and endeavor to conduct their people up to their own level; and then they find that they are so far removed from their level that it is impossible. They have a galling sense of the falsehood they are acting; but perhaps they have families dependent on them, and they feel that they cannot throw them helpless upon the world by an avowal of opinions that are unpopular; and they shrink from the scandal of disavowing opinions to which they are committed and pledged to uphold. What is needed is some means of securing the absolute independence of teachers of religion. The teacher of religion is more sensitive to suspicion than any other. He knows that even the faintest suspicion of interested motives in his teaching tarnishes it. You tell me that the physician also receives his compensation, that the lawyer accepts his fee, that the college professor draws his salary likewise. True, but these professions are not religious beliefs, and there is this essential difference; all those others render a service to humanity with which their convictions are not necessarily connected. They place a part or the whole of their intellect at the service of their fellow-men, the sanctuary of their hearts they keep veiled. But the teacher of religion must be willing to make this sacrifice. His inmost soul he must unbare, nor complain if it is trampled in the mire by the vulgar. He can hardly escape the suspicion that his conviction is fabricated for the occasion, to be paid for with gold. This he must suffer. But, friends, there is no market price for truth. You can reward every other man for the service he renders, but you cannot reward the service of the teacher of religion, any more than you can pay your friend for his friendship. But what shall be done to free teachers of religion from this suspicion of interested motives and to render them at the same time independent? We cannot return to the simple habits of the Hebrew rabbis of old; we cannot be tradesmen or mechanics or laborers during the day in order to devote our nights to study. In the present age and state of science every specialist needs all his energy and all his time if he would barely keep abreast with the time. Day and night are not too much for the study of present problems, and to absorb the immensity of past research. There is a way, however, in which this independence of religious teachers may be effected. It is customary in many seats of learning abroad to appoint fellowships for men who make the pursuit of science the business of their lives. The income derived from them is sufficient to raise the scholars who receive their benefits entirely above want, and allow them to pursue the paths of science, undisturbed by the struggles and cares incident to providing the necessaries of life. But the emoluments derived from these professorships cannot be called a reward for the services of the scholar. These are infinitely too valuable to be estimated in dollars and cents. Why, the chief caterer in an eating-house receives twice or thrice the amount that is paid these men They are looked upon only as a means of keeping while at work, and enabling him to work who finds his reward in the work itself. It is such a system, such customs that I would advocate on behalf of teachers of religion. I do not speak of these exceptionally cordial relations and favorable circumstances of the teacher that prevail in the universities of the old world as being practicable in the beginning of new religious movements. I speak of the Religion of Humanity as it will be some day when placed on a larger and firmer basis. But it is of capital importance that the teacher of religion should be wholly independent of those whom he teaches, so that he may have courage to speak the truth without fear or favor. It is in your interest that teachers of morality should be moral, that teachers of purity should be pure. If their hearts are sincere, they are the salt of the earth, but if the salt hath lost its savor wherewith indeed shall it be salted?

And there is a last great obstacle in the way of emancipation—the fear of losing valuable consolation in times of affliction. It is a forcible objection. If the hope Christianity holds out is an illusion, why dispel it? Why should we crush the pleasing fancy to raise the forbidding outlines of an unwelcome truth in its place? If beyond the night of the grave there be a to-morrow, if you who suffer here shall meet in radiant spheres, if you who part from your friends here, from the wife of your bosom, from the children of your hopes, can feel that these have only gone upon a long journey, and that in the near future you will be reunited in mansions of light, why, that is sufficient for you—that is the whole. If you yourself are stricken by the blight of disease in the very hey-day of your faculties, while life is so sweet and so dear to you, and you have so much to do in life, and you feel yourself suddenly encompassed by the shades of death, and the chill of the tomb gathers around you, and as you think of the near friends who may have suffered before you, if you can stretch out your hands not in vain through the gathering mists to grasp theirs once more, if then you are imbued with a firm belief that they have already reached safely the opposite shore, and that you will be transplanted similarly, that this mortality will then put on immortality—why, then, for you it is all. We have never combated this belief, only asserting that it can not be proven, and that they who try to prove it by the testimony of the books are standing on an insecure foundation. In times of affliction men need a stay and support; they yearn for something which will give that peace and calmness in these times of peril that we read of in the lives of great men. There are some men who are calm in affliction because they put away their cares and troubles, and strive as speedily as possible to forget them; they do not permit the unhappy occurrences to be mentioned in their presence; they plunge into pleasure, and so avoid their cares. But it is not such calmness in affliction that we want, for such calmness is rather the result of indifference. But is it not possible to be calm when these waters of woe pass over us, when the pains of dissolution pierce us, even if we do not hold to the orthodox convictions? Yea, truly it is possible, for such calmness and peace and fortitude we behold in the lives of many great men that illustrate history. How calm was Pericles when crushed by misfortunes, deserted by the Athenians, all his family perishing by the plague to which he at last fell a victim himself, still ordering the affairs of state to the last, counting the least of them important, his own life nothing! How calm was Socrates, when the fatal poison was already working within him, parting from life without a sign of emotion and with words of wisdom still lingering upon his lips! Such calmness in the highest trials has been, and wherever it has been, it was an evidence of the utmost unselfishness. We must veil our sorrows, and make little of our griefs, nor trouble others with our afflictions, we must not pity ourselves so much, nor nurse our sorrows, but look up from our own little lives to those great eternal orbs that work above and around and within us; we must bow to the inevitable and confide in the invisible.

We have seen that the great chiefs of mankind were composed and calm under trial, the great and illustrious men of whom history produces one in a thousand years, but for us lesser men and women, it is possible to attain such calmness only in rare moments. There are two homelier supports for us—Labor and Friendship are their names. If a friend be given us, a true, devoted friend to stand by us in the last hour of anguish, to wipe away the cold sweat from our brow, and offer sympathy and cheer as we sink into the everlasting sleep, it is a grand support, the noblest thing in life.

So must men struggle for intellectual liberty. You must be willing to risk discord in your family, to risk name and place and reputation, and give up all but your own self-consciousness of right if you would buy the highest prize, inward calm and peace.

It is Easter morning to-day. It is the festival of the resurrection; it is the festival of emancipation. Let us remember to-day our emancipators. Let us remember the men who freed us from the yoke of tyranny, those who rose themselves from the spiritual death, and gave us the pledge that we also shall rise with them. Let us remember among the martyrs to intellectual freedom the name of Giordano Bruno, a name that should be a household word with us. He suffered death at the stake in the year 1600, at Rome, because he promulgated the truths of Copernicus, and because he attacked the iniquities of the priesthood. And let us remember, too, among the martyrs to liberty, the name of Jerome of Prague, who has ever seemed to me to be the typical martyr. His life is too little known. He was a man of massive intellect, and great eloquence, who, in the early part of the fifteenth century, boldly entered the fight for the rights of conscience, a century before Luther rose against the usurpations and corruptions of the Church. He was hunted, and pursued, and driven from his home through the great marshes of the Black Forest. They seized him, and placed him in a noxious dungeon by Lake Constance, where, wearied by hardships and weakened by sickness, they forced him to recant the words which he ever held true. I see him now in my mind's eye, as, recovered from his temporary weakness, he stands in the council chamber before his judges, with soul undaunted, and eyes aflame with the spirit of liberty, the words of eloquence pour from his lips. He mentions the great benefactors of his race who have suffered before him, and cries, "If I also shall be condemned like them, alas! I am not the first; alas! I shall not be the last." He speaks words of truth, burning truth, but such truths as the men before him cannot bear to hear, and he has sealed his own doom. The Bishop rises; and in these words addresses this man: "Jerome, I shall smite thee on both cheeks, but do not thou turn an angry countenance against me; but when I smite thee on one cheek, turn thou the other also;" and with words of anathema he curses him. Jerome rises once more in that supreme moment and says, "You had condemned me before you had tried me, because I upheld the rights of man and because I had stigmatized the priests; but in dying, I leave a sting in your minds, a gnawing worm in your consciences." They led him out to the stake; they piled the fagots around him. Silent and beautiful lay Lake Constance, and, beyond, the Alps raised their snowy tops to the skies. Nature is peaceful; only man tortures his brother man. Jerome had been weak and sick; his sensitive nature shrunk from the torture by fire, but his soul stood erect. The smoke wreathes about him, the cruel flames start up, but no cry of pain marks his long protracted agony, and he sinks into ashes with words of pity for his tormentors on his lips. I have mentioned this man, and dwelt a moment upon his end, because it was a glorious end, and because here was a new crucifixion. They speak of Christ and his sufferings; they have spoken of these sufferings for eighteen hundred years; but, friends, I tell you that many have suffered more than Jesus ever did. Many have suffered like Bruno and Jerome because of Jesus, because of the cruel uses to which men put his name and teachings.

When we look back to the past, what is the lesson we see everywhere written? It is sacrifice. Every great step in advance made by humanity was bought by unspeakable pain, was marked by blood. When we take these lessons into our hearts, the great example of these men shall nerve and stimulate us when we bring our offerings, for that we must sacrifice is decreed. To sacrifice for liberty of mind and soul, for the welfare of humanity, that is our glory, that is our religion. That sacrifice will help on the good we believe, and it is our undying hope that the time will come when all these sacrifices shall be over, when every tear shall be dried, when every aching heart shall be healed, when the sun of righteousness shall shine for all mankind, and the knowledge of the true and the good shall fill the earth as the waters cover the sea.

The Labor Question.

The just demands of labor are not communistic or agrarian, but simply for natural rights. Any agrarian law that would limit wealth, obstruct enterprise or the rewards of industry, intelligence, and economy, would do the laboring man more harm than good.

Strikes are a poor remedy for labor. The poor can't starve the rich into measures; the weakest must go to the wall. I believe in "strikes," but it is the kind that strikes for a new country, a new employer or employment. If you are able to be idle, you are able to travel. Competition will, as a rule, keep wages to all, and more than all, capital can afford. The law of supply and demand is the best regulator for wages. Capital as a whole can never combine to regulate wages.

Strikes that destroy property destroy the laboring man's best friend, and create more laborers and lessen capital. The labor question is a political question. Legislation stole our rights from us. By legislation alone can it be returned. Labor must unite and elect legislators in sympathy with their cause. The first demand of labor is a free soil. Man should not own property in land. He should own only improvements and be forced to sell them at what it would cost to duplicate them when he failed to use them. That would check monopoly, and confine it to useful monopoly.

The second demand of labor is free trade. Tariff laws may benefit a minority of the laboring class, but they are oppressive to the masses. The manufacturer is enriched at the expense of the consumer.

The third demand of labor is free money. Every man should have the right of issuing legal tender currency as far as he can secure the public. The right also to issue the tender without the legal. I would place the man that digs potatoes on an equal with the man that digs gold. I would place the land holder on equal terms with the bond-holder.

The fourth demand of labor is free government. No pinning together nations, States, or provinces by the bayonet, but by love and justice alone, or not at all. No religion established by law or religious dogmas, as the Sunday law, fast days, army chaplains, etc.

The fifth demand of labor is equal rights for woman with man. Oh woman! when will justice be done thee? Besides the discrimination against woman in the struggle for life, the monopolies that oppress labor has created so much cheap labor, that manufacturers have driven her from the loom and needle, to the wash-tub, kitchen, and field labor. These are the chief obstacles to a more even distribution of labor and wealth, and are the cause of hard times.

The emigration of the laboring class to a country is detrimental to the interests of the laboring class already there, but is beneficial to those of his class he leaves behind, and perhaps himself as well. And as the labor question is world-wide, and every one should be free to live in any country he chooses; the immigration question should be let severely alone; leaving it to the law of supply and demand, and the "survival of the fittest." Justice demands (and whatever justice demands, labor should too) that public schools, the exemption of Church property from taxation, license laws, tax on whiskey and tobacco, the Sunday law, imprisonment of able-bodied persons at the expense of the State, exemption laws, laws against gambling, etc., should be abolished. That is, no medium ground between prohibition and freedom. I believe in freedom in all things, consistent with the rights of others. Superstition, rum, tobacco, ignorance, disease, etc., oppress many sons and daughters of toil, but these are not subject to legislation, at least, they should not be. They are the social side of the question; men and women will evolute out of them when we have free government, free soil, free trade, free money, and free woman. But the heart sickens at the prospect of reform.

Mr. Macdonald uttered a lamentable truth when he said in substance, that to tell the laboring man to quit worshiping idols (religious, political, social, and financial), and to go to thinking for himself, is to risk being mobbed, and having the mangy cur at the door set upon you. Reform must come through the hearts of philanthropists, and not the head of labor. They are the ones that must set the ball in motion. Mammon and abolitionism set the negroes free by force. John Brown found the negro ignorant of, and indifferent to his cause. The reforms now needed require a greater intellectual effort than abolitionism did. This may sound harsh, but they are my honest convictions. I hope I may be wrong. For > "The man is thought a knave or fool,

> Or bigot plotting crime,
> Who, for advancement of his kind,
> Is wiser than his time.
> For him the hemlock shall distill;
> For him the axe be bared;
> For him the gibbet shall be built;
> For him the stake prebared.
> Him shall the scorn and wrath of men
> Pursue with deadly aim;
> And malice, envy, spite, and lies,
> Shall desecrate his name.
> But truth shall conquer at the last,
> For round and round we run,
> And ever the right comes uppermost,
> And ever is justice done."

Mineral Springs, Ark. O. Jones.

The religion of Jesus Christ, put forth by ignorant men, made the first Christians. In these, our days, the same religion, preached by doctors and savants, make none but Infidels.

To admit that there is a certain conformity between the reason of man and the eternal reason, which is God, and to pretend that God exacts the sacrifice of human reason, is to declare at one and the same time that he will and will not.

Money.

"You are another! Go there yourself! Your mother is homely and she wears false teeth." These are among the arguments used by small boys in settling their disputes. But some people of larger growth in discussing the financial problem occasionally brand those who differ with them in opinion as "hard money devils," "Shylocks," "knaves," "idiots," "rascals," "swindlers," "robbers," and "thieves." What connection there is between a homely woman and the speed of a top, the flight of a kite, or the accuracy of a marble shot, or what influence a "hard money devil," or any other devil, can possibly have upon the science of finance is hard to conjecture.

In my opinion, if the advocates of an exclusively paper currency are right in their premises they can well afford to be at least courteous to their erring opponents. If, however, they are wrong, and their position cannot be maintained by candid arguments, it certainly cannot by vituperative abuse. Such language will never make converts to any cause.

In discussing the money question, like all other problems, we are obliged to assume some starting point, to accept certain axioms or self-evident truths, otherwise all attempt at argument is futile. In geometry we assume that a straight line is the shortest distance between two given points, that two parallel lines will never meeet, etc. Upon a few such axioms all the higher branches of mathematics are based. In order to measure quantities we claim the absolute necessity of some vessel or thing of capacity with which to gauge. Distances cannot be estimated or measured without first establishing a definite unit of length. Weight can only be defined by comparing substances which gravitate. Values come under the same category; the worth of an article can be determined by comparison alone.

To measure a valuable substance with an article possessing neither intrinsic nor prospective value is a self-evident absurdity—one of the first principles of traffic being the instinctive recognition of value in all articles exchanged.

Many economic writers of the present day appear to think that the entire function of money is the extinguishment of debt, but no greater financial fallacy can be imagined. Debts may be discharged by legislative acts alone, by repudiation, or bankruptcy. A government may force its subjects to accept an indefinite paper promise in liquidation of debts already contructed, but no power on earth can compel the people to make future contracts upon such a basis of payment. The financial history of nearly every great nation on the globe presents the strongest evidence of the fact that money must necessarily possess intrinsic worth in order to be the basis of all contracts.

Value for value must be the permanent law of all exchanges. Whenever a government or people drift away from a valuable standard to a fictitious one the masses are deluded, and serious loss, if not ruination to them, must inevitably follow; but the true economist, recognizing the fraudulent character of the new measure is enabled to take advantage of the situation; he accumulates wealth during inflation while the masses financially perish.

Bank-notes, greenbacks, and other paper promises are often mistaken by unthinking people for real money, while in fact they are but the representative. A written order for the delivery of goods, or a printed promise to pay money on demand, whether issued by government, corporate company, or individual, are all of the same nature: the value lies not in the order or promise but in its fulfillment.

Gold, silver, and other precious metals are the product of labor and have intrinsic value independent of their conventional or monetary worth.

Had the late so-called Southern Confederacy measured values with the world's standard, and issued gold or silver coins containing sufficient metal to be intrinsically worth the nominal value of their "graybacks," such coin would be to-day equal to our own money in the bullion market of the world.

Another fallacy which prevails just now to an alarming extent among the masses is the belief that we are now suffering in consequence of a short supply of paper currency. To refute this claim we present herewith the following statistics, carefully compiled from official figures, showing the entire paper currency circulating in the United States, and the amount per capita, covering a period of twenty years prior to the inauguration of our present inflated system:

Year.	Total Paper Currency in circulation in the United States.	Total Population in United States and Territories.	Paper Currency per capita.

* Estimated; bank reports incomplete.

The foregoing statement shows that from the year 1840 to 1860 the demands for paper currency by the people averaged only $5.92 per capita, and at no time did it reach eight dollars. These statistics do not show the entire amount of currency authorized by the different State laws under which the banks were chartered, but the actual amount in circulation. Many of the country banks were legally empowered to issue a much larger sum, had the demands of trade required it; but it will be seen that prior to 1861 such demands never exceeded $200,000,000, except during a short period in 1854 and 1857.

The amount of gold and silver coin in the hands of the people can never be very closely calculated. We can safely estimate it, however, at the present time fully equal to any former period. The balance of trade with foreign nations has been for the last five years largely in our favor, and large quantities of the precious metals have returned to our shores. It is quite propable, therefore, that the specie per capita in the United States to-day is largely in excess of any former period. The entire volume of paper currency authorized and in circulation to-day, including greenbacks, bank notes, and fractional currency, amounts, in round numbers, to $700,000,000—over fifteen dollars per capita. We have, therefore, already, a redundant currency, exceeding the average demands of the people by more than one hundred and fifty per cent.

Should our legislative bodies yield to the pressure of the inflationists, and abandon our present standard of value, issuing an irredeemable paper currency to the extent of their demands, it is an easy matter to foretell the final result, for history repeats itself. In a few short years we should find the entire volume of repudiated currency in the hands of its present advocates and future victims, while comparatively a small number of practical financiers would own all the real wealth of the nation.

Heads, Jaws, Teeth, and Noses.

"Head-hunting," says St. John, "is not so much a religious ceremony among the Pakatans, Borneo, as merely to show their bravery and manliness. When they quarrel, it is a constant phrase, 'How many heads did your father or grandfather get?' If less than his own number, 'Well, then, you have no occasion to be proud.'" The head of an enemy is of inconvenient bulk; and when the journey home is long there arises the question, Cannot proof that an enemy has been killed be given by carrying back a part only? In some places the savage infers that it can, and acts on the inference. This modification and its meaning are well shown in Ashantee, where "the general in command sends to the capital the jaw-bones of the slain enemies;" and where, as Ramseyer further tells us, "a day of rejoicing occured on July 3, when nineteen loads of jaws arrived from the seat of war as trophies of victory." When first found, the Tahitians, too, carried away the jaw-bones of their enemies; and Cook saw fifteen of them fastened up to the end of a house. Similarly of Vate, where "the greater the chief the greater the display of bones," we read that if a slain enemy was "one who spoke ill of the chief, his jaws are hung up in the chief's house as a trophy"—a tacit threat to others who vilified him. A recent account of another Papuan race inhabiting Boigu, on the coast of New Guinea, further illustrates the practice, and also its social effect. Mr. Stone writes: "By nature these people are bloody and warlike among themselves, frequently making raids to the 'Big Land' and returning in triumph with the heads and jaw-bones of their slaughtered victims, the latter becoming the property of the murderer, and the former of him who decapitates the body. The jaw-bone is consequently held as the most valued trophy; and the more a man possesses the greater he becomes in the eyes of his fellow-men." It may be added that, by the Tupis of South America, trophies of an allied kind were worn. In honoring a victorious warrior, "among some tribes they rubbed his pulse with one of the eyes of the dead; and hung the mouth upon his arm like a bracelet." With the display of jaws as trophies, there may be named a kindred use of teeth. America furnishes instances. The Caribs "strung together the teeth of such of their enemies as they had slain in battle, and wore them on their legs and arms." The Tupis, after devouring a captive, preserved "the teeth strung in necklaces." The Moxos women wore "a necklace made of the teeth of enemies killed by their husbands in battle." In the times of the Spanish invaders, the Central Americans made an image, "and in its mouth were inserted teeth taken from the Spaniards whom they had killed." And a passage quoted above specifies teeth as among the trophies worn by the Ashantees. Other parts of the head, easily detached and carried, also serve. Where many enemies are slain, the collected ears yield in small bulk a means of counting; and probably Zengis Khan had this end in view when, in Poland, he "filled nine sacks with the right ears of the slain." Noses, again, are in some cases chosen as easily enumerated trophies. Anciently, by Constantine V., "a plate of noses was accepted as a grateful offering;" and at the present time, the noses they have taken are carried by soldiers to their leaders in Montenegro. That the slain Turks thus deprived of their noses, even to the extent of five hundred on one battle-field, were so treated in retaliation for the decapitations the Turks had been guilty of, is true; but this excuse does not alter the fact "that the Montenegrin chiefs could not be persuaded to give up the practice of paying their clansmen for the number of noses produced."—Herbert Spencer, in Fortnighlly Review.

"Politeness," says Witherspoon, "is real kindness kindly expressed;" an admirable definition, and so brief that all may easily remember it. This is the sum and substance of all true politeness. Put it in practice, and all will be charmed with your manners.—Mrs. Sigourney.

The Index and its Editor.

In the issue of The Index for the 16th appears a labored article, by the editor, of more than three columns, written in the great cause of purifying Liberalism and in misrepresenting the opinions and efforts of men within the Liberal ranks. It is one of a series of labored articles that have emanated from the same distinguished source, and characterized by the same unfair and illiberal spirit, and it seems to demand some notice from this quarter. It contains false statements and untruthful insinuations that should not be allowed to pass unnoticed

In the outset we wish to say in the most emphatic manner that when we entered the field of the publication of Liberal literature we did so with naught but respect and good will towards the editor of The Index. We honored him for the effort he was making for mental liberty, and personal and national rights, not less than for the ability and scholarship he displayed. We only aspired to be a humble coöperator in the good work he was engaged in. Since that time we have appreciated still further the efforts he has made, and we have, in our humble way, seconded his movements. We have not been unconscious of the difference in our abilities and early advantages. We have not expected, in our columns, to equal The Index in scholarship or high-toned culture, nor have we tried in a single instance to impair its influence or its patronage. We have invariably, publicly and privately, when our remarks have been in allusion to The Index and its editor, spoken respectfully, and not unkindly of them.

We have had reason to think that we have not received the same kind of treatment in return. A friend in Pennsylvania, who has been a steady reader of both The Index and THE TRUTH SEEKER, in a letter to us stated the case fairly: "The course of The Index towards you may be divided into three stages: first, it ignored you entirely; next, it barely recognized your existence; and lastly, when it thought it had you at a disadvantage, it aimed to stab you to the heart." To show how truly this impartial friend states the case, it may be remarked that during the first two years of our existence as a Freethought journal The Index scarcely noticed us. We think it did not notice our debut into the theological arena as a monthly in Illinois; we think it did not notice our removal to this city; we think it did not notice our change from a monthly to a semi-monthly, and afterwards to a weekly, and, still subsequently, from an eight-page to a sixteen-page publication. We think it has rarely, if ever, noticed any of the books we have issued and sent it for friendly notice; but we have heard from several sources of slurs, sneers, hints, and shrugs which the editor has on different occasions delivered himself of when our name or our efforts were mentioned. We cared but little for this. We knew that in many respects Mr. Abbot was our superior, and we were content to render our service to the cause of truth in the best manner we were able. But when, in November last, the agent for the Young Men's Christian Association and of the Christian "Society for the Suppression of Vice" arrested us for exercising the right of an American citizen in addressing a prayer, or a letter to Jesus Christ, and publishing a scientific essay upon a fact in natural history, from the pen of A. B. Bradford—a gentleman whose ability is unquestioned and whose purity and morality are above reproach—we felt that the principles of American liberty had been violated; and when the charge of obscenity and indecency was laid at our door, we felt that gross injustice had been done us. When it was the purpose of the agent aforesaid to send us to prison as a vile criminal, we felt that it was an outrage of the grossest character. We perceived that the laws under which we were arrested and unjustly deprived of our liberty and of our property were wrong in toto, and actually subversive of the very principles upon which our government was established. We learned that the law had been rushed through the Forty-second Congress, in its expiring moments, under false representations, and at the earnest solicitation and spur of the vile representative of the Young Men's Christian Association, who was on the ground with his filthy museum of obscene pictures; that it was passed in a disgraceful scene of confusion and uproar, when over two hundred and sixty acts were rushed through in the space of a few hours, and when the wild and half-drunken members scarcely knew the titles, even, of the bills they voted for; and the President signed them, one after another, as they were handed to him by a clerk, without even taking the time to look at them. When, we say, we learned the truth of all this, we instinctively felt that the law was wrong, and that it ought to be repealed. We acted upon this feeling, and sent out, for signatures, over the country many thousand copies of a petition to Congress, showing wherein the law was wrong, and asking for its repeal or modification. We felt that our motive was good and our effort in the right direction. We felt that the principle of American liberty had been attacked in its vital part, and that a united effort should be made to repel the attack. The Liberal element is, unfortunately, still greatly in the minority in our country, and every individual in our ranks was needed in the life and death struggle that had to be made.

Just when this effort was being made on our part, just when the petitions were being sent out for signers, then it was that the editor of The Index "showed his hand" and the dagger it contained. It was at that juncture that he came out with a five-column article showing how highly moral the action of the law had been, how commendable the work of Comstock had proved itself, and how improper it would be to have the law repealed, and, in closing, said emphatically that he would not sign the petition, and advised the Liberals of the country not to sign it. This did, indeed, feel to us like a cruel stab from the source whence we expected friendly coöperation. We keenly felt it to be unfraternal and ungenerous, not to say mean and contemptible.

The advice, of course, prevented many from signing, and it had the direct tendency to throw a wet blanket over the honest, earnest effort of our life. It was far from being such coöperation as we had felt towards Mr. Abbot's specific movement, and this was a question which seemed as vital and important as any one of the nine "Demands of Liberalism," and, for the moment, more urgent than all of them combined.

The course which the editor of The Index has since pursued toward us—as well as towards all who signed the petition—has been still more unfair, unmanly, and despicable. It has aimed to show that we were advocating and defending obscenity and indecency, and that in our efforts in this direction we had committed forgery. The solemn truth is we have not committed forgery, and we are not in favor of obscenity. We may not in all respects be equal to the editor of The Index, but as to the decencies of life and the maintenance of a good moral character, we fancy the record of our past years will not suffer materially in comparison with his, though we will expressly state that we feel far from boasting of any special excellency of character. Of the forgery business we will speak a few words.

When the determination forced itself upon our mind to make an earnest effort for the change of the Comstock laws it seemed desirable to have the effort as general as possible, and as a somewhat wide class of interests and dealers was affected by the laws as they stand, we wished to enlist in the movement booksellers, publishers, druggists, photographers, and artists generally. The plan suggested itself to us to get up an explanatory circular to accompany the petition and to send a copy of the same to each man in the classes indicated. The circular was hastily written, and put in type. To this the names of such dealers in the classes of business, alluded to were appended. We then made it our business to call upon the parties whose names we had thus attached, explained to them the nature of the effort we were making, and asked their co-operation to the extent of allowing their names to remain upon the circular. We left with each a copy of the petition and the circular in prints to which their name were appended. The most of those we conversed with seemed to sympathize with the effort, and thought the laws ought to be repealed or changed. Conspicuous among this number was D. C. Robbins of the drug house of McKesson & Robbins. He expressed in decided terms his condemnation of the law and his firm conviction that it ought to be repealed. He did not forbid the use of his name; he did not order it taken off. A copy, as observed, was left with him, and for ten days he made no objection to his firm name being thus appended, and it was not till Anthony Comstock visited him, and berated him for allowing the use of his name, and talked about suits for libel, that he deemed it necessary to withdraw the signature of his firm. At the time of our visit to him we had every reason to believe that we had his consent to retain his name upon the circular.

We asked no one to sign the circular, but simply to allow us to retain their name as upon the copy shown them. We retained only such as seemed to be in sympathy with our effort, and who made no objection to the use we had made of their names. Those who objected or forbade the use of their names, we took off, as a matter of course. Some of the parties we did intend to see again and have further talk with them upon the subject, but those who have undertaken to get over a large city like this, and to call upon a dozen or two of persons in a limited time, and have a conversation with them, can appreciate the difficulties in the premises. We were greatly hurried, our duties were numerous and pressing, and we did not have time to call again upon all we intended to, but, we will repeat, we retained no name that we did not understand to be in sympathy with what we were doing or any who forbade the use of their names on the circular. Two of the parties were near personal friends whom we knew would be willing we should use their names, and we did not need to see them. One name we used by the authority of another on the list, and who was a near friend and duly received consent.

And here is the whole truth about the crime of forgery we committed, which The Index has twice endeavored to prove us guilty of. The last effort was made in the article under consideration in which it quoted at length from the Christian Union to the effect that of the sixteen names to the petition (it was a circular, and not a petition), that emanated from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, seven had declared that the use of their names was unauthorized, and stigmatized the use of their names as forgeries. Now, that statement is false, and was made by Anthony Comstock. If that man is capable of telling the truth, it is a fact that has yet to be established. It is true that Comstock did call upon many of those whose names were appended to the circular and intimidated them by threats of suits for damages for libel (and his threatening, denouncing, bluster-ing style is not wholly unknown), and charged them with being defenders of obscenity, and that some of them proved weak-kneed and absolutely denied—such is the power of Christian tyranny and intimidation—that they had allowed us the use of their names, when they had positively consented that we might use them.

As an illustration of Mr. Abbot's fairness and honesty, attention is called to one point: He quotes an article from Mr. E. H. Heywood to show, in part, that we drafted the petition to Congress, when he knew we did not draft it. We wrote him several months ago, stating expressly that we did not draft it, and gave the name, we think, of the able Liberal gentleman who did draft it. Can a man be honest who will thus make what he knows to be a false quotation to prove what he knows to be untrue? We certainly are not ashamed to father the petition; we indorse every word of it; but thinking a legal gentleman could perform the task better than ourselves, we gladly accepted the services of Mr. T. B. Wakeman, an able lawyer and a sound Liberal, who, in intelligence, morality, and purity, is second to no man in the United States.

The Index shows its unfairness and dishonesty in condemning the petition for asking for a repeal of the Comstock laws, while it admits that it is itself in favor of a "radical modification." Now the petition asks for a modification just as much as it asks for a repeal, and this Mr. Abbot knows perfectly well; so, if it is more wrong to ask for the repeal of a bad law than for its modification, he utterly fails, in his vindictiveness against the petition and its signers, to make a reasonable case. Besides, if men believe a law to be really bad and unconstitutional, is it criminal to ask for its repeal? Mr. Abbot himself admits that there are features of the law that he does not approve. Then, if it contains objectionable features, where is the great harm of asking for its repeal and replacing it with other enactments if necessary? Is not asking for a radical modification of a law nearly as bad as asking for its repeal? Is there really so much difference between the two as to justify Mr. Abbot in opposing and denouncing those who do not see the matter in precisely the same light he does? If Mr. Abbot thinks it really vile to ask for the repeal or abrogation of any laws which provide for the enforcement of Christian morality, would it not be well for him to at once take out the eighth plank of his platform called "Demands of Liberalism," which peremptorily calls for the "abrogation of all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality"? Ought not a man to be a little consistent, even though he be cultured and very respectable?

Mr. Abbot makes a pitiful exhibit of himself by endeavoring to show that Col. Ingersoll is so weak or careless, or so much of a fool, as not to know what kind of paper he is signing. In so many words, he says, "Col. Ingersoll was quite ignorant of what he was doing when he signed or presented that petition." And, again, "Let it be distinctly and universally understood that Col. Ingersoll was ignorant of the real character of the petition he signed—that he is avowedly and publicly opposed to the main objects it seeks, and that it is a gross libel on his good name to quote him as intentionally in favor of the repeal of the law of 1873." Is it possible that Col. Ingersoll is so much of a ninny as that, and that nobody has been able to discover the fact but the editor of The Index? It strikes us that the discoverer of the ninnyism is by far the greater ninny of the two. If Col. Ingersoll is so imbecile or weak-minded, will not Mr. Abbot make a motion that some guardian be appointed to watch over him and tell him what papers it will be proper for him to attach his name to, and what not? Will not Mr. Abbot be kind enough to be that guardian? How convenient it would be for the Colonel to have Mr. Abbot always with him to explain to him the vile meaning of certain disreputable documents, and which papers it would be safe and respectable for him to sign! By the quotation from the Rev. Mr. Eldridge, which Mr. Abbot likes so well as to prompt him to quote it a second time, Col. Ingersoll is represented as a knave for heading the list of names on the petition. May we ask Mr. Abbot which he honestly most considers Col. Ingersoll, a fool or a knave?

The unfairest, cruelest, and meanest trait that we observe in all Mr. Abbot's line of attack is his persistent effort to make out that the man who drafted that petition, all who signed it, Col. Ingersoll, and all who defend it, are in favor of obscenity and are doing all they can to befriend it. No more false or villainous charge or insinuation was ever made, and we take the occasion here to remark that no high-minded, honorable, truthful man will make such a charge. There is no warrant for it; no reason nor honor in such a course. The gentleman who drew up that petition is just as pure a man as Mr. Abbot himself. There is not a word in it that apologizes for impurity or obscenity; there is not a clause in it that asks that obscenity be favored. So far as we know, there is not a person that signed the petition who wishes to see obscene books and pictures published or sent broadcast over the country, whether by mail, express, or other modes of conveyance. In view of the fact that a greater stigma applies to the crime of obscenity than almost any other known offense, it is extremely wrong in any person to charge or insinuate that another person is guilty of that disgraceful thing. Before Mr. Abbot even insinuates that Col. Ingersoll, or the gentleman who drew up the petition, or any one of the sixty thousand who signed it, or, last and least, the humble individual who sent it to Washington, is guilty of obscenity, or have ever expressed any fondness for it, any fellowship with it, or any disposition to aid and abet it in any way, he should be able to show that something of the kind is true. We deny that anything of the kind is true, and hereby submit it to any candid person whether it is honorable to try to besmirch with the foul charge of obscenity any person, however humble, who is not guilty of it. Inasmuch as a word of calumny or a breath of innuendo is enough to damage the character of the most virtuous female, so it is with the charge of obscenity as applied to members of either sex. The greatest caution should be exercised that no innocent person is falsely accused and that no false insinuation or innuendo is made against them. When the charge is made that the petition and its signers are in favor of obscenity, indecency, or immorality in any form, we stigmatize it as a base falsehood, and we hope it will not be made again. It is enough for any persons to bear the faults of which they are guilty without offenses being laid to their charge of which they are entirely innocent. We insist that it is time the insinuation of obscenity should no longer be made against those who happen to not approve of the villainous, unconstitutional Comstock-laws and are honest in the conviction that the same should be repealed.

It is perhaps very fitting that The Index should defend those laws, and champion the valorous man who instigated them, and who has caused nearly three hundred persons to be arrested under them, mostly under the charge of obscenity. It is its province to defend arbitrary and unconstitutional laws if it wishes to, as it has the right to be on the side of the capitalist, the monopolist, and the oppressor of the poor. We think we know where the wrongs that have been committed under those laws were of the most damnable character—where the innocent have been arrested and torn from their families upon the most offensive charge known, and forced, in order to preserve their liberty, to hold unequal contest with the Government of the United States, only to be defeated at last and thrown into prison. Such conduct needs defense, and it is fortunate for Comstock that he finds so able a champion as The Index.

As for ourselves we have come to be so thoroughly convinced of the cruelty, heartlessness, and injustice of Mr. Comstock's persecutions and prosecutions that we cannot find it in our heart to fellowship him at all, and we regard Comstockism as one of the crying evils of the time. A man who by decoy and intrigue will commit a crime himself, and cause another also to commit a crime that he may have the power to punish him, ought not to be recognized by any good man living.

Almost every man, whether good or bad, has his prototype, or he bears some resemblance to some person who has lived before him. We have looked around, somewhat, to find a fitting prototype for Anthony Comstock. We thought we had found one in Torquemada, but we fear we were mistaken. Comstock would have made a splendid inquisitor-general without doubt, had he lived a few centuries earlier; but though Torquemada caused the death of more than 100,000 innocent persons, and subjected more than as many more to cruel torture and imprisonment, we still deem him too learned and sincere a man to stand as a prototype for Anthony Comstock. He did not follow the persecution and murder of his fellow-beings for the purpose of making money by the hellish business, but that he might destroy those who did not think as he did. Yes, with his most infernal qualities, he was too much of a man to stand as a prototype for Comstock. We must look around for another. Here is one just fitted to our case. His name is Matthew Hopkins. He lived in the seventeenth century. He was Witch-finder General, even as Anthony is Obscenity-finder General in the nineteenth century. He was clothed with a show of legal authority, and he prowled over a few shires in England, even as Comstock prowls over a few of these American States. It was the occupation of Hopkins to hunt up witches and put them through the most cruel tests, and to bring them to arrest, punishment, and death. Comstock pursues his victims with equal venom and hate, and, considering the age of the world in which he lives, he has caused an equal number of deaths. He boasts of having driven fifteen persons to suicide, and probably those who have been forced to an involuntary death by means of his persecutions are not fewer in number; and those whose hearts he has torn with anguish and deep grief, as with hooks of steel, are to be numbered by scores and hundreds; and Matthew Hopkins never gloated over his victims more, with the hate of a demon, than does Anthony Comstock over his. Both prosecuted their diabolical business in the name of decency and morality, and both were arrant hypocrites.

Hopkins pursued his business in this way: When a woman was complained of to him as a witch, or was even suspected of being such a foul thing, he at once shut her in a room and stripped her entirely naked, and placed her in a very painful position which if she did not retain, he bound her with cords in the most cruel manner. He kept her in that position without food, water, or sleep, for twenty-four hours. When exhausted nature yielded to the demand for sleep, he roused her and made her walk, naked, until her feet were blistered. And when he had by this merciful treatment reduced her to a state of insanity or imbecility, he made her confess to having had intercourse with the devil, and with having given birth to imps in the form of lizards, snakes, and goats, whose father was the devil, and then upon that enforced confession he caused her to be put to death in the most shocking manner. Comstock exhibits similar traits of character. He is equally merciless and equally callous to every sentiment of human kindness. The victims of Hopkins were nearly all unhappy females. Those of Comstock are only in part females, but those he has succeeded in making unhappy enough for all purposes, and every male whose wicked arrest he has caused, had a wife, a mother or a sister to be heart-broken over the deep disgrace done them.

Another favorite way Hopkins had for testing his unfortunate victims was "the swimming process." The miserable wretch was tied up in a sheet and thrown upon the surface of a pond or river; if she sunk and was drowned she was, of course, not a witch, but was drowned all the same; but if she floated she was pronounced a witch and was dragged through the pond until she died, or was hanged or burned, as the case might be. Finally the people became so aroused at Hopkins' infernal cruelty that they thought they would try his own test upon him. They tied him in a sheet and placed him upon the water, and, as was the case nine times in ten, he floated. Hence, he was a witch or a wizard, and they executed him as a witch upon the spot. If the analogy is carried out in Comstock's case nobody will be sorry, or, at least, no good man will be.

In one respect Hopkins was a better man than Comstock. Hopkins did not stoop to decoy and entrap his victims by duplicity, intrigue, and lies, that he might have the pleasure of torturing them. Comstock does that by his victims.

Having found so fitting a prototype for Comstock, we very naturally look for one for his apologist, F. E. Abbot. We do not find it in the humane, kind-hearted Rev. Mr. Gaul, who had the humanity and courage to appear in print on the side of the oppressed and despised victims of Hopkins, and to oppose the cruel and relentless course of the apostle of decency and morality, but rather in the straight-laced, exact, cultured Rev. Richard Baxter, who did approve of Hopkins' course and defended him in the high-toned, moral, and respectable work in which he was engaged. In doing this, however, the moral Baxter did not find it necessary to "go back" on any of his previous professions, nor to falsify any of the "nine principles" he had proclaimed to the world. We think we remember of our reading something of this kind from Mr. Abbot's pen: "Now I urge you to consider well the temerity of your proposed usurpation of political power. I warn you against the peril of instigating the Christian part of our population to attempt this usurpation. I caution you against the folly of supposing that a majority of the people will finally consent to this subversion of their common liberties. I beg you to count the cost of this agitation before you carry it further. It is a wild and insane delusion to expect that the great body of freedom lovers will ever submit voluntarily, or can be made to submit by force, to any such outrageous oppression, whether in the name of God or man. I make no threat whatever, but I state a truth as fixed as the hills when I say that before you can carry this measure and trample on the freedom of the people you will have to wade through seas of blood. Every man who favors it votes to precipitate the most frightful war in modern times; and it is simply preposterous for any of your number to speak of the Liberals as 'threatening war.' You threaten war when you avow a purpose to destroy the equality of religious rights now guaranteed by the Constitution to all American citizens. On the assailants of this struggle be all responsibility of its results." Who would believe that a man capable of writing as sanely as that would ever be willing to barter away the principles of personal liberty for respectability or from a fear of being considered a friend to obscenity? Those brave words were uttered from a fear of having the Jewish God placed in our Constitution, but for our part, we think there is less to be apprehended from twenty gods in the Constitution than from one Comstock in our postal affairs, with his vile laws at his back.

If there are any of the descendants of Matthew Hopkins now living, we beg their pardon for the invidious comparison here drawn; and the same also of the other man.

It is possible that the greatest danger which threatens Liberalism to-day is a deficiency of respectability and decency, but if it be so, we confess that we are so obtuse as not to be able to see it. We are far more inclined to think that a due amount of "backbone" or moral courage to stand up manfully for the principles of justice and liberty regardless of the contingency, whether we may be thought to be in favor of obscenity or not, is needed. We think we have a vivid appreciation of what a serious thing it is to be considered friendly to obscenity. We know what it costs to brave the world on this very delicate point, but we frankly confess that we have arrived at that pass that we had rather be considered partially friendly to obscenity, than to be found false to the high principles of American liberty. We had rather stand erect in the grandeur of defending the right and the true, regardless of whether the world considers us respectable or not, than to stand so straight as to lean over a little towards timidity, conservatism, and respectability.

We would that every man who assumes to be a leader or a teacher in Liberalism should espouse the cause of justice and liberty, rather than to seek to make friends with the mammon of self-righteousness and Mrs. Grundyism. If pretended Liberals are going to contend for what the churches demand, it would be about as well had they remained within the pale of the Church, and never have pretended to be Liberals. Turveydrops may be well enough in the churches, but there is not a first-class necessity for them in the Liberal ranks. We harbor no fears that Liberals will be really any less moral than our Christian rivals, though even Comstock and his assistants and apologists strive to make the odious taint of obscenity adhere to the cause of Rationalism. We fear not but that well-behaved Liberals will always compare favorably in point of morality with the average professors of Christianity, even if we do not favor the retaining on our statute books of unjust and unconstitutional Comstock laws.

We cannot think strange that The Christian Union and the Rev. Dr. Eldridge should denounce Col. Ingersoll and every man who signed that petition, and should attempt to charge them with friendship to obscenity, but such conduct is not expected from one who professes to be a Liberal, and it seems strange that he should so delight in quoting with approval the arguments and taunts of positive enemies to our cause. When Mr. Abbott sees that his doctrines are liable to be denounced by our Christian opponents as immoral and indecent, it seems singular that he should have so little charity or consideration for others in the same field who are similarly denounced. It seems strange, too, that the author of the "Nine Demands of Liberalism" should be so ready to sacrifice the most vital principle of liberty, and to advocate the most utter liberty-crushing statutes our country has ever known. Pure as he may be, we fear he is not consistent.

Mr. Abbot closes his lengthy article by predicting that all sober-minded Liberals will sooner or later come to the same conclusion, as to the asking for the repeal of those laws, that he has arrived at; but on this point we are compelled to dissent from him. We think there are many thousands of sober-minded and intelligent Liberals, scattered all over the country, who will not only never think it wrong to ask for the repeal of an unjust and unconstitutional law, but who will also regret that the talented editor of The Index has seen fit to take the course in this matter that he has, and who would much rather see all Liberals working and struggling in unison than to see a factious division turning their backs to the most vital principles of Liberalism and giving aid and comfort to our common enemy.

Mrs. S. B. Chase.

We are glad to be able to announce that this lady has escaped the clutches of Anthony Comstock. When her case was presented to the Grand Jury, and Anthony appeared against her, they did not think that she had violated any law, or that she merited prosecution or punishment. They gave her an honorable acquittal, and sent word to her to prosecute Comstock for damages for false arrest and for the heavy injury she had sustained in her business by the unenviable notoriety he had given her. We learn that she has commenced a suit against the gentleman in which we hope she may be successful. She has suffered greatly from his treatment of her. Her house was full of paying tenants, her lectures were well attended, and she had a good line of patients, but such is the stigma attaching to a charge from Comstock, that her tenants moved out at once, her lectures were unattended, and her patients were afraid to employ her. Few persons are able to realize what a cloud of disgrace immediately rests upon a person as soon as Comstock lays his foul hands upon them, and accuses them of obscenity or giving any instructions as to how or where a remedy may be found for the prevention of conception, as though it was the greatest crime known to man.

We are pleased to learn that the first homeopathic physicians in this city sympathize deeply with Mrs. Dr. Chase; that they pronounce the charge brought against her as extremely unjust, and that what she had done was entirely free from guiltiness. They approved of the syringe she has introduced and a number ordered the syringes at once.

Messrs. Henderson & Brown have written a congratulatory letter to Mrs. Chase upon her escape from the evil designs of Comstock, and have tendered her the free use of Science Hall on Saturday night, in which to deliver a lecture. She has gratefully accepted their kind offer, and will, Saturday evening, the 26th, give a lecture on "The Question of the Hour." It is also expected that others will address the meeting. Let all who sympathize with the lady as against the decoying, entrapping, and hypocritical villainy of Anthony Comstock, who tried his best to ruin her, be present to hear her. Those who feel able to donate funds to aid Mrs. Chase in a suit for damages are requested to remit to her at No. 56 West 33d St., this city.

AT THE Spiritual Conference held at the Harvard Rooms, Sixth avenue, on Sunday last, Mr. Simmons, the gentleman who was the associate of Dr. Slade, and accompanied him in his travels through England, France, and Germany, gave an interesting account of their success in the countries named. He was followed by Mrs. Slocum, who, in the course of her address, spoke of the course pursued by Comstock in his arrest of Dr. S. B. Chase. She thought that the Spiritualists owed it to themselves, as lovers of the right, to take an active part in preventing such outrages in the future. The Rev. Charles McCarthy spoke in strong terms of condemnation of the system pursued by Comstock in his method of inviting, in the first place, what he considered criminal practices, and then arresting the parties. The audience heartily applauded the sentiments of the speakers, and probably some practical good will result from their suggestions. It is at least safe to conclude that Comstock is not exceedingly popular among that portion of the Spiritualists of the city.

YEARLY MEETING.—The thirtieth anniversary of the Waterloo yearly meeting will be held at the usual place, near Waterloo, N. Y., on Saturday and Sunday, the 1st and 2d of June, at 10 o'clock A.M. Aiming, as this meeting does, at the substance, rather than the name, or any outward form of religious life; at culture and character, the humanities, rather than any speculation or observance of dogmatic worship, it inculcates the study of science and the laws of the universe rather than the dogmas of a false theology. It invites all to its deliberations who are like-minded in this regard—all earnest, thoughtful, and inquiring minds. Prof. J. E. Oliver, Chas. D. B. Mills, H. L. Green, Wm. S. Bell, T. C. Leland, A. L. Rawson, and other speakers, are expected to be present and take part in the deliberations. Music in attend-ance.

OMRO, WIS., May 15, 1878.

The Spiritualists and Liberalists of northern Wisconsin will bear in mind that our next quarterly convention takes place in Omro, Wis., June 14th, 15th, 16th. The announcement that Prof. R. G. Eccles will speak is sufficient guarantee of the success of the meeting. Good vocal and instrumental music is secured. Come all.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER XIII.

ENTITLED JUSTIFICATION.

The City of Justification.—Dissension in the City. Simon prepares to cross the Moat.—Simon Discovered amongst the Yellow Metal.

1. And in the valley of superstition was a certain city called the city of Justification, the foundations whereof were a certain offensive substance called Presumption.

2. And the walls of the city were built of a very light sand called Assumption, and this sand called Assumption was of the purest of its kind, and it was bound together by brazen girths, called Assertions, and some of these girths were very strong.

3. But the sand was light and was continually being blown away, and the guides and the men of the city, thinking to keep it in its place had taken great abundance of the ropes called Sophistries, and had fastened to the ends of the ropes some of the stones called Arguments, and others called Facts, and had slung the ropes over the walls to keep down the sand.

4. But the stones called Arguments and Facts did no good but rather harm to the walls, for they ground away the sand on every side, so that it was blown away more than before. And the people were compelled to bring more sand continually. Yea, verily.

5. Day by day did they laboriously bring more and more sand, and girth it with the brazen Assertions, with infinite and increasing pains, and sang joyful hosannas over every basketful, and even while they were yet rejoicing together and saying to each other, This is a sufficient, behold it was all gone and more with it.

6. And round about the city was a very thick and muddy moat. And the guides swore by the hour that this moat, the name whereof was Mystery, could not be fathomed, though the line was never so long. But as was their wont, they lied hideously, for the bottom was easy to be seen, and was of a yellow metal.

7. And over the moat, leading to the gate, was a bridge called Works, and a boat called Belief. And the bridge was made of filthy rags, and the boat of whales-throttles cemented together by mothers-milk.

8. And the moat was full of all manner of unspeakable rottenness, and the pilgrims passing over by the bridge, and by the boat, were continually falling in, and without doubt would have been drowned, but that their heads were light and caused them to float, even as an empty bladder causeth a man to float.

9. And Simon, after he was unspitted from off the claws of the Imp, did pursue his way through the valley of Superstition, and wallowed greedily in the gutter.

10. And the whole valley was full of dead men's bones, even the bones of such as were killed in the ceaseless wars of the Beast and his servants; for they were continually fighting with such as refused to go by their roadway, and persecuting them with all manner of persecution and torment.

11. For the Beast was arrogant, and full of malice, haughty beyond measure, and filled to the very brim with intolerance; and the guides, his servants, were like unto him, and they were stirring up strife perpetually, and inciting contention.

12. And not only did they persecute such as refused to go by their roadway, but they that entered the city of Conversion by one gate persecuted those that entered by the others; and the guides stirred up the enmity of the pilgrims against each other, and set them by the ears, and made them slay and destroy each other by myriads.

13. Yea, they burnt each other alive, and charitably slit each other's throats, and sang innumerable hosannas to their King whilst they did it.

14. But their power for evil was decreasing day by day, and the power of the Giants was increasing.

15. Yea, day by day did the Giants gather strength, and did encroach upon the territory of the Beast and of his servants, and cast down their strongholds and bulwarks.

16. And the Beast was no longer able to persecute as was his wont.

17. And Simon pursued his journey and came to the city, even the city of Justification, and stood on the edge of the moat.

18. And there came out to him two woefully mildewed men, ancient and hoary of aspect, and the name of one was Paul and of the other James.

19. And Paul desired Simon to pass over by means of the boat, and the other desired him to come over by the bridge.

20. And Simon knew not what to do, and did it not. And the mildewed men drew near and gobbled vehemently, and promised that Simon should have his share in the cauldron of fire except he came over the moat, the one saying by the boat and the other by the bridge.

21. And Simon gaped amain.

22. And some came with the nets of dust, and others with the baskets of brimstone and fire,* and they fell upon Simon like famished wolves, and they with the smoke censers assisted in the fray, and the hag Credulity came up, and laid on gloriously with her staff, and beat him on the head and immolated the crawlers.

23. And they all laid on heartily, and brought down the nets of dust upon him like flails, and poured out the baskets of brimstone and fire upons him with untiring benevolence, and of the censer smoke they made swaddling clothes, and swathed him withal.

24. And there was the noise of a mighty clapper-clawing, and of a hideous uproar, and the earth rang again with the noise and clamor; and the air shook with affright; and the mountains could no longer retain their shape, but melted away, even as butter melteth in the sun, and spread themselves out on the plains; and the rocks, leaping into the air, were pulverized with fear, and fell down in showers of sand; and the trees shed their moisture in a full stream, and dried up, and became rotten in an hour.

25. And Simon made unutterable haste and put one foot upon the bridge and the other in the boat, and the mildewed men tugged away unmercifully, and the others grew fiercer and fiercer, and laid on mighty thwacks, and dealt out thumpings unsparingly.

26. And suddenly there was an horrified crashing heard, and an appalling rending of rags, and Simon's foot went through the bridge and tore away the lashings thereof, and he fell down into the boat.

27. Now the boat-builders had not reckoned upon so great a strain, and Simon's foot went through the boat also, as it had done the bridge.

28. And when Simon saw it he drew it back with so vehement a tug that the other foot went through also, and when he drew that back the other went through a second time; then did he draw both out together, and fell down.

29. And as he fell, one of the whale's throttles, of which the boat was built, opened its mouth (for it must needs laugh or perish), and Simon fell into the mouth, and slid down to a very great depth, even as an arrow shooteth from the bow, so did he shoot down the whale's throttle.

30. And when the guides saw that Simon was gone they were astonished and dismayed, and gathered a great company together and held a council.

31. And one of them whose name was Godlyguts said, I will go in after him, so he went in, and one whose name was Gospelsides held him by one of his feet lest he should fall in and disappear like unto Simon; and when Godlyguts could not find Simon, Gospelsides said, Let some one hold my foot, and I will go in after Godlyguts, and perchance he will find him.

32. So Gospelsides went in after Godlyguts, holding him by his foot, and one whose name was Fiddlemug held Gospelsides by the foot.

33. And Fiddledemug went in, and Swallowmuch held him.

34. And Swallowmuch went in, and Swallowmore held him.

35. And Swallowmore went in, and Swallowanything held him.

36. And Swallowanything went in, and Swalloweverything held him.

37. And many more went in to the number of threescore, and twenty, and seven, and upwards, each holding by the foot the one who went before him, and being himself held by the one that was behind.

38. And they all went in, yea verily, they all went in. Selah.

39. And what they did, and how they fared, and the mighty deeds they performed, and the summers the swallows made there, behold, is it not written in the book of the omnivorous prophet Lunaticums Neveradoubt?

40. Go and look. Selah.

41. And the sun journeyed to and fro in the heavens as was his custom in those days, and sang resonant madrigals when the weather did permit him.

42. And the wicked moon jiggered behind the hills, and stayed out anights; and white-robed winter pursued the yellow-garbed summer wherever she did went.

43. Season followed season, until spices more than abounded, and seedtime trod on the heels of harvest, and rank-smelling men were abundant: and the ears of corn gathered together in yellow sheaves, and laughed when the sun shone, but when the rain descended they fell on each others necks and wept.

44. And after this Simon lay at the bottom of the moat, having his hands full of the yellow metal, and the guides saw him and rejoiced.

45. He that hath understanding let him understand. Let him that is able pluck the garlic. Selah.

46. And Godlyguts took a pole having at the end thereof a sharp hook, and he plunged the hook into the south-west corner of Simon, where the fat was, and drew him ashore.

47. And Simon made haste, yea, he made haste very exceedingly, and delivered himself of many reverberant howlings.

48. And Simon sent out messengers and gathered himself together; and when he was duly assembled he took courage and counsel and his hook,* and went into the city.

The Science of the Bible.

A SERMON ON ASTRONOMY. BY REV. JOHN JASPER,

This sermon was delivered in Lincoln Hall, in Richmond, Va, in April, 1878. Mr. Jasper, who is a Baptist clergyman, with more consistence than the majority of his clerical brethren, maintains that the Bible is absolutely and literally true, and treats with contempt those adherents of science who depend upon the observations of natural phenomena and the results of complicated mathematical calculations for their knowledge, instead of drawing it, already prepared and digested, from its divine source, God's holy Bible. Mr. Jasper affirms that the Bible contains all needed astronomical science as well as all else necessary to salvation. He has already defeated some of his clerical brethren in public discussion on astronomical subjects, because, granting the correctness of his premises—the absolute truth and divine inspiration of the Bible—his arguments could not be refuted, nor his conclusions disproved. He evidently believes himself to be divinely commissioned as the leader in a grand revival of the rapidly-waning science of the Bible, and the foundation of a new dispensation of religious enlightenment. The nineteenth verse of the twenty-first chapter of Revelations, may really have a prophetic significance in connection with his name: "And the first foundation was Jasper."

The reverend gentleman's voice is a strong, musical tenor of much power, but in its ordinary tones thick and muffled. There is a great deal of magnetism about the man; he is thoroughly in earnest, and at a colored camp meeting would gather in the converts at a rate to gladden the souls of Wesley or Whitfield. His style is eminently adapted to the wants of his congregation, and only lacks cultivation to be singularly powerful and effective. He is essentially dramatic, and his descriptive powers are pictorial and graphic to a high degree. He is an unconscious humorist. Withal, he is a logician of no mean rank, and reasons from his premises to his conclusions with a force and a directness that only need cultivation and information to be of convincing weight and influence. Opening his meeting with an old-fashioned hymn, in which the audience joined, he read the one hundred and fourteenth Psalm, and called on Mr. Johnston to pray. Then he arose and said he "would prove that the earth do stand still—prove it from the leds of the Bible."

"Ladies and gentlemen: Before proving, as I have been formerly do, that the sun do move, I shall go into Egypt extensively, and after devouring my subject will then travel into Canaan and show by the Lord's own mouth that the sun gits up in the morning in the East whar you kin see him if you wants to, and goes ovar houses and trees and territories and Co't houses till he goes down in the West, whar he hasteneth back again to the starting place. Now that the Lord is a man of war, just take notice of Exodus, fifteenth chapter, and third verse, and 'scuse me for meandering around in Egypt, for I shall not undertake to prove that the sun do move until I git over into Canaan. From the creation until the flood, when the Lord drowned everybody but Noah and his family, was 1,656 years. Then 400 years after, when the world had got demultiplied with people, pretty thick like, the Lord took Abraham out of the land of Haran, way from his kindred and relations, who was idolators, and after giving him a son he made up his mind to try Abram's faith. It was a so'ce of pleasure for Abraham—excuse me for calling him Abraham, his name was Abram, but it comes kinder pat, but I don't mean it—to look at young Isaac, but the Lord said, says he, 'Abram, take de boy up to Moria's Mounting, and strap to a pile of logs for a burnt sacrifice.' Now, if Abram had been a philosopher and hadn't had unshooken confidence he'd have said, 'Lord, if I stick my knife in young Isaac's throat, whar ye gwine to git another boy of mine through whom to bless the human race?' But, Abram wasn't a philosopher; he heard the Lord, he saddled his ass, he rode to Moria's Mounting, and was jess ready to make a burnt sacrifice of Isaac, when an angel of de Lord—I don't know his other name—called out to Abram, 'See here, old man, that's enough; don't kill the boy. Thar's an old ram got caught by the horns in the thicket ovar thar, make a burnt sacrifice out on him!' And Abraham he begot Isaac, and Isaac he begot Jacob, and Jacob he begot twelve sons, and they all went down into Egypt's land whar I have been meandering all this time. Thar they stayed 400 years, and thar God said to Moses one day: 'Moses, I have heard the prayers and seen the tears, and watched the cares, and pitied the fears of my people down in Egypt, so you go down to the royal town, tell Pharaoh, bound with the luss of the crown, that I say let my people git.' But Moses hemmed and hawed and said: 'Sir, I ain't well enough acquainted down there.' And the Lord says, 'Yon aint, ain't you? Well, take Aaron, the Levite, and he shall be my speechman, to tell Pharaoh to let my people go.' So Moses he went down and told Pharaoh, and Pharaoh, nothing would do for him till they let the frogs on him. Then he got scared, I tell you, but it took the lice and the darkness, and the Destroying Angel to work him up to the sticking point. And then when he did let them go he was sorry, and went after them with 600 chariots filled with colonels and captains. And the Lord said to Moses, 'Jess tell your people to staud on one side and look at me, for I'm gwine to do the fighting this morning.' And the Lord said to one of his angels, 'Angel, git down thar and unscrew

Pharoah's lynchpin and take off his stern wheel.' And the angel did so; and then Pharaoh said, 'Let's git, boys, the Lord's doing this fight, I tell you.' And he went to go, but the east wind came on, and whar, oh whar was Pharaoh? Then Moses he died, and Joshua took command, and the Israelites were beaten at the city of Ai. And wharfore? Achorn, the son of Zeri, stole a magnificent Babylonish garment and 250 shekels of silver and a gold wedge, and hid them under his bed. Joshua sent out 3,000 men—I forget whether it was 3,000 or 300—anyhow, they got whipped, and Joshua fell on his face and prayed, and the Lord said, 'Git up, Joshua, what's the matter with you?' And Joshua said, 'O Lord, they licked us!' And the Lord said, Of course they did. Take that cursed thing away. Hain't he got that Babylonish garment? Hain't he got 250 sheckels of silver?' Then they killed Achon and his family, and went after the city and took it. Then the Gibernites played a trick on Joshua to save their lives, and two or three days after some of the neighbors sent word and said to Joshua: 'Joshua, them fellows ain't foreigners; they live around here, and have taken you in.' But the five kings of the Ammonites, having a quarrel with the Gibernites, came down to fight them, and the Jews buckled to them. They fit and fit, and right here I'm gwine to prove to you by this blessed book, that the sun do move, suah! For Joshua said, 'Lord, the battle can't be foute before the sun goes down behind the Western hills. And the Lord said, 'Joshua, tell the sun to stand still upon Gibeon, and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon.' So the sun stood still in the midst of the heavens and hasted not to go down about a whole day. Do you want any more proof than that? Take Hezekiah where the sun went back ten degrees. And Solomon says in Ecclesiastes, first chapter, fifth verse, 'the sun ariseth and the sun goeth down, and hasteneth to his place where he arose.' Now Solomon was a smart man, and knew something, and is entitled to respect, and that's what he says. Now, I want to ask the grammarians something. What is the meaning of the word 'arise?' Don't it mean something that goes down stairs, or gets up and moves about? If I haven't proved that the sun do move then my name ain't Jasper! Don't take my word for it, take God's. He says so. Will you make God a liar? But they say the earth moves, that the earth turns over. Pshaw! An astronomer told me it turned over and over and over! Why don't you see if it did, all the water would fall out of the rivers and we'd all be drowned. Drowned. I tell you. And if the earth turned over, all the houses would tumble down and the territories turn over, and you and I would be standing on our heads half the time! It's nonsense!

"I have proved by the Bible that de sun do move. The Bible was cherished by our fathers, we kin not do better than cherish it ourselves and teach our children to cherish. But don't believe that the earth turns over, for you know that you can't stand on your head all night."

Origin of Hell.

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

All winter I have been silently observing the discussion of hell, and although the subject is somewhat hackneyed, still I consider it far from being exhausted. Therefore I ask for a little space to devote to it.

Helios, in the Greek, was the Sun God; that is, he drove the chariot of the sun. Hades was one of the names bestowed upon the God of the Infernal Regions, but in time came to signify hell itself, and clergymen frequently quote Hades as the Greek for hell. So Helios in time came to signify the sun. Hell is derived from Helios. Words in Greek ending with es have reference to fire, such being the meaning of es. The last syllable of Helios evidently means the same as es, and refers to the fire of the sun. This is the fire mentioned in the New Testament "that is never quenched." This conclusion is unavoidable from the fact that all other fire, except that of the sun, is liable to be quenched. Even the great ocean of fire at the earth's center is slowly cooling down and must eventually be quenched. But upon the theory that the fire of the sun is kept up, not by the consumption of inflammable matter, but by the impinging of aerolites upon the sun's disc (the arrested motion being converted into heat which instantly reducing the aerolites to gas, the gas again solidifying into aerolites, to be again attracted to the sun, constituting a perpetual motion in nature, without any waste of material or loss of power), it is plain that the sun is that great "lake of fire and brimstone." But the Bible adds in this connection, "where the worm dieth not." Who, or what, is that "worm?" Theology fights shy, regarding the "worm," though always slopping over with descriptions of "the fire that is never quenched."

To me, the "worm" has as much force and meaning in the passage as the "fire;" but theology makes no attempt to explain "the worm," except to say that the language is figurative, and has reference to the agony of the damned sufferer. If this is true, then the inspired(?) writer was very stupid in making a comparison, for the bite of the cobra, the sting of a bee, and many other pains, are far more excruciating than anything that a worm can cause. Besides, if there is a hell, it must be full of quack doctors, and it would not take them long to get up a vermifuge warranted to knock hell's delight out of every worm that dare show himself in those sulphurous regions. But to be serious.

Prior to the date fixed for Moses (which I feel certain is an antedate of the time the Pentateuch was written by more than a thousand years), the constellations Taurus and Scorpio occupied the vernal and autumnal equinoxes, respectively. By precession, a constellation of the zodiac passes a given point in a fraction more than two thousand years. Moses is brought upon the stage at the time that Taurus (the bull, or cow, or calf, etc.), passes over the vernal equinox, by precession, and Aries (the ram) comes there. So Moses is made to commemorate the "Passover" by "the sacrifice of a male lamb, or ram." But when Taurus passed over and ascended to heaven (the summer region) its opposite sign, Scorpio, descended into the infernal regions of winter and became the sign accursed. On this event is founded that beautiful fiction about "the war in heaven" and the casting out of Satan. "That old serpent [Scorpio], the devil, which is called Satan." When Taurus passed up, Moses is made to repudiate his image, a calf, and get very angry about it, declaring that the Israelites were "thirsting for the flesh-pots of Egypt," that is, they wanted their old Taurus worship in place of the Aries, or lamb worship; and to convince them of their error this "meekest man" kills a few thousand, thus proving the supremacy of mutton over beef.

According to the unchanging laws of astronomy, a little more than two thousand years after Taurus passed over the vernal equinox, Aries was compelled to follow, and then Pisces (the fishes) came there. This occurred a little more than three hundred years before the time fixed for the birth of Christ, a discrepancy to be accounted for only on the ground of fraud or ignorance on the part of the New Testament writers. Aries, which was a lamb in the time of Moses, had grown to be a sheep, and by the immutable law of precession, had strayed away from the fold of the vernal equinox. Hence they had lost their Israelitish mutton, but determined to have it back again. Nothing short of a miracle could accomplish this object, and so they have a demi-god born of a virgin, with God for the father, the great mission of whom is "to save the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Therefore it was appropriate to call him a "savior," and being in the sheep business, how natural that shepherds should adore him. Nor was it disrespectful to call him a "Lamb," although from his birth in a manger it might be just as appropriate to call him a horse, or ass, only it would sound funny to call him the "Horse of God," etc., simply because it is new; whereas, the "Lamb of God" is something we have heard from infancy and sounds all right.

But by actual phenomena the fishes (Pisces) had taken the place so long occupied by the lamb, and Jesus must bring about a reconciliation. Hence he is a "mediator" and chooses fishermen for his disciples, who proved a scaly lot of fellows, as Robert Taylor remarks, for Peter was either afraid or ashamed to own that he knew him and swore he'd be —— if he knew any such a fellow, while Judas betrayed him to death.

But the authors of the New Testament accomplished their object, and to this day Aries is kept at the vernal equinox by every astronomical author, although it is well known that not only Aries, but Pisces, has followed Taurus into the kingdom of heaven, and that Aquarius now occupies the point of the vernal equinox. This arrangement, or, rather, disarrangement, retains Scorpio as the leader down into the regions of the damned, and the first sign of the zodiac, not constellation, which the sun enters at the beginning of the five winter months, during which time the fire of the sun is greatly diminished, but "never quenched." Old Scorpio, the worm, having been assigned a permanent domicile at the first point below the autumnal equinox, is doomed to live there forever, and therefore never dies.

Jesus is a deification of the sun. The twelve zodiacal constellations are his twelve disciples. Scorpio is the traitor, for anciently he was above the autumnal equinox, and while the sun was transiting through Scorpio it was summer. But after being kicked out of the kingdom of heaven, it is winter while the sun makes the transit, and therefore Scorpio is a vile traitor, who betrays the sun with a kiss. The sun is crucified, that is, crossified, that is, crosses the equinoxial, twice each year, both of which crossifications are mentioned in the New Testament, namely, on Mount Calvery, Sodom, and Egypt. (See Rev. xi, 8.) The Sun, that is, Jesus, descends into hell at the autumnal crucifixion, gains the lowest point of declination Dec. 22d, rises again Dec. 25th, the third day, when the days lengthen and the sun is returning once more to the northern hemisphere; is a risen Redeemer, redeeming the earth from the frosts and chains of winter, March 21st, and just forty after, namely, May 1st, ascends up into heaven, bringing the Holy Ghost, that is, "sun gust." In Acts, the men of Gallilee are told that they shall see this same Jesus descend, which they did only a few months later, when he was once more on the downward road to hell. Thus we have the origin and scientific meaning of hell. Old Theology should be ashamed of its ignorance and stupidity.

Death.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 4th is an article upon death, from G. H. Bennett, M. D.,—I presume not a near relative of yours, judging from the foundation for his argument—which for a moment, with your permission, we take the liberty to examine.

We think with him that death is not the terrible foe of mankind that many teach, but is the greatest reliever of human suffering known—as natural as birth; and could we be properly instructed with regard to it, we should welcome it as a kind friend coming to relieve us from suffering after this body becomes worn out, instead of an enemy to do us harm.

But what troubles the majority of persons is the foolish, unreasonable, groundless, and delusive ideas that have in the past, and are now being taught with regard to the hereafter, and the uncertainties and doubts continually arising in the mind of the thinker, as all are not quite so positive of future existence as Dr. G. H. Bennett, and hardly satisfied with the reasoning by which he arrives at his conclusions.

He asks, "Why should the word death be used, when in fact there is nothing dead?" He must allow that animals of all kinds die—and as death is the word used to denote the cessation of life in animals, why is it not appropriate when applied to man? as he is born into the world as an animal, lives upon the productions of the earth as an animal, and dies as an animal.

The doctor assumes that, because man has intelligence and reason superior to any other animal known he has sprung from the gods; is a part of God, and as he could not conceive of a perfect god with an eternal existence, he concludes man must continue to exist in some form eternally because his God does.

The trouble with the doctor commences in assuming, "there is a God." Could he prove it beyond question he would have a starting point. He may tell us none but fools question the many convincing evidences of his existence to be found in nature and in the Scriptures, but all this fails to satisfy the reasoning mind as well as the fool; and all are asking for the proof and must have it, as they will not accept the reasonings deduced from false premises.

As no living person has ever seen a God outside of nature and her unchanging laws, we have no positive evidence of his existence except created in the imagination of each person, all who have the same right as the doctor to create one or more; so we may have millions of gods as no two persons were ever alike, no two gods could be created alike, and whether they would be subject to death or not would remain wholly with the individual creating them to decide; as very much would be depending upon the intelligence of the person as to the kind of god produced.

After creating his god, the doctor next asserts: "God is the fountain of all life" and man must continue to live in a future state of existence or endanger the life of the Creator, as if he were dependent upon the life of his creatures for his continued existence, and yet fountain of all life. The absurdity of such ideas shows at once to every reasoning person the uselessness and the imbecility of such a god.

If the doctor will be good enough to demonstrate to us that there is a God, all-powerful and wise and of endless existence; that we are a part of him, his children, created in his image, and that he will eternally care for us and preserve our identity and intelligence through a long eternity after the dissolution of this body; we will be greatly obliged, as a large majority of persons have a strong desire to live forever, but are not certain that their wishes in this respect will be gratified.

If the doctor's theory is true, it is a great pity that we were not placed directly in the world for which we are all so naturally adapted, as it would appear that God has made a slight mistake by placing us in the wrong world among many uncertainties, and doing us an injustice that he will never be able to wholly remedy.

We should be sorry to have death destroy all the learned doctor's beautiful theories which appear plausible and some of them very desirable, and the superficial reasoner may conclude he is correct, but theories amount to little where we assume foundation, and all our conclusions may be erroneous.

If in mathematics I assume that two and two make five, and follow out the rule, no matter how well or systematic I perform my work, the result in each case will be wrong, because my assumption is erroneous; so it is, with the reasoning of the doctor; it will continue to lead him astray till he secures truth for a foundation.

We are yet having altogether too much of this reasoning from false premises and groundless assumptions, and it is prolific of much of the superstition and error with which the world is cursed to-day—and the people are beginning to require that it be supplanted by something more real and substantial.

I fear the doctor is in error when he would take such a disparaging view of everything beautiful in nature and sink so low as to despise himself if he could not be positive of a continued existence. As well might I say, Unless I can be sure I shall live a hundred years, I don't care to live at all, and will despise all the blessings and beauties that surround me, torment myself and make those around me as miserable as possible. Every sane person would have a right to wish me dead, and have my place filled by some one more worthy—and in case I should prove thus ungrateful and worthless, I ought to despise myself and be despised by the lowest vagabond on earth.

The importance attached to a belief in a future existence by the doctor, in order to enjoy this life or to do well here, is thinner than moonshine, and has not body enough to it to form even a shadow—it is if possible weaker than other points in his reasoning; yet it may be so necessary for him that if his props were taken from under him he would be useless in this world, and might be driven to insanity or suicide.

The doctor should learn a lesson from all vegetation in its growth and decay, in the flower that so quickly buds, blossoms, and is gone—and in nearly all the beasts of the field and the birds of the air, that enjoy the short life allotted them—all these should shame man with his enlarged capacity for enjoyment, and his superior ability for acquiring knowledge, when he despises this because he is not sure of an everlasting existence. Yours, R. C. TROWBRIDGE.

Letters from Friends.

TH. C. LELAND AND THE INDEX.

MR. EDITOR: One of the most disagreeable things in the eyes of every true and sensible Liberal is the pickerings [sic] and petty jealousness of liberal papers, which far from benefiting the latter, must of course, be but an injury to themselves and the cause of Liberalism. As an instance of this I will now only refer to the Paine Memorial Building matter which ought to and might have all been settled satisfactorially more than two years ago; but instead of it, and owing mainly to these foolish jealousies and growls, the building is this day yet burdened with a heavy debt and mortgage—as large as is the burning shame for Liberals not to have wiped it out long ago.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week (May 4th), also, has an article from the pen of Mr. Th. C. Leland against The Index, dictated in the same spirit and seasoned with malignity and falsehood. First he accuses The Index of having two or three regular correspondents who seem to be got up on the "principle of the crab.". Now this will most certainly be something quite new to the readers of The Index, a paper as much distinguished by its high tone, and scientific character, as by the erudition and enlightened and thorough radicalism of its gentlemanly editor. Then Th. C. L. stigmatizes one of those correspondents (Mr. A. W. Kelsey) as "one of those fellows tugging away lustily at the rear end of the car of Progress, and shouting: Wait! No communists, no labor reformers, no Freelovers, no woman suffragists—none but free religionists and friends of Anthony Comstock allowed on board!"

Now, Mr. Editor, Mr. Abbot has often and clearly enough declared that each correspondent is alone responsible for the contents and character of his communication; whatever, then, the nature of Mr. Kelsey's article may be, Mr. Abbot and his Index can certainly not be held responsible. If Mr. Leland does not like all in Mr. Kelsey's article, he has a perfect right to differ from him; nor is he alone in this; I myself did not like it all. But I can for all that not share in his tirade against The Index and his editor; nor can I find any cause or excuse for it. What! accuse Mr. Abbot of being op posed, or at least unfriendly, to labor reform, woman's suffrage? What a libel! Who is a stauncher advocate of all and any rational, necessary, and beneficial reforms than Mr Abbot? Who is more devoted to equal rights and freedom? What paper is more polite and impartial, more truly liberal and radical than The Index. True, Mr. Abbot or Mr. Kelsey, or both, may, and with good reason, too, not like freeloveism and communism, yet be very good, liberal and radical gentlemen; they will not be found alone in this, either, but will have an overwhelmingly large majority of the readers of The Index on their side, besides almost the unanimous voice of society in general.

And yet Th. C. L. is mean enough, when speaking of H. C. Neville's article in The Index, "Purification of Liberalism," to say "Nobody has 'discussed' [it], or at least nobody that The Index would print" (the italics of this sentence are my own; the grammar, Mr. Leland's).

What falsehood and calumny! Th. C. L., would thus intimate that Mr. Abbot was too prejudiced and biased to allow a rejoinder to Mr. Neville's fanatical attack on Liberalism and Liberals; and even if any one should write and send it to him, he would refuse to publish it. Now, Mr. Editor, what are the facts? Just the contrary! I myself wrote a sharp reply to Mr. N's article, and a week or two afterwards it was published in The Index. So much for Th. C. L.'s critics and truthfulness.

Further remarks I consider unnecessary, and least required for those acquainted with The Index and its noble editor.

Yours for the truth, MORRIS EINSTEIN.

Titusville, Pa., May 12, 1878.

COMMENTS BY MR. LELAND.

The writer of the above must be troubled with defective vision. He seems to see things in a blurr. I recommend him to put on spectacles of high magnifying power, get my article in true focus under clear light, and read it again. I defy him to find one word in it "against The Index," or "against" its editor. I simply stated that The Index had two or three correspondents of a crab-like character, and I stated it not as an "accusation"—not as a matter for which Mr. Abbot was to blame—on the contrary, it is to his credit that he hears all sides, and I have given him that credit in his own paper, and elsewhere, and everywhere, but I stated it as as a fact. If that fact is an accusation or a discredit to anybody, it is to the correspondents alluded to, not at all to the editor. It doesn't need a critic, come all the way from Titusville, to tell us that. We know it here as among the first principles of journalism. In all that I said, I held the correspondents responsible, and not the editor—just as Mr. Einstein takes so much uncalled-for pains to teach me that I should do. It was upon their views, as expressed, that I animadverted, and upon them alone, so all Mr. Einstein's charges, couched in hard words, fall to the ground. Whenever I shall venture to criticise the editor of The Index, it will be done openly, directly, in a manner that will not be mistaken, for cause that will be justifiable, and not over the shoulders of any correspondent or otherwise.

When I wrote, "nobody had 'discussed,' or at least nobody that The Index would print," I wrote advisedly. I knew of at least one article sent to The Index on the subject, and presumed there were others. I now know there were several, and among them, "a bird in the air" tells me, was one from Mr. Einstein which was not published. And now crops out a fine specimen of the prevarication to which tricksters even in Liberalism have to resort when they enter on the defence of an unrighteous cause. Mr. Einstein says he "wrote a sharp reply to Mr. N's article, and a week or two afterward it was published in The Index," and in that statement he wishes to make the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER believe that he wrote a "sharp reply" to the same articles of Neville on "The Purification of Liberalism," upon which I was commenting, and that that sharp reply was published in The Index. He did, I believe, reply to Neville on another matter, three or four months ago, and that reply was published, but no article of Einstein's that has any reference to Neville's recent letters on purified or conservative Liberalism ever appeared in The Index.

I have asked Mr Bennett to print Mr. Einstein's communication as above, exactly as he wrote it, to show readers in what a glass house of brittle grammar he wields the pen himself. At all events, I stand by mine, and assure him that I have command of grammar enough for all practical purposes. It will serve me sufficiently well in controversy with all reactionaries, "purifiers of Liberalism," and holier-than-thou style of people, wherever I may meet them.

Yours against the untruth, THERON C. LELAND.

A FEW WORDS BY THE EDITOR.—We wish to make a remark or two in reply to brother Einstein about the Paine Hall complication, which he so regrets. We presume we have felt as deep regret upon this unpleasant subject as has Mr. Einstein himself. We had something to say upon the subject when it was under discussion, but we did not engage in it until we became convinced that it was our duty to do so, and not until every means had been exhausted to effect a fair and just settlement of the difficulties. We felt that justice demanded that Messrs. Burt, Altman, and Henderson should be heard upon the subject, and we extended to them that privilege. When we were attacked for doing that, we endeavored to defend ourselves in a spirit of truth. We only contended that the property towards which the people had given $40,000, in round numbers, should be vested in a legal board of trustees, and not in the private right of three individuals. That the demand was a just one we have only to cite the fact that our Boston friends ultimately adopted it, and virtually admitted that it was the only proper course to pursue. Could they have seen the propriety of taking that stand three years earlier, it would have been a fine thing for Paine Hall and the cause of American Liberalism. We believe there are none to-day who regret that that step was not taken more than do our Boston friends themselves. Had they to do it over again, with the experience they now have, we fully believe they would act differently. What we said and did in the premises was prompted by the highest sense of propriety and justice.

AN OPEN LETTER TO ANTHONY COMSTOCK.

BY A. DAMPHOOL.

SIR: Though we are strangers, you have awakened in me a very strong interest in the work you have lately undertaken in your inquisitorial capacity, and as I am an old man and somewhat versed in the ways of the world, it has occurred to me that some good advice might not come amiss.

In the first place, your consistency evokes my highest admiration. You are a Christian; at least I hope you are, for you are living up to the doctrine better than most men. In fact, you are without a peer in your line. Still, with all your zeal, your talent is worthy of much greater scope, and you may aspire to great distinction.

It is said that you are now engaged in hunting down those who vend devices for preventing conception; and in this high vocation how can I do otherwise than bid you God-speed, for did he not set you the example by slaying Onan for the same crime? To be sure God might have spared Onan, as he was the chief instigator of the offense, and killed the woman; but the Killer did not happen to be Comstock.

There is a large field for your effort in this line to which I now call your attention. There is now scarcely a reputable drug-store in the Union but is overtly engaged in selling preventives of conception. Visit each drug-store, buy one in each, and then next day have every druggist incarcerated! Wouldn't that be grand compared with pouncing upon one poor woman? What a mighty warning! No sneak-thief look about it!

When you have accomplished this feat, look after the opossums. These blasphemous marsupials are practical ante-conceptionists, and should be at once looked after. To be sure, their creator made the grave mistake of giving them their faculties; but prevention is a crime, and as you cannot reform these animals by law they must be killed. Their hides will bring some money to swell the treasury of either the government or God, it don't seem to make much difference which. Besides, think what a stinging rebuke this marsupial massacre will be to God, showing him what a mistake he made in their creation! Perhaps you may make him regret the mistake of having created you in the human form, even as all sensible and refined people are now regretting that the government has made the mistake of appointing you instead of a gentleman to the office you hold.

Next in order come the wood-squirrels. Hunters and others tell us that during the first week of the existence of the new-born nestlings, the impious, God-defying little mother-squirrel selects all but the most vigorous males, and mercilessly emasculates these helpless innocents with her incisors, thus frustrating God's designs by curtailing procreation! Think of this, and of the slaughter of innocent, unborn opossums, and do your whole duty. But don't molest the male; the females are the sinners, and you like to persecute that sex anyhow, so inclination and duty will blend.

But I have another suggestion, and pardon me if I incline to the opinion that it will afford you more distinction than any other path you could pursue. Adultery is a most grievous "vice," and imperishable renown awaits the man who will extirpate it. I am about to tell you how you may become that man of renown, and I charge nothing for the disinterested advice. When a town or city attains the number of one thousand inhabitants, we are told that prostitution and adultery are inevitable concomitants. Glance your eye over the census; compare the best social-evil estimates you can get, and you may then form some idea of the immensity of your undertaking. Now for the modus operandi: Commence with New York city; visit all the lewd women, and induce them to commit adultery with you. Then have them promptly arrested, and have it mercifully arranged with the authorities that the wretched women can have their choice between suicide and instant decapitation. Either mode will be satisfactory to you and the society you so much honor. When you get through with New York, take Philadelphia or Brooklyn; preferably the former, for you will need change of climate—travel will do you good. Think of the magnitude of this enterprise! And when you shall have completed this glorious career, there is but one other way in which you can add to your reputation by capping the climax. Of course, it will be your duty while abolishing adultery to keep an eye on murder, drunkenness, and sundry other "vices," which you will have ample opportunity to incite. And if your constitutional vigor permit, you might improve various opportunities for betrayal of innocent girls; they would be very roughly handled by the authorities, while you would of course get off scot-free, as men generally do.

But now for the grand climacteric—and I confess that I approach it with awe, and do hope that you will keep it rather private, for indeed it almost paralyzes my pen to write it—I allude to what is known as an IFERNAL MACHINE. Such a mechanism may be variously constructed; it is explosive in character, treacherous in mode of introduction, and mercilessly murderous in execution. It may be sent to the victim under any one of a thousand innocent looking disguises. They are hated, despised, and feared by all civilized people. No punishment is thought too severe for the perpetrator, and happily for the welfare of our race, they are about as rare as their counterpart, the moral infernal machine, which is gotten up on the same principle. Still, they do crop up at long intervals, and it is a part of your duty to "suppress" them. To do this you should hire some person to make one. That's the first step. Have him make it of wrought steel, and large enough to contain ten pounds of nitro-glycerine. Accompany him to some lonely spot, having ambushed some witnesses for next day's court. Calmly seat yourself upon this innocent mechanical toy, and give your co-sinner $5.00 for firing. Of course it would not dare to harm you, but whether it does or not, your witnesses will put him through, and that is the object sought. This they will do, even if there isn't enough left of you to decently bury; but if you escape unhurt, as analogy would seem to augur, you can make the next one a little larger.

P. S., N. B.—Don't try the climax till you get through with the other work; it might make you nervous.

PRINCETON, MASS., MAY 16, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: In your kindly notice in your issue of May 11th of the Labor Reform Convention held in New York the 5th and 6th, you unconsciously do injustice to many friends and co-workers in the phrase "Mr. E. H. Heywood's Labor Reform League." One of many Industrial Protestants, I am simply the servant of a growing associative purpose which has its exponents in all parts of the world. In your city alone, associations with similar principles and purposes to those of our League run back forty years and count in their membership J. K. Ingalls, Wm. Rowe, R. W. Hume, Col. Henry Beeny, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Wm. Hanson, Edward Palmer, Dr. C. S. Weeks, Geo. W. Madox, Mary A. and T. C. Leland, and others who were gray in the service of labor reform before I entered it. Not to mention Josiah Warren, P. J. Proudhon, and John Stuart Mill, now dead; Col. Wm. B. Green, Laura Kendrick, Benj. R. Tucker, John Orvis, of Massachusetts; L. K. Joslin and Henry Appleton of R. I.; W. E. Lukens, of Illinois, J. H. Swain and W. N. Slocum of California, J. F. May, of Mich., and E. M. Davis, of Penn.; Geo. E. Harris, W. Freeland and John Ruskin, of England; the Internationalists, of France, Italy, and Germany; the Nihilists, of Russia; multitudes of people the world over favor the main purposes of The Labor Reform League, viz, to abolish property in land and other raw materials, which property begets rent, and the removal of restrictions on currency and exchange which make usury, dividends, and other speculative profits possible. Endeavoring to unite all by asserting the natural, individual liberty of each, our movement has the sympathy of multitudes of people who, bound to nothing beyond their own personal agreements, are yet working forces in a common struggle for opportunity and reciprocity The fact that eight or ten New York newspapers reported, that dispatches were sent by the associated press to nearly every leading newspaper in the States, and that scores of editorials were written on the convention indicates widespread interest and activity in the movement which we convened to promote. Since your statement, unintentionally of course, did injustice to many of my associates and credited me with far more than I deserve I will be glad if you can insert this explanation.

E. H. HEYWOOD.

P. S. Joseph A. Britton, Comstock's spy, representing himself as "Mr. Young from the Sun newspaper," set a trap to catch J. Flora Tilton, who sold books in the Labor Convention. He came to buy "Fruits of Philosophy," which, however, was not for sale—to him! Mr. Britton told three lies in three minutes for Comstock's and Christ's sake.

ROSEBURG, OREGON, May 5, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: It is amusing and sad at the same time, to read some of your letters received ordering THE TRUTH SEEKER to be stopped. We are no sooner out of the leading strings of the priest and superstition than we are held spell-bound by an equally infallible and adamantine chain of prejudice. If you happen to give your honest opinion about what is called Spiritualism, up starts the cry, "Oh, he is a Spiritualist!" Immediately the cloven foot is shown, and they would persecute you if they could. Oh! consistency thou art a rare jewel. But, friend Bennett, I would warn you against Spiritualism. Those foolish seances are a great loss of valuable time; and let me add, take care of your brain, for they will be sure to weaken it. The great and good Robert Owen when in New Lanark, Scotland, had a very active brain; so much so as to rouse all England and Presbyterian Scotland from her slumber of ages. He roused the ire of the archbishops of the Church of England, and made the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland quake with alarm for the religion of the people, and the loaves and fishes of the priesthood. And why? Because he proclaimed the great truth that our characters were but the results of our organizations and the external circumstances surrounding them. That to believe we must have evidence and could not without it. But when his brain began to fail in his old age, those lady mediums got around the great philanthropist and he weakened, he softened, and never after did any good to himself or his fellow creatures.

His eminent son, Robert Dale Owen, who was member of the U. S. Legation at Naples, followed suit, and in fact, as you know, got into an asylum in his adopted land, America (State of Indiana). Robert Dale Owen and Frances Wright—Madame D'Arusmont—stirred up the whole of the Eastern States by their writings, lectures, and debates; but Robert Dale never wrote a good line after he was inveigled by those smiling damsels, the lady Spiritualists and so-called mediums.

Did not Mr. Howitt, the author of the "History of Priestcraft," go the same way? And, friend Bennett, for God's sake, if not for Mrs. Bennett's sake, give it up. You have had enough of it. Were I in your wife's position I would interdict all those seances, and stop all those meetings in the dark with lady mediums. They are dangerous especially to married gentleman like you and I. Have nothing to do with them. Yourself and THE TRUTH SEEKER will flourish much better without your interference with those kind of spirits. Depend upon it, all the kind of spirits we have any knowledge of are contained in casks and bottles, and large quantities are manufactured in Kentucky from rye, and then we have the famous Bourbon spirits, a very good article, especially when the fusil oil is carefully taken from it; and it is this confounded fusil oil that will soften your brain and mine too, and we are then very apt to smile upon some fair face and glancing eye, and succumb at last to the tempter. Spiritualism is but an old superstition revived, nothing more, and I am sorry to see strong minds yield to its insidious and useless influences. I have asked the question publicly and privately of Spiritualists in London and in Scotland (the eloquent and gifted Mrs. Emma Hardinge among the rest, when she lectured in Glasgow in 1867) what was the use of Spiritualism, even if true, and never could get a satisfactory reply. But I can tell of its many evils, and the numbers of good men and women it has consigned for life to our lunatic asylums and made complete wrecks of their intellects. Robert Cooper, among the number, became a Spiritualist, and what a wreck was left behind of a once powerful mind. Yours,

P. JACK, M. D.

CARTHAGE, MO., May 2, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: I received the bundle of TRUTH SEEKERS you sent me, and distributed them among the Liberal people of this place. It is only a few weeks since I first read your paper, and I am highly pleased with it, and will do what I can to extend its circulation in this place. After perhaps a half hour's canvass, I obtained the list of subscribers I send you herewith. I think I can get several more soon. Although this city is decidedly orthodox, still the Liberal element is silently but steadily at work. We have a Spiritualist Society here which meets weekly, and have started a Liberal library of about one hundred and forty volumes. We are all of moderate means but intend to sustain and add to the library as fast as we can. Only a little over a year since wife and I left "Jah's" sheep-fold, having spent the best half of our life in the Church trying to believe and follow the many absurd teachings and doctrines of the old Book, and all the Church taught about it. Thanks to a few Infidel friends who urged their literature on me, I began to read and reason. Life is now like a new existence. No whims and caprices of an angry and jealous God to fear and look after. The "new birth" bugaboo, "witness of the spirit" etc., etc., have vanished. I see from reading your book, the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," you have had some of this experience. I must close, and I hope you may live many years to wage war on these old errors, and if I can do nothing more than aid in extending the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, my labors will amount to something in the cause of Liberalism. Very truly yours, E. BUDLONG.

WOLCOTVILLE, IND., May 13, 1878.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: Your little brochure on "Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind," is kindly received. I have given the subjects treated upon a careful reading, and found myself very much interested. You treat these problems in a scientific manner, and the reader is impressed with the fact of your wide range of thought and research. I wish your pamphlet could be in the hands of every man and woman in America. All men, sooner or later, must be convinced that they do not owe their existence to a vengeful, versatile God, but that they are evolved from lower organisms in obedience to the immutable laws of the universe.

Very truly yours, GEO. F. ROCKWELL, M.D.

HAYS CITY, KAN., May 10, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT, Sir: Please find enclosed $3.50—$3.00 for Thomas Paine's "Great Works Complete" and 50 cents for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am thankful that a number of your TRUTH SEEKER fell into my hands last winter, when I was a church-member, for it converted me to a higher standard of thought. I am going to work for it a part or all of my spare time. Yours truly, D. C. BRUMIT.

WOODHULL, ILL., May 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your TRUTH SEEKER was received and read with pleasure. The frank, honest, and manly manner in which you treat all intolerant stake-drivers is admired by a very large portion of your readers. What is more disgraceful than intolerance in a Freethinker or Liberalist? Religious bigotry is not a priming to it. They imitate their god, and, in a great measure are excusable. But what excuse can there be for a man who claims the right of the freedom of thought and will, and will not grant it to his fellow-men. The condition of the world, political and religious, is now demanding honesty and uprightness in purpose and action on the part of mankind, male and female; and in the name of all that is honest and upright, there should be a union of purpose and action on the part of all Liberalists and Freethinkers. It is full time that the world should know that religious toleration is one of the pillars of civilization. Just think what a condition mankind would be in if all were of the same opinion on all subjects—life would be loathsome.

Friend Bennett; there has been a traveling Egyptian (as he calls himself) in our place, lecturing for the Freemasons, by the name of Col. Birtroll. He gave a free lecture at the expense of the Freemasons, setting forth the origin of the masons as far back as Tubal Cain the sixth generation from Adam, 6769 years standing, commencing about four hundred years after Adam, claiming he had the genealogy of man some seven thousand one hundred and sixty nine years. This he said might be disputed, but the Egyptian records would bear him out. He himself claimed a membership of the fifth lodge in the world. He then claimed Moses was called in Egypt, the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and was a Mason, as was Solomon also. He gave us the dimensions of the several Egyptian monuments, covering some nine to thirteen acres of earth, and in 1872 an entrance was found in one, in which was found engraved upon marble slabs the ten commandments given by God to Moses, the ark of the covenant and many things used by the Jews, all was there deposited for safe keeping to show the origin and progress of Freemasonry, calling our attention to the Bible, chapter and verse, as he repeated the history of those relics now in Egypt as proof of the Bible. In speaking of the Alexandrian library destroyed by Mohammed, in which was the full history of the world up to that date, he said it covered eleven acres of land, height in proportion.

We considered his lecture rather mixed, his first position in the genealogy of man being in contradiction to the Bible record, yet he claimed the Bible was all true, and God came down and stood upon the walls of the first great city and called to Noah and inquired of him how many righteous there were on earth, fifty, twenty-five, ten, or five, and not finding at least five he ordered Noah to build an ark and save himself and family, and the whole of mankind was destroyed, and Noah was the first man on earth that got drunk. In God talking with Noah he got things a little mixed, parts of two stories in one. This gives you the outlines of this Egyptian lecturer's discourse. If there is any truth in his statement as to the ten commandments and other Jewish relics being placed in this monument, it is evident the Jewish religion and all its attendant ceremonies etc., were understood by Moses and by him taught to the Jews. This man claimed God in person only came to the earth twice, first to Noah, second to Moses. Upon the whole it, with the Bible record, was unreconcileable. So much for trying to save what he called the truth of the Bible as held with all the most intelligent part of his audience, his lecture was in a manner worthless.

Respectfully yours, ISAAC PADEN.

P. S.—As I was about to mail this I was informed that the Master Mason of Illinois had telegraphed that this Egyptian lecturer was an impostor, and ordering the lodges not to let him in. For the truth of this I am unable to vouch. I. P.

BOZEMAN, MONTANA, May 2, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am very highly pleased with your paper, and derive much satisfaction from it. I am sorry that some of our Liberal friends show so much Christian intolerance as to denounce you for your avowals on Spiritualism. A truth seeker cannot afford to be intolerant. I cannot say that I blame Materialists for disbelieving Spiritualism, but I think the avowal of a candid believer in a future life, based upon his own observation and experience, and upon the light and deductions of his own reason, is entitled to their respect, for they can scarcely claim a better foundation for their own belief or disbelief. Now, I am a Spiritualist, and as a subscriber for your paper, I claim an interest in it, and I think it is only right you should give your own views, and the views of others occasionally in relation to a future life, even if you do not deal entirely in negations upon that subject.

Some of our Materialist friends seem to think that the philosophy of Spiritualism is a sort of concession to the old theology, but I think its teachings are doing more for the religion of humanity, and the cause of human progress, than the negations of Materialists, especially if the latter are inculcated with a spirit of dictation and intolerance. If Spiritualism is a delusion, reason can dispel it. Bigotry without reason never can. Yours truly, J. J. DAVIS.

INDEPENDENCE, KAN., May 1, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: B. F. Underwood gave three lectures here on April 28th and 29th. On his arrival with the evening train, he and his wife were interviewed at the Caldwell House by many friends; after which they were serenaded by the "Young Band." Mr. Underwood responded in a few pleasant remarks addressed to the band and a hundred or more persons present. Everything pertaining to the lectures passed off well. The audience was not very large; the admission fee of twenty-five cents stripped it of idlers, curiosity-hunters, and children, and afforded the speaker the satisfaction of facing intelligent men and women, making, of course, a very attentive audience. We were expecting Underwood's advent here to be a great event. It was more. It has given Liberalism a prestige here that nothing else could give. It has given it an elevated tone and a start here that must insure a high career in future. It is probable that Mr. Underwood will next fall make this city his headquarters for a month, while he visits other places in southern Kansas. This announcement carries terror to the preachers and their following, but further than that there will be no evil. It will be a bloodless fight. Heretofore mental freedom has been purchased with blood. It is high time that one bloodless victory should be granted. It used to be, "Lo! the miserable Infidel!" Now it is, "Lo! the miserable Christian!" One outspoken Freethinker, one Freethought journal floating around, make a whole Christian community miserable.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has had much to do in bringing about these results in this region; and I think, brother Bennett, that we will ere long reward you—in part, never fully—for it was our work you were doing, our battles you were fighting. A. A. B.

WILMINGTON, DEL, May 16, 1878.

BRO. D. M. BENNETT: Permit me to congratulate you on your continued liberty to express your thoughts through THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope that sainted dog will be prevented for a long time yet from barking at you in a martyr's cell.

One of the C. A. saints in our town who has been holding prayer-meetings and temperance and religious meetings seemed to require a change for the benefit of his spiritual being, and so went off on a tremendous big drunk; and quite a number of those saved from drunkenness through the above young Christian's gospel-temperance efforts have followed his example and gone on a drunk too. These are a sample of the holy ones who would not permit Mrs. Dr. Thompson of Oregon to speak on temperance because she had spoken at our Liberal league! O consistency! etc. I believe that if the temperance people would let a little more free speech into their meetings they might learn something of great benefit to the cause. We seldom see a Materialist or a Freethinker and Liberal philosopher give up to rum and become a sot.

But these false-hearted Christians, who are continually falsifying good men and the Bible by saying good men are bad men, and that the Bible has no contradictions in it—and they dare not step on a public platform to defend their infamous detractions—deserve the execration of mankind. The preachers say the jails and insane asylums are filled with Infidels and Spiritualists, when all the statistics of the country give the lie to them, and still they continue to assert the lies. They must be very near relatives of the Father of Lies! S. MARSHALL.

WACONDA, KANSAS, May 6, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I want to place on record what is to me the most disagreeable fact possible. But just now one of your correspondents, in putting questions to some Spiritualistic writer, asks, If he were to strike at a person's knees with a sword ten feet wide, and stop when the blade was half-way through, would the soul or spirit be divided in halves? As I have a case slightly bearing on the spirit question, and have for more than twenty years been very anxious to have it solved—but from its painful nature I very rarely speak of it—I now feel that as I have sought the solution so long in silence, and have consequently kept the world from a chance of solution, and in all probability shall soon be gathered to my fathers, when the opportunity will be forever lost unless some similar calamity shall befall another of the sons of men—which is not very probable, though possible—I may give the story: When about five years of age I had the scarlet fever, which settled in my legs and right arm. The right leg mortified, and the foot rotted off at the ankle joint. No knife or other instrument divided the integuments. The left leg and right leg burst, and by discharge of blood mortification ceased. By proper applications and good care the footless leg healed over the stump, except a small place, about the size of a gold dollar, which never could be healed. In the course of about thirty years the bone under the sore had decayed so as to render walking impossible, and my health was fast failing; consequently the limb was amputated just below the knee, and has never troubled me since, except that when the case becomes the subject of conversation in any way, or when my mind reverts to it, then the whole leg down to where the ankle joint was divided is as plainly felt as before the amputation; and even the old sore has its peculiar feeling, but the feeling of the leg never extends to the foot—it ceases at the ankle—and before the amputation I never felt the foot; so only that which was divided alive by the knife has feeling, and that which died of itself has none. This is a very short, and perhaps bungling, statement. However, under the above-named inconvenience, it may be excused; and if any one can solve this problem, I shall be happy to have it done in the interest of science, if you should think it worth a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Thy friend, GEO. W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

ARENZVILLE, ILL., May 4, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You will find inclosed one dollar. Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER to that amount. I cannot do without your valuable paper. I have not been reading your paper very long, but I like it very well, it is so fearless in exposing error, and makes truth so plain that all that read can understand. I am thankful to some Liberal friends for furnishing me with books and papers, from which I gained some valuable information. I would give you my Christian experience but it would take too much space.

Suffice it to say I was once a member of the Church. The Union Baptists ordained me to preach the Christian mythology about fourteen years since. I had been a doubting Thomas on several points for some time, and about two years ago I heard B. F. Underwood deliver a lecture in Arenzville, which set me to thinking for myself, and again I attended the debate between Mr. Underwood and Mr. Braden at Jacksonville, Ill., which put me into the right channel, for always before it seemed to me that my intellect was chained, my thoughts hemmed in. Mentally I was in bondage and I knew not how to release myself, for to doubt was eternal damnation, and yet I wondered how these things could be, when I preached that God was love. But thanks to you and Mr. Underwood, and some friends here, I am a free man and have emerged from the darkness of error and superstition into the great light of nature's truth. I see in your paper an account of the Liberal organizations in Iowa. I am truly glad to learn that the people of my native State are throwing off the shackles of superstition and becoming a free people. Go on; fight for mental liberty; stand firm for truth and reason, brother Bennett; fight on for the freedom of thought. It will not be long till you and others will be considered among the saviors of the world. J. COMBES.

ASHBY'S MILLS, IND., April 29, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I inclose to you an item, taken from Pomeroy's Democrat of April 27, under the caption of "Crooked Comstock" as follows: "The best jurists and lawyers in the country pronounce the law under which Anthony Comstock has so long played the part of spy, sneak, and decoy, to be unconstitutional. It would be an act of justice to send him to prison for life for what he has done to secure the arrest and torture of men who are innocent. It is better that all guilty men escape than to have one innocent man wronged, and this sneak Comstock has wronged many innocent persons." In the same paper of April 6, on the second page, you will find an article on the "Comstock laws" that I call good. It speaks very favorably of the petition of sixty thousand signers that you sent in to Congress. I am going to hear Col. Ingersoll the first day of May at Indianapolis, on "Intellectual Development, or the Democracy of the Fireside." I have never had the pleasure of seeing the great intellectual-giant, therefore I shall take the advantage of this opportunity. I send my mite to J. Weed Corey by this mail. Fraternally yours,

J. H. GRANTHAM.

DIMONDALE, MICH., May 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find two dollars; please place to my account for THE TRUTH SEEKER another term. I send you two dollars because it comes handy to do so, and another thing it will be an excuse to write again by the time it will expire. I see by the tab it is time to remit, so accept.

The second annual meeting of "Windsor Society of Spiritualists," will hold a two-days' meeting on the first Saturday and Sunday of June next, first and second days, commencing on Saturday at two o'clock, P. M., and hold over Sunday, at Windsor, Eaton Co., Mich. First day will be the election of officers and such other business as may come before the meeting. Speakers for occasion will be Mrs. L. A. Peresall and others. All are respectfully invited. Homes for those at a distance will be provided.

ADDISON ROON, Pres., C. O. THOMPSON, Sec.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., May 7, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I have not written you a letter for many months. I have often desired to do so, but the Letter department of your paper seems to be so well represented that I have been fearful that your valuable time has been taken up too much in reading so many letters from friends; for I do think that if a man or an enterprise ever had friends, they are D. M. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have been a constant subscriber and reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly four years, and have read it to a large number of people; and I have yet to hear any of them say anything against its teachings. Lest I use too much of your space, I must try to "boil down" my thoughts. I feel it will not do to write more than a one-hundredth part of what I wish to say. There is much of human nature to be learned from reading those letters from the people published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have been of late sometimes diverted and sometimes vexed by reading those letters pretending to criticise you for your investigations, just as though it was any one's business except the one who was engaged in the investigation. How long, oh! how long, will it be before the dire effects of the teachings of Christianity will grow out of those who claim to be Liberals! It is a misnomer to call ourselves Liberals while we practice ostracising others for investigating any phenomenon and giving expression to their honest convictions. Now, I think it a good plan, if we have nothing to say in approbation of our fellow-man, to say as little as possible. So I will be explicit in regard to what I think of such brothers as Strum of Memphis, Tenn. They simply, in my opinion, have too much of the old blue orthodox religion. I sympathize with those who are so situated; it is a burned child that dreads the fire. I have been there, and know something of the pangs of the ordeal through which one has to pass in emerging from mental slavery to a free and independent plane.

Wishing you a long, happy, and prosperous life, I remain yours fraternally, WM. A. THOMPSON.

The Slave-Ship.

TRANSLATION FROM HEINE.

I.

The supercargo, Mynheer Van Koek,
In his cabin sits, and counts up
His profits to come, and he smiles to see
How the tot of the ship's load mounts up.

"The spices are good, and the pepper is good,
Sacks, barrels three hundred of crack stuff;
Then there are the gold and the ivory;
But better than all is the black stuff.

"Six hundred negroes in barter I took,
Dog cheap, on the Senegal River;
Their flesh is firm, their sinews like steel,
Of the best brand our makers deliver.

"Brandy I gave in exchange for them,
Glass beads, and cutler's gear, too;
If only one half of them live, I gain
One hundred per cent—all clear, too.

"Even say three hundred negroes are all
We've left us at Rio Janeiro,
They'll fetch me a hundred ducats per head
From the house of Gonzalez Pereiro."

He had got so far, when Mynheer Van Koek
Had his cheery dream broken in on
By the cutter's surgeon walking in—
Doctor Avish McTavish McKinnon.

A stick of a man, on whose blazing nose
Full many a red wart figures.
"Now, my Surgeon-in-Chief," exclaims Van Koek,
"How get on my darling niggers?"

"Thanks, thanks for inquiries!" the doctor says;
"I came to say, overnight, sir,
The mortality 'mongst them has mounted up
In a way that's exceptional quite, sir.

"Amidships they always died two a day,
But last night seven of them hooked it—
Four men, three women, that's the loss;
I've been to the day-book, and booked it.

"Their bodies, I tested and tried them well;
For these rascals—don't I know them?—
Often sham to be dead, on the simple chance
That into the sea we throw them.

"I took the irons off their limbs,
And, as I commonly do, sir,
Their bodies, as soon as the sun was up,
Clean overboard I threw, sir.

"In an instant up shot a swarm of sharks
From below to overhaul them:
They are so fond of the negro beef;
My pensioners I call them!

"They have followed the ship's wake ever since
We left the coasting station;
The creatures sniff up the carcass smell
With epicure exultation.

"To see them snap at the dead men is
As pretty a sight as one knows of!
One seizes a head, another a leg;
What is left the others dispose of!

"When they've cleared off all, they go tumbling round
The ship, quite contented and happy,
And they leer at me, with a look that says,
'A capital breakfast, old chap, eh!'"

But here, with a sigh, Van Koek breaks in:
"How to get this mischief under?
This dreadful mortality, how am I
To arrest its growth, I wonder?"

The doctor answers, "The fault's their own,
These niggers drop off so quickly;
Their own bad breath has made the air
Between decks horribly sickly.

"Many have died, too, of doleful dumps,
Too deadly dull to endure them;
By a trifle of music and dancing and air
Let us of their megrims cure them."

Then cries Van Koek, "Good, sound advice!
My medical staff commander
Is sage as Aristotle himself,
The tutor of Alexander.

"The President of the Society
For tulip-culture in Delft, sir,
Is clever—very—but not by half
So clever as yourself, sir.

"Ho! music! music! These black knaves
Shall here on the deck cut capers;
And those who decline, the cat-o'-nine
Shall quickly cure of the vapors."

II.

High in the great blue vault of heaven
Many thousand stars were gleaming,
So wistful-sad, so large and calm,
Like the eyes of beautiful women.

They are looking down upon the sea,
That is veiled in a phosphorescent
Purple-tinged vapor out for miles;
The waves make a murmur pleasant.

No sail flaps on the slaver's ship;
As 'twere dismantled it lies there;
But lanterns shine on the quarter-deck,
And the sounds of music rise there.

The pilot has taken the fiddle in hand,
The cook on the flute is playing,
A smart young cabin-boy beats the drum,
On the horn is the doctor braying.

Some hundred negroes, women and men,
Halloo, and caper, and wheel around,
As though they were mad; and their iron gyves
Beat steady time, as they reel round.

They stamp the deck with insane delight;
And many a swarthy fair, too,
In transport her naked partner clasps—
And oh, the groans that are there, too!

The mate is maitre des plaisirs,
And the laggard dancers he has
Quickened with strokes of his cat-o'-nine
To friskier ideas.

And Diddle-dum-dey and Tootle-te-too:
The din lures up from the deep there
The monsters of the watery world,
That drowse in a fatuous sleep there.

Hundreds and hundreds of sharks swim by,
Possessed by a dreamy distraction,
And up at the ship they glower and blink
In a maze of stupefaction.

They're quite aware that the breakfast-hour
Has not arrived, and their jaws are
With yawning agape; one can see them set
With teeth as thickly as saws are.

And Diddle-dum-dey and Tootle-te-too—
Such endless dancing and setting,
The sharks in sheer impatience the while
Their teeth on their own tails whetting.

I trow they love not music, they,
And, like most of their kidney, show it;
"Trust none that does not music love!"
Says Albion's greatest poet.

And Tootle-te-too and Diddle-dum-dey—
The dancing it goes on stoutly;
By the foremast stands Mynheer Van Koek,
And he folds his hands devoutly.

"For Jesu's sake spare, Lord, the lives
Of these black sinners, spare them!
If they've angered thee, ah, well thou know'st
To swine we may compare them.

"Oh, spare their lives, for Jesu's sake,
That all us mortals died for;
For unless three hundred head survive,
I lose every stiver I tried for!"

—Theodore Martin, in Blackwood's Magazine.

To the Wind.

BY ALGERNON SYDNEY LOGAN.

Eternal minstrel! who through every land
Harpest wild melodies from door to door.
Thy lays 'neath palace caves are not more grand
Than in the smoky chimneys of the poor.

Saddest of harpers! of thy songs can none
Back to the lip a vanished smile recall?
No, there is not of all thy ditties one
But wakes a sigh, or bids a tear to fall.

Thou sing'st of home to those that houseless rove,
Past friends to those mankind despise and scorn,
Thy songs tell trembling age it once could love,
And bid unwilling youth feel it shall mourn;

Thou sing'st of weed grown graves with mossy stones,
Which we in life's rough race have left behind—
But thou dost not neglect them, and thy tones
With kindred music wake the sleeping mind;

Thou sing'st of our own graves which thou shalt see,
Of endless change which leaves thee still the same,
Of all we are not, and yet wished to be
In brighter hours ere hearts and hopes grew tame.

Pilgrim impalpable! thy viewless feet
Through ages still must roam from clime to clime,
But even thee at last a bourne shall greet—
Thy head shall rest upon the tomb of Time.

Why Should We Worry?

Why should we worry? This life is not long enough
Here to be wasted in sighing and tears;
Silly and childish is he who's not strong enough
Wisely with reason to fright away tears.
Care's but a coward, with courage not half enough
Fairly to face us if we show no fears.
Nay, if it pester you, you've but to laugh enough.
Presto, begone! lo, the bore is not here.

Mem'ry too often will bring us old sorrows;
When they were here, did we wish them to last?
Why not forget them? The fool alone borrows
Present regrets from the griefs of the past.
Can we now change it by weeping and whining?
What's done is done, and is gone past recall.
He who the present forgets, in repining,
Useless and vain, is the worst fool of all.

Fancy, the jade, will too often be peering,
Curious and scared, through the Future's dark night.
Why should we tremble at what she is fearing?
Why should her dreamings fill us with affright?
Wait till they're real things, and present before us;
If they are worth it we'll care for them then.
Now they're but shadows, too flimsy to bore us,
Far too unreal to shake those who are men.

True, with the present's real griefs to be dealing,
That's not so easy, we sadly must own;
Who can deny flesh and blood will have feeling;
Care, grief, and anguish will make themselves known;
Own it, but add, life is too short for worry;
Darkness brings sunshine, or all men are wrong;
Off with despairing—don't be in a hurry
To know grief is pressing—it will not stay long.

THE TELEPHONE SUPERSEDED.—Prof. Hughes, the well-known inventor of the type-printing apparatus so largely employed on the Continent, has made the wonderful discovery that some bodies are sensitive to sound as selenium is sensitive to light. If such a body be placed in the circuit of a small battery it will be so affected by the sonorous vibrations when spoken to as to replace entirely the transmitter of a Bell telephone. Conversation, music, and all the sounds transmitted by an ordinary telephone are easily reproduced. A mere scratch with the finger-nail, or a touch with the soft part of a feather, is distinctly transmitted. The sonorous vibrations produce strains in the conductor, which cause variations in the resistance of the circuit, and thereby produce similar variations in a current flowing through that conductor.—Nature.

CAREER OF RELIGIOUS IDEAS. By HUDSON TUTTLE.—All thinking people must feel obliged to Mr. Bennett of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for the reproduction of this valuable and instructive work. Just at this time it is especially needed. Though very neatly printed and bound, it is offered at a very cheap rate, and we are glad to see that the price of books—like other commodities—is coming down. To some people mental and spiritual food is as necessary as daily bread for the body. This book gives us a discriminating and impartial review of all the past religions of the world, the subjects of the chapters being arranged in the following order: 1. Introductory; 2. What is Religion? 3. Fetichism; 4. Polytheism; 5. Monotheism; 6. Value of Ancient Bibles; 7. Man's Moral Progress Dependent on his Intellectual Growth; 8. The Great Theological Problems; 9. Man's Fall; 10. Man's Position—Fate, Free-will, Free-agency, Necessity, Responsibility; 11. Duties and Obligations of Man to God and to Himself; 12. The Ultimate of Religious Ideas. To show the need of such a book, we quote a passage or two.

"The religious views entertained by the Christian world are a stupendous chain of unwarrantable, insupportable, and baseless assertions. Getting lost from God, getting saved, getting nearer to God, being restored to God, and being lost from God, form a mass of verbiage, meaningless and false. Can a man be lost from an all-pervading, idfinite Father?

"Not only is such a religion humiliating—it is absolutely immoral. The ceremony quickly comes to stand for the practice of virtue; the ritual takes the place of deeds; the man is encased in impenetrable formulæ, and truth departs."

This book is published by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, N. Y. Price in paper 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.—Voice of Truth.

Facts From My Sunday Readings.

Quito is, at the Grand Plaza, 9,520 feet above the sea, and the atmosphere is consequently so rare that water boils at 194½°, which is before it gets fairly hot, and thus renders it difficult to make good tea or coffee there, or to thoroughly boil potatoes and other vegetables.

The people about Quito milk at any time of day when they happen to want the milk. "Stopping at a hacienda," says Mr. Orton, "we were eye-witnesses of a comical sight. A mild-looking cow was driven up to the door; the woman, evidently the bravest member of the household, seized the beast by the horns, a boy tied the hind legs with a long rope, and held on to one end of it at a respectable distance, while the father with outstretched arms, milked into a calabash." To make butter they first boil the milk, then stir it with a spoon.

January is named from Janus, the god of the year of the Roman mythology, to whom the first day was sacred, and in whose honor it was celebrated with riotous feastings and givings of presents. Each Roman workman wrought a little at his trade, for the sake of luck throughout the year.

February as well as January is said to have been added to the list of months by the second Roman king, Numa Pompilius, 672 years B.C. Among the Romans at that time all objects which were thought to have the effect of moral purgations in their religious ceremonials were called Februa. Ceremonials of this kind took place at this season, hence the name of the month.

March was, with the ancients, the first month of the year, and was named in honor of Mars—the supposed father of the founder of Rome.

April was so called by the Romans from Aperio, because it was the season when things opened.

The real origin of the name of May is not known. Some think it is from Maia the mother of Mercury. The Saxons are said to have called it Trimilchi, because they then began to milk their cows three times a day. The Romans thought it unlucky to marry in May.

The origin of June is also uncertain. It was called mensis juniorum, or month of the younger people; while May was called mensis maiorum, or month of the elder persons. This is probably the origin of the two names.

July was the fifth month of the Roman year and was called Quintilis. It became the seventh in consequence of the reform of the calendar by Julius Cæsar, in whose honor, as he was born in it, Augustus gave it the present name.

August was in Roman times called Sextiles, as being the sixth month. The Julian arrangement made it the eighth. It was named Augustus in honor of the second of the Cæsars. He, in his vanity, could not brook its being one of the short months, so stole a day from February to make it one of the longer class like that of his Uncle Julius, thus making February too short, and destroying the regular alternation of thirty and thirty-one of the months.

September was originally the seventh month. This accounts for the first two syllables of the name, the last syllable being an ancient particle of doubtful signification.

October, once the eighth month, is called from Octo, Eight. At the time of the Emperor Domitian it was called Domitianus, in his honor, but after his death the name was abandoned by general consent from a wish to sink the memory of so execrable a tyrant. The Saxons called it Hyna monat (wine month), from its being the time when wines were annually brought into Germany, none being then made there.

November, once the ninth month, called from Novum, nine. The Saxons called it Wint monat (wind month).

December, originally the tenth month, was called by our Anglo-Saxon ancestors winta monat, or winter month, but after becoming acquainted with Christianity this name was changed into heligh monat, or holy month, with reference to the celebration of the nativity on its twenty-fifth day.

The last day of the year is called in Scotland Hogmanay, and children run about the towns crying at the doors

"Hogmany, trollay,
Gie us of your white head, and none of your gray," and merry-makings are prolonged until twelve o'clock at night.

KIDDER'S

SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents, which will be forwarded, post-paid, to any address on receipt of price.

Editors and Publishers.

Annual Subscription, $2.00; Six Months, $1.00; Three Months, 50 cts. Postage Prepaid. A Specimen Copy Mailed on Receipt of a Five Cent Stamp. The NEW YORK ECHO justly claims to be the only secret society paper in the world, as it is the only journal that gives full and impartially reported details of every occurrence of general importance relating to EVERY Secret fraternity in the Western and Eastern Hemispheres. News of interest to Freemasons, Theosophists, Rosicrucians, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Knights of Honor, Knights of Labor, Foresters, Good Templars, Druids, Members of the B'nai Berith, Kesher Shel Barzel, Free Sons of Israel, Eastern Star, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, I. O. W. M., Ancient Order of Hibernians, Order of American Union, Fenian Brotherhood, etc., etc., will always be found vigorously treated in its columns. The NEW YORK ECHO'S editorial staff and its corps of contributors are unequaled by those of any other journal published in the interests of Secret Organizations, and comprise authors, old-time editors, artists, sculptors, leaders in the ranks of reform and progress, cum multis aliis, noted in their respective specialties. The motto of the ECHO being "Fearless Independent, Liberal," it has never had hesitation since its inception (April 8, 1877) in denouncing injustice and abuses wherever found, is the organ of no clique or party, has the interests of true religious culture at heart, but repudiates the idle dogmatisms of sectarianism and contemns theological intolerance of all and every kind—and bases its position as an educator on the platform of "Love as the Principle, Order as the Basis, Progress as the End." The NEW YORK ECHO is a four-page journal, six columns to the page, is the same size as the New York Sun, and is printed on the best quality of paper. AN ADMIRABLE ADVERTISING MEDIUM. As an advertising medium the advantages of The NEW YORK ECHO are unsurpassed by few other newspapers, as it circulates all over the United States. Copies are regularly mailed to subscribers in Europe and Asia. Address all communications to Messrs. Heartt and Sotheran, Editors and Publishers of The NEW YORK ECHO, 37 East Thirteenth Street, between Broadway and University Place, New York City.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them, are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL, COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations—by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

A thick 12mo volume of 530 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

SPRINGFIELD HYGEIAN HOME.

That others may know more of what we are trying to do, I will simply state that during the three years we have been here nearly 1,000 persons have been successfully treated by us for a great variety of diseases, both acute and chronic, including Fever and Ague, Congestive Chills, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Neuralgia, Female diseases, Insanity, Consumption, Inflammatory Rheumatism, White Swellings, Paralysis, etc. But one death occurred in all that number, and every one benefited or permanently cured where the laws of life were strictly adhered to. With a fair trial, where cure is possible, we may safely promise good health to all. Please state definitely the nature and probable cause of your disease, when contracted, age, amount of drugs taken, etc., and we will give you an honest reply as to the probability of recovery.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. WORDS of praise, indeed, are almost as necessary to warm a child into a genial life as acts of kindness and affection. Judicious praise is to children what the sun is to flowers.—Bovee.

THE greatest cosmopolites are generally the neediest beggars, and they who embrace the entire universe with love, for the most part, love nothing but their narrow self.—Herder.

IT is no disgrace not to be able to do everything; but to undertake, or pretend to do what you are not made for is not only shameful, but extremely troublesome and vexatious.—Plutarch.

WHAT gunpowder did for war, the printing-press has done for the mind; and the statesman is no longer clad in the steel of special education, but every reading man is his judge. —Wendell Phillips.

IT was said of one who preached very well, and lived very ill, "that when he was out of the pulpit it was a pity he should ever go into it; and when he was in the pulpit, it was a pity he should ever come out of it."—Fuller.

THE clergy are at present divided into three sections: an immense body who are ignorant; a small proportion who know and are silent; and a minute minority who know and speak according to their knowledge.—Huxley.

IF to do were as easy as to know what were good to do, chapels had been churches, and poor men's cottages, prince's palaces. It is a good divine that follows his own instructions. I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teaching.—Shakspere.

THE productions of the press, fast as steam can make and carry them, go abroad through all the land, silent as snow flakes, but potent as thunder. It is an additional tongue of steam and lightning, by which a man speaks his first thoughts, his instant argument or grivance, to millions in a day.—Chapin.

THE invention of printing added a new element of power to the race. From that hour, in a most especial sense, the brain, and not the arm, the thinker and not the soldier, books and not kings, were to rule the world; and weapons forged in the mind, keen-edged and brighter than the sunbeam, were to supplant the sword and the battle-axe.—Whipple.

IT was observed of the Jesuits, that they constantly inculcated a thorough contempt of worldly things in their doctrines, but eagerly grasped at them in their lives. They were wise in their generation; for they cried down worldly things, because they wanted to obtain them, and cried up spiritual things, because they wanted to dispose of them.—Colton.

BE FAITHFUL.—A man can not afford to be unfaithful under any circumstances; a man cannot afford to be mean at any time; a man cannot afford to do less than his best at all times and under all circumstances. No matter how wrongfully you are placed, and no matter how unjustly you are treated, you cannot for your own sake, afford to employ any but your better services; you cannot afford to be a liar; you cannot afford to be mean, even to a mean person; you cannot afford to do other than to deal uprightly with any man, no matter what exigencies may arise between him and you. No man can afford to be anything but a true man, living in his higher nature, and acting from the highest considerations.—Investigator.

THE Infidel offers no promise of heaven with its "golden streets" and "pearly gates," its singing "cherubs, seraphs, and cherubims," nor have we the rarely beautiful and exquisitely fascinating houris of Mohammed's paradise to offer as a premium for belief, but can only give plain common sense, and hard, sober fact, if we may so call it. These visions of "fairy lands," of "perpetual summer," of "eternal youth, everlasting happiness, and joy without end" are all baseless fabrics of dreams. They remind us of a young maiden who has spent her girlhood in the perusal of highly-wrought romances, where every heroine was an angel, and every hero a paragon of manly worth, nobility, tenderness, and chivalry, and she at last marries, and finds her ideal only a poor, weak, frail, erring, faulty, yet very human sort of a man. She has perhaps got all she is really capable of appreciating, or is actually worthy of, but the romances have spoiled her for the enjoyment of the real by leading her to expect so much more than was ever embodied in any one living person. In this same way, religion spoils its worshipers. It destroys the enjoyment of the many pleasures and blessings that are all around us, by painting a glorious summer-land that contains every imaginable form of beauty and happiness, and then calling this, our own lovely, glorious earth, a world of woe, sin, and misery.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

SOW SHIRT-BUTTONS early in the morning.

THE rabbit is timid, but no cook can make it quail.

"JOHN, you said Sally kissed you; did you kiss her back?" "No; I kissed her face."

"SCATTER the germs of the beautiful," as the poet said when he kicked his wife and children out of doors.

"DON'T you think, husband, that you are too apt to believe everything you hear?" "No, madam, not when you talk."

WHAT is the difference between the Czar and a beggar? One issues his manifestoes, and the other manifests his toes without his shoes.

FROM a physiological point of view, Russia and Austria are both right. After getting Hungary, of course, they want a slice of Turkey.

TO PREVENT her lover "going back" on his promise, a Detroit girl always introduces him to her young friends as "my intended husband."

A NEW YORKER gave as a reason for not taking a dive with a girl at Long Branch that he was not afraid of the undertow, but of her father's toe.

"Do you see any grapes, Bob?" "Yes; but there is dogs." "Big dogs, Bob?" "Yes, very big." "Then come along. These grapes are not ours, you know."

WHEN Jemima went to school she was asked why the noun bachelor was singular. "Because," she replied, "it is so very singular that they don't get married."

A LITTLE girl, upon her return from a children's party, being asked if she had had a pleasant evening, replied, "Yes; but there wasn't much boys there."

A MINORITY report to the Massachusetts Legislature on woman suffrage embodies Mark Twain's toast to women—that "as wives and mothers they had no equals."

WHEN a Cincinnati young man says to his soul's idol, "Don't kiss me any more now, Sal; I'm tired," she knows he has just been shaved by one of those pretty female barbers.

I looked and loved, and loved and looked, and looked and loved again;
But looked and loved, and loved and looked and looked and loved in vain.

A SHOUT went up in the House of Commons when Barri once grew eloquent after this fashion: "There—there is Boston. Cherish her; provoke her not to rebellion. She is your eldest son."

THERE seems to be a general feeling about town that when there is no light in the entry a man ought to be excused for kissing his wife when she lets him in, provided he thinks it is the chambermaid.

SEVERAL years ago a young man in New Orleans put a sum of money in a savings bank, and forgot all about it until recently, when, after reckoning up the interest, it was found that—the bank had failed.

THE culprit was brought before the magistrate and asked his name. It was given as Lachtenschlager. "Did you shoot the dog in self-defense?" "No; I shot him in de lek, and he yumped ofer de fence."

BRIDGET: "Wot's the most genteel thing for a lady as is a lady to carry in the street, Nora?" Cook: "Sure, thin, some prefers a three-volume book; but I prefers a roll of music meself —quite careless and aisy-like."

"Who was the doubting disciple?" asked the Sunday-school teacher. "Peter," promptly replied the smart bad boy. "No—Thomas," said the teacher. "Then what do people always say 'Petered out' for?" asked this smart bad boy.

"You have often," said the clergyman, "heard the brethren say 'Amen! Amen!' while some one was praying. What do they mean? If any one knows, let him hold up his hand." Up jumped a little fellow, so eager to answer as not to wait for recognition. "I know!" he cried out. "It means hurry up and get through."

SERGEANT-MAJOR: "Now, Private Smith, you know very well none but officers and non-commissioned officers are allowed to walk across this grass." Private Smith: "But, Sergeant-major, I've Captain Graham's verbal orders to——" Sergeant-major: "None o' that, sir! Show me the captain's verbal orders. Show'm to me, sir."

A LAWYER once asked the late Judge Pickens of Alabama, to charge the jury that "it is better that ninety and nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should be punished." "Yes," said the witty judge, "I will give that charge; but, in the opinion of the court, the ninety and nine guilty men have already escaped in this county."

"I'll never starve, my dear," he said
Unto his rural bride,
As through the garden-walk the two
Were strolling, side by side.
The little farmer's girl looked up,
And "Why?" she archly said.
"Because," quoth he, "in you I have A little hoe-maid bred."

PROMINENT among the nuisances inflicted upon Congressmen are the albums in which they are requested to sign their names. Occasionally an appeal is made for something more than a mere signature, and a Western member, who was annoyed by this, wrote: "I am in favor of a law banishing to Alaska any one who bores people by asking them to write in an album."

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS & FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 22. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, June 1, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

DR. EWER sticks to it that "Protestantism is a failure."

YES. God is everywhere. You stick your finger in a cup of water, pull it out, examine the hole—God is even there.

IT is costing Russia $1,400,000 a day to jab Christianity into those terrible Turks with the points of their bayonets.

THE Rev. Mr. Tooth, the famous English Ritualist, has recently become the father of twin babes. People call these infants "the little Teeth."

A CLERGYMAN at Rouseville has taken a large contract in announcing that he will in a sermon tell his people about "Angels, who they are, and what they do."

A WESTERN paper speaks of banking as being a modern device. Not at all. Luke tells us of a thrifty person "who put his money into a bank," and the Old Testament says that Elisha "stood by the bank of Jordan"—indicating that depositors sometimes made runs.

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE says that Morrissey "may rise up in the day of judgment with the people of Sodom and Gomorrah, to condemn the professors of religion who, while teaching Bible classes on Sunday, are robbing the corporations of which they are treasurers during all the rest of the week."

MR. FROUDE, the historian, recently addressed to Dr. Newman a letter, in which he says that "the principle of gravitation is only looked upon now as an hypothesis by all careful minds," and further, that it would be far better if all mankind could agree "to hold their opinions as mere hypotheses."

THE Rev. Mr. Dale, of New Castle, Ill., revivalist, was run out of town by the indignant citizens of Arcadia for assaulting two girls, aged respectively twelve and fourteen years of age. The matter has been brought before the grand jury, and the reverend gentleman is being sought for. He is a thorough believer in hell.

A YOUNG lady, in a class studying physiology, made answer to a question that in seven years a human body became changed, so that not a particle which was in it at the commencement of the period would remain at the close of it. "Then, Miss Lislie," said the young tutor, "in seven years you will cease to be Miss Lislie?" "Why, yes, sir; I hope so," said she, very modestly, looking at the floor."

THE General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church has adopted a resolution condemning Sunday amusements and the running of railroad trains on the Sabbath and other "desecrations of the Lord's Day." The case of Rev. W. J. Clark, of Lisbon, St. Lawrence Co., accused of "immoral and unministerial conduct" was brought up, and the Synod agreeing that "Bro. Clark's usefulness in the ministry had been impaired by visiting a place where he ought not to have gone," suspended him for one year. One year should be sufficient time for the reverend man in which to recover his normal "usefulness for the ministry," unless his is an aggravated case.

THE Sunday-school lesson for last Sunday is in the third chapter of the Book of Daniel, and treats of Shadrach Meshach, and Abednego in the fiery furnace. The passage is a familiar one, and suggests a great many topics for teaching. It is to be hoped that the practical truth hammered out of that day's study by the teachers will be more valuable than that arrived at by a New Jersey boy who was recently taken through this lesson of the men in the furnace. This lad, on being asked what he had principally learned from the story, replied "that it's very disagreeable to be too hot." The teacher then threatened to make it disagreeably hot for the boy whereupon the boy said he would try it again. The next time he reported that he had learned "that it's a good thing when you're too hot to get where its cooler."

THE American College and Educational Society is a body of Congregationalists formed for the purpose of obtaining and dispensing funds to assist in the education of poor but pious young men who wish to enter the ministry. A short time ago this association forwarded to the poor but pious men aforesaid a circular informing them that unless they believed in the existence of an orthodox hell, and could hold and preach that doctrine, they need not look to them for more assistance. There is nothing uncertain about that move. The poor but pious embryo parsons must "go hell" or go home. The American College and Educational Society should change its name to the American Hell and Damnation Society, and adopt as its motto, "Hell—In hoc signo vinces."

SOME of the religious newspapers are so eager in the gathering and chronicling of news that they hurriedly make undigested and incomprehensible statements, frequently contradicting what they mean to say. For instance, we are told that "a Presbytery in Liverpool, England, employs evangelists, who are in good standing in the Presbyterian Church, sound in the faith, and suitable persons, for a period of three years." The writer of this did not mean to say that these evangelists are backsliders, but the inference naturally to be drawn from the statements that they are sound and suitable for three years is in favor of the most disastrous possibilities of heterodoxy and incompetency at the end of that time.

"MR. CHRISTIANCY reported back from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws the petition of Robert G. Ingersoll and others, asking the repeal, etc., etc. He asked that the Committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and said the petitioners did not ask for the correction of any part of the Revised Statutes on the ground that the revision did not conform to the original law, but they asked for an alteration of the law, and that subject did not belong to the Revision Committee. The petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary."—Senate, Washington, May 15. It is feared this change is not favorable to action on the petition this summer.

ACCORDING to Sir David Wedderburn, writing in the Fortnightly Review, if we wish to learn true politeness we must go to heathen JAPAN, "a country where men never lose their temper, where women and children are always treated with gentleness, where common laborers bow and beg pardon of each other if they happen to jostle accidentally, where popular sports do not inflict suffering on the lower animals, where a paper screen is a sufficient protection against all intrusion—even that of burglars—and where cleanliness takes such a high rank among social virtues as to be carried almost to a ludicrous excess." He says, further, that foreigners who have lived for a considerable time in the interior of Japan, on returning to "civilized society," have even declared that the manners of their own countrymen seem to them vulgar and almost brutal, "accustomed as they have become to a courtesy singularly free from servile or mercenary considerations." This speaks well for the Japanese, and would seem to indicate that even if those heathens do not subscribe to the Christian faith, they at least practice some of the crowning virtues it inculcates. A great deal of money is every year contributed in this country to send out missionaries to Japan to convert that polite and considerate people into modern Christians; and inasmuch as they are quick to adopt whatever is valuable in occidental civilization, the Japanese listen thoughtfully to the evangelists, with a view to profiting by their exhortations. When the missionaries have done their work among the heathens, might they not do us a service by returning to their homes and spending a few years in trying to make us as obedient to the Golden Rule as the Japanese are? Perhaps the Japanese may even be induced to dispatch a few missionaries of their race to this country to teach us to do unto others as we would have them do unto us, and so return the favor we show them in spending so much money and labor to convert them to another religion than Buddhism.

COMSTOCKISM IN ENGLAND.

"MR. TRUELOVE AND THE VICE SOCIETY.—The Vice Society—the wretched association whose name is odious in history as 'the Bridge Street Gang'—have secured a new victim in the person of Edward Truelove, the brave Radical and Freethought bookseller. Another jury has been found ignorant and bigoted enough to bring a man within the grasp of the criminal law, whose only fault was that he differed from them in opinion. These same men would cry out about persecution if, in a Roman Catholic country, their religious heresy were punished by a fine and by imprisonment, and yet the outrage on liberty would not be of a grosser character than the one they have themselves perpetrated. I do not envy those men their feelings. Mr. Truelove is, by their unjust verdict, cut off from all his friends, put on prison fare, condemned to weary solitude, not for any crime, not for any moral error, but wholly and solely because he has defended the right of free publication, and has published an opinion that is, at present, unpopular among the mass of ignorant Christians. That, as knowledge spreads, the opinion for which Mr. Truelove is now suffering will become general is as certain as that the persecution of Galileo could not prevent the ultimate triumph of the scientific truths he taught; natural laws remain, although ignorant juries may deny them; and the suffering now inflicted on Mr. Truelove will, in the eyes of posterity, reflect glory on him and disgrace on his persecutors. Judge and jury would both have done well to remember that in the early part of this century judges and juries measured out the same meed of (in)justice to Carlile, Hetherington, Cleave, Watson, and many another brave bookseller, and that to-day, although the publications are still nominally illegal, the books for which they suffered are found in every library, and are read by every one pretending to the slightest culture. The newspapers that record Edward Truelove's trial and sentence have only been rendered possible because Edward Truelove's predecessors persistently went to jail rather than surrender the right to sell the unstamped press. In those days juries convicted and judges sentenced the brave strugglers; who is there now who does not see that the prisoners were in the right and their enemies in the wrong? Twenty years hence men will marvel at the sentences passed on the free press defenders of the present; but meanwhile the hard struggle goes on, and liberty, as ever, must be bought with pain for price. The recent regulations issued by Mr. Cross weigh with cruel pressure on the innocent whom malice and narrow-mindedness condemn among the guilty. However suitable such regulations may be for the rough and brutal criminals for whom they are intended, and who feel them little, they become simply instruments of torture when applied to the thoughtful and decent-living folk now placed under them. To put Mr. Truelove in a common jail, to allow even his wife to see him only across double iron bars—as though the gentle old man were a dangerous criminal—to refuse him books, paper, or pencil, to feed him on bread and gruel—all this is to bring the administration of justice into contempt, and to induce hatred of a law that can be so grossly misapplied. Mr. Cross is a reasonable and a humane man; he will surely be swift to prevent injustice such as this, and will draw a broad line of demarcation between those whose acts are criminal and those whose opinions are considered to be erroneous. The present ill-timed severity will have no kind of deterrent effect upon those who share Mr. Truelove's opinions. My 'Law of Population' was used against Mr. Truelove as an aggravation of his offense; passing over the utter meanness—worthy only of Collette—of using against a prisoner a book whose author has never been attacked for writing it, does Mr. Collette, or do the authorities, imagine that the severity shown to Mr. Truelove will in any fashion deter me from continuing the Malthusian propaganda? Let me here assure them, one and all, that it will do nothing of the kind; I shall continue to sell the 'Law of Population,' and to advocate scientific checks to population, just as though Mr. Collette and his Vice Society were all dead and buried. In commonest justice they are bound to prosecute me, and if they get and keep a verdict against me, and succeed in sending me to prison, they will only make people more anxious to read my book and make me more personally powerful as a teacher of the views which they attack. I would rather be in Mr. Truelove's place to-day than in Mr. Collette's; the one has the respect and gratitude of all good people; the other is regarded with contempt and scorn even by those who condescend to make use of him and of his disreputable gang of spies and informers.

CHAPTER IX.

"Oh! Edith, you can't guess what news I have brought you," said Myra, as full of girlish excitement she sprang up the porch steps, two at a time, swinging her sun-hat in her hand, and with her curls flying in the wind.

"Well, if I can't guess, you will doubtless be kind enough to tell me, for I see you are just aching to pour it all out," said Edith, smiling.

"So I am, and no wonder either, for it is as interesting as a novel. You know I went to B—— for a few weeks to visit my aunt. While I was there cousin Norman came home from college, and we renewed our old-time boy and girl friendship, told one another all our thoughts and little secrets just as true friends always do. I am naturally very communicative and cousin Norman is just like me in that respect, so we had nice long talks together. I confessed my partiality for Willie Darwin one twilight evening, as we sat talking on the low back porch, and told him all about the family, how good and true they all were, and how wise, intelligent, and refined, and how we had not only grown to love them as friends and neighbors, but that many of us had actually adopted their Infidel opinions and cast off the myths, fables, Bible creeds, and ideas we had held so dear and sacred, and had taken reason and common sense as our guide to truth, depending upon a scientific analysis of the laws of matter and force for a solution of the vexed question as to the how and wherefore of all that is. Norman listened quietly to my story, signifying his interest by asking just questions enough to fully draw me out. I closed by saying, 'Now, cousin mine, I think you are just the man for Rose Darwin. She is the best, smartest, and prettiest girl I ever saw. I am sure you would fall in love with her at first sight.' Norman smiled, and said I was greatly mistaken about that. He said his heart was already given away and to a maiden who was just as nice, pretty, and good as any girl could be; one who possessed all the womanly virtues and perfections in the superlative degree.

"I was awfully disappointed, for I had been building up a nice little romance about my two favorites, and I did hate to have it fall to the ground. Seeing my downcast looks, Norman smiled curiously and asked if I did not want to see his chosen one. 'Of course I do,' said I; 'but I tell you right here I am not going to think she can equal my friend Rose in any particular.'

"He took from his pocket a small album, and opening it said, 'Look, cousin Myra, and take back your hasty words, and own I am right in my encominms upon the lady of my choice.'

"I glanced at the pictured face, and saw Rose's own smiling countenance before me. 'Why Norman, it's Rose herself,' said I in astonishment. 'And is it really she whom you love? Where did you ever see her? Do tell me all about it. Oh! I'm so glad, so happy, I could almost hug you for her right on the spot.'

"'I shan't object to that,' said Norman, smiling, 'though I am no believer in substitutes, vicarious atonement, and all that.' 'But you are not telling me, Norman. Don't you see I'm all curiosity?' said I. 'Yes, I see it plain enough—so I'll confess all about it,' and he related his 'experience' in the following words, as nearly as I can repeat them:

"'About six months ago, while I was at school, I went to see an artist to have some photographs taken, and while looking over the pictures in his show-case, I came across this one. Its beauty, and a something peculiarly attractive about the expression and features, interested me so much that I inquired of the artist who it was. He said it was the likeness of a factory girl in Tennesee, by the name of Rose Darwin, and that was all he knew about her, but he sold me the picture, and wrote her name and address on the back of it. I happened to have a correspondent in the same town, a young lady whom I had befriended in many ways, and to her I wrote inquiring if she knew Rose. She replied she did, and was under great obligations to her for many kindnesses, and that she and Rose were special friends, and that she esteemed the whole family greatly. She said they were superior people, but were unfortunately Infidels, and that had been a great drawback to their social standing in society, but that they were generally liked and respected, and had left a good record there, both morally and financially, and many true friends, as well as some converts to their peculiar opinions and sentiments. She sent me their present address, and I wrote to Rose at once requesting the pleasure of her correspondence, referring her to her friend Miss B—— for credentials as to my character and standing in society, and I offered to send her any further testimonials she might require from this place. She seemed pleased with the idea of thus making a written friendship, and said she thought we might make it mutually improving, even if nothing further came of it. Well, to make a long story short, we have been writing semi-weekly letters to each other for nearly six months, and I believe are better acquainted as regards each others minds, feelings, opinions, hopes, and aspirations, than people generally are who live near neighbors all their lives, for one speaks so much more frankly and openly in a letter than in oral conversation—there is more freedom and less embarassment about it. I am anxious now to make her personal acquaintance, and I shall start in a few weeks for your place. I would go right along with you, Myra, but have some business that will detain me here a while yet, but you and I will enjoy the meeting all the more for a short parting.' I said I did not look for much of his society, considering the greater claims and stronger attractions of Rose. 'Well, you can console yourself with Willie then, and we shall all be mutually pleased,' said Norman, and the conference then ended by mutual promises of 'everlasting secrecy,' for you see he did not want the gossips to get hold of his story until he was sure all would be settled satisfactorily, and besides it would have been so embarassing to Rose, and that is why I've kept quiet all these weeks, and have not even told father or you, which is doing well for a chatterbox like me. But Norman came a few days ago, and last night he was at our house and told me it was all settled, and that he and Rose were to be married in two months. So I just came over on purpose to tell you all about it. I must pour myself out now and then, and as you are the general confidant among us girls, we all come to you with our joys and troubles. No one seems to enter so really and sympathizingly into the plans and hopes of everybody as you do, except Mrs. Darwin. But she is a married woman, and we don't feel quite as free to talk of such things to old folks, you know. But I am not done yet, Edith. Norman gave me some letters which I am going to read to you, as they are a part of the romance I've been telling you. One always does enjoy a real-life story so much better than made-up novels in books, and I know you appreciate this one as well as I do."

HUNGER AND LOVE.

Interesting examples in relation to the change of correlations in the struggle for life are furnished also by those isolated oceanic islands, uninhabited by man, on which at different times goats and pigs have been placed by navigators. These animals become wild, and having no enemies, they increase in number so excessively, that the rest of the animal and vegetable population suffer in consequence, and the island finally may become almost a waste, because there is insufficient food for the large mammals which increase too numerously. In some cases on an island thus overrun with goats and pigs, other navigators have let loose a couple of dogs, who enjoyed this superabundance of food, and they again increased so numerously, and made such havoc among the herds, that after several years the dogs themselves lacked food, and they also almost died out. The equilibrium of species continually changes in this manner in nature's economy, accordingly as one or another species increases at the expense of the rest. In most cases the relations of different species of animals and plants to one another are much too complicated for us to be able to follow them, and I leave it to the reader to picture to himself what an infinitely complicated machinery is at work in every part of the world in consequence of this struggle. The impulses which started the struggle, and which altered and modified it in different places, are in the end seen to be the impulses of self-preservation—in fact, the instinct leading individuals to preserve themselves (the instinct of obtaining food), and the instinct leading them to preserve the species) instinct of propagation). It is these two fundamental instincts of organic self-preservation of which Schiller, the idealist (not Goethe, the realist!) says:

"Meanwhile, until philosophy
Sustains the structure of the world,
Her workings will be carried on
By hunger and by love."

It is these two powerful fundamental instincts which, by their varying activity, produce such extraordinary differences in species through the struggle for life. They are the foundations of the phenomena of Inheritance and Adaptation. We have, in fact, traced all phenomena of Inheritance to propagation, all phenomena of Adaptation to nutrition, as the two wider classes of material phenomena to which they belong.

The struggle for life in natural selection acts with as much selective power as does the will of man in artificial selection. The latter, however, acts according to a plan and consciously, the former without a plan and unconsciously. This important difference between artificial and natural selection deserves especial consideration. For we learn by it to understand how arrangements serving a purpose can be produced by mechanical causes acting without an object, as well as by causes acting for an object. The products of natural selection are arranged even more for a purpose than the artificial products of man, and yet they owe their existence not to a creative power acting for a definite purpose, but to a mechanical relation acting unconsciously and without a plan. If we had not thoroughly considered the interaction of Inheritance and Adaptation under the influence of the struggle for life, we should not at first be inclined to expect such results from this natural process of selection as are, in fact, furnished by it. It may therefore be appropriate here to mention a few especially striking examples of the activity of natural selection.

Let us first take Darwin's homochromic selection of animals, or the so-called "sympathetic selection of colors," into consideration. Earlier naturalists have remarked that numerous animals are of nearly the same color as their dwelling-place, or the surroundings in which they permanently live. Thus, for example, plant-lice and many other insects living on leaves are of a green color. The inhabitants of the deserts, the Jerboa, or leaping mice, foxes of the desert, gazelles, lions, etc., are mostly of a yellow or yellowish-brown color, like the sand of the desert. The polar animals, which live on the ice and snow, are white or grey, like ice and snow. Many of these animals change their color in summer and winter. In summer, when the snow partly vanishes, the fur of these polar creatures becomes brownish-grey or blackish, like the naked earth, while in winter it again becomes white. Butterflies and insects which hover round the gay and bright flowers are like them in color. Now, Darwin explains this surprising circumstance quite simply by the fact that such colors as agree with the color of the habitation are of the greatest use to the animals concerned. If these animals are animals of prey, they will be able to approach the object of their pursuit more safely and with less likelihood of observation, and, in like manner, those animals which are pursued will be able to escape more easily, if their color is as little different as possible from that of their surroundings. If therefore originally an animal species varied so as to present cases of all colors, those individuals whose color most resembled the surroundings must have been most favored in the struggle for life. They remained more unobserved, maintained and propagated themselves, while those individuals or varieties differently colored died out.

I have tried to explain, by the same sympathetic selection of color, the wonderful fact that the majority of pelagic animals—that is, of those which live on the surface of the open sea—are bluish, or completely colorless and transparent, like glass and water itself. Such colorless, glassy animals are met with in the most different classes. To them belong, among fish, the Helmicthyidæ, through whose crystalline bodies the words of a book can be read; among the molluscs, the finned snails (Heteropods) and sea-butterflies, or whales-food (Pteropods); among worms, the Salpæ, Alciope, and Sagitta; further, a great number of pelagic crabs (Crustacea), and the greater part of the Medusæ Umbrella-jellies (Discomedusæ); Comb-jellies (Ctenophora). All of these pelagic animals, which float on the surface of the ocean, are transparent and colorless, like glass and like the water itself, while their nearest kin live at the bottom of the ocean, and are colored and opaque like the inhabitants of the land. This remarkable fact, like the sympathetic coloring of the inhabitants of the earth, can be explained by natural selection. Among the ancestors of the pelagic glass-like animals which showed a different degree of colorlessness and transparency, those that were the most colorless and transparent must have been most favored in the active struggle for life which takes place on the surface of the ocean. They were enabled to approach their prey the most easily unobserved, and were themselves least observed by their enemies. Hence they could preserve and propagate themselves more easily than their more colored and opaque relatives; and finally, by accumulative adaptation and transmission by inheritance, through natural selection, in the course of many generations their bodies would attain that degree of crystal-like transparency and colorlessness which we at present admire in them. (Gen. Morph. ii. 242.)

No less interesting and instructive than homochromic selection is that species of natural selection which Darwin calls "sexual selection," which explains the origin of the so-called "secondary sexual characters." We have already mentioned these subordinate sexual characteristics, so instructive in many respects, They comprise those peculiarities of animals and plants which belong only to one of the two sexes, and which do not stand in any direct relation to the act of propagation itself. Such secondary sexual characters occur in great variety among animals. We all know how striking is the difference of the two sexes in size and color in many birds and butterflies. The male sex is generally the larger and more beautiful. It often possesses special decorations or weapons; as for example, the spur and comb of the cock, the antlers of the stag and deer, etc. All these peculiarities of the two sexes have nothing directly to do with propagation itself, which is effected by the "primary sexual characters," or actual sexual organs.

Now, the origin of these remarkable "secondary sexual characters" is explained by Darwin simply by a choice or selection which takes place in the propagation of animals. In most animals the number of individuals of both sexes is unequal; either the number of the female or the number of the male individuals is greater, and, as a rule, when the season of propagation approaches, a struggle takes place between the rivals for the possession of the animals of the other sex. It is well known with what vigor and vehemence this struggle is fought out among the higher animals—among mammals and birds—especially among those of polygamous habits. Among gallinaceous birds, where for one cock there are several hens, a severe struggle takes place between the competing cocks for as large a harem as possible. The same is the case with many ruminating animals. Among stags and deer, for instance, at the period of rut, deadly struggles take place between the males for the possession of the females. The secondary sexual character which here distinguishes the males—the antlers of stags and deer—not possessed by the female, is, according to Darwin, the consequence of that struggle. Here the motive and cause determining the struggle is not, as in the case of the struggle for individual existence, self-preservation, but the preservation of the species—propagation. There are numerous passive weapons of defence, as well as active weapons for attack. The lion's mane, not possessed by the female, is evidently such a weapon of defence; it is an excellent means of protection against the bites which the male lions try to inflict on each other's necks when fighting for the females; consequently those males with the strongest manes have the greatest advantage in the sexual struggle. The dewlap of the ox and the comb of the cock are similar defensive weapons. Active weapons of attack, on the other hand, are the antlers of the stag, the tusks of the boar, the spur of the cock, and the hugely developed pair of jaws in the male stag-beetle; all are instruments employed by the males in the struggle for the females, for annihilating or chasing away their rivals.

Astro-Theology.

BY L. L. DAWSON.—CONCLUDED.

The sun represents the male element, which, after passing the vernal equinox, fecundates the earth, or Virgin, by the heat of its rays, and the fruitful earth bringeth forth in abundance.

Near the constellation of the Virgin is the constellation Bootes, which in the beginning represented Adam, and in the New-Testament times became Io-Seppe, or Joseph, the husband of Mary the Virgin.

After the sign Virgo, the sun passes into the sign Libra, the Balance. The Scales of Justice, which, being the last sign above the line, and in heaven, while the vernal equinox is in the sign of the Lamb, represent the Apocalyptic "Day of Judgment." In this sign the Lamb of God, that entered on his ministry in the sign of Aries, is crucified, by crossing the equinoctial line in the descending scale, or autumnal equinox. The sweat of blood just before the crucifixion refers to the blood of the grape, which, the sun having ripened, is now in the vintage. After the crucifixion, which is accomplished by the sun crossing the line, the Lamb descends into hell, which is the region below the line, in the region of winter.

The cross has been an emblem of the Church ever since its organization, and the form on the cross was that of a lamb. "But in the year 680 of our era, under the reign of Constantine Pagonatus, in the sixth Constantinopolitan council, held under Pope Agathus, in the eighty-second decree of that council, it was decreed, and the decree subsequently ratified by Pope Adrian I., that instead of Christ's being represented in the form of a crucified Lamb, which had up to that time been the only emblem of the crucifixion, he should be represented in the form of a crucified man" (Taylor, Devil's Pulpit, p. 221).

The next sign in the regular course is Scorpio, the Scorpion. This sign once having been in heaven, but, being dissatisfied at the low position it held, incited a rebellion, and, fighting with Michael, who is commander of the hosts of heaven, is likely to prevail, when the Lamb of God, or Son of the King of Heaven, coming up on the other side, reinforces the hosts of heaven, and Michael prevails; and on St. Michael's Day, or Michaelmas Day, occurs the autumnal equinox, the day that the sun passes below the line. The arch-traitor, Apolyon, preferring to reign in hell than to serve in heaven, jumps from the battlements of heaven, and, being the highest sign below the line, may appropriately be called the king of the lower regions. This rebel, after being cast out of heaven, becomes the Adversary, and is called by different names. In earlier times he is known as the Snake, Serpent, etc., and, as a snake, tempted Eve in the Garden of Eden. "The Snake in very early times was a symbol of the male organ of generation" (Inman's Ancient Pagan Symbols, p. 14. Also refer to the signs of the zodiac in any almanac as to the part represented by the Scorpion). And on the snake tempting Eve, she picked an apple and gave to Adam. "The apple was symbolical of a desire for close sexual relation" (Inman's Ancient Pagan Symbols, p. 56). And after the beguilement of Eve the Snake was condemned to humiliation in the dust, and the penalty passed on Eve was as follows: "In sorrow thou shalt bring forth children, and thy desire shall be to thy husband" (Genesis iii, 16). Also, the Scorpion is known in later times as Satan, Devil, and "the worm that never dieth."

The next sign after Scorpio is Sagittarius, the Bowman, or Hunter, and is represented as having the body and legs of a horse, with the head and shoulders of a man, and in the hands is a bow. This sign represents Pharaoh, of the Old Testament, who, in pursuit of the Israelites, is drowned in the Red Sea.

The Rev. R. Taylor says: "The word Mary is, as every one knows, the same as the Latin word Mare, the sea, and in its plural form, Maria—pronounced Maria—signifies the seas, as the adjective Marina, of or pertaining to the sea, read without the letter n, after the ancient manner of writing, is the same word, and was, from the days of an infinitely remote antiquity, one of the names of the goddess Venus. The marine Venus, as she was called by the Romans; the Venus Anadromene of the Greeks—that is, Venus rising out of the sea—that is precisely the character of Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron, at the moment of their leading up the children of Israel out of the Red Sea, when she sang that beautiful allegorical song upon the moment of her foot standing on the horizon, or shore, of the mighty deep: 'Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider he hath thrown into the sea.' At that moment, when Spica Virginius is at the horizon, the star Pollux is at the meridian, and Sagittarius (the horse and his rider, who is the Pharaoh of the Old Testament and the Saul of the New) directly pursuing Miriam and her company, is at the bottom of the sea" (Devil's Pulpit, p. 135; also p. 315). "Thus, not more accurately drawn on the celestial globe than in divine revelation" (vi, 2). "Behold a white horse, and he that sat on him had a bow, and a crown was given unto him, and he went forth conquering and to conquer."

The sun, having passed through eleven signs, now comes to the twelfth and last sign; that is, the sign Capricornus, the Goat. The Goat represents the animal that was in the stable in which Christ was born on the 25th of December. The Goat is also called the Creator. The Rev. R. Taylor says: "The original Samaritan Hebrew text of the Samaritan Pentateuch of the first chapter of Genesis was: 'In the beginning the Goat created the heavens and the earth'" (Astro-Theological Lectures, p. 163; also p. 180). "In the annual renewal of the circle of the heavens and the earth, which commences in the winter solstice, immediately after the shortest day, 21st of December, or when first the sun appears to have gained the first degree of ascension, which is on the 25th of December, our Christmas Day, you see the sun is in Capricornus, the Goat, who is, therefore, the Creator—that is, the renewer, or first opener—of the annually-repeated Genesis, or creation, of the heavens and the earth." Also, he says: "Capricornus, the Goat, in the pagan mythology, is said to have suckled the infant Jupiter; of which enigma the undoubted solution is, that the sun, who is Jupiter, first beginning to rise on the 25th of December, when the days—having been at the shortest on the 21st, or St. Thomas' Day (so that unbelieving Thomas doubted whether the sun would rise again)—first appear to be lengthening again, the sun, or Jupiter, or Jesus, is said to be born, or brought up with the Goat. Thus, among the nations who reckoned the year to begin at the winter solstice—that is, in Capricornus, the Goat—the first sentence of the first chapter of their book of Genesis was, as in the first copies of the Samaritan Pentateuch, 'In the beginning the Goat created the heavens and the earth,' while those who reckoned the year to begin from the vernal equinox—that is, when the sun enters the sign Aries, the Ram, which is the tribe of Gad in the zodiacal Israel—placed Gad as the first of the tribes, and have handed down their Hebrew text." In the beginning Gad—that is, the Ram—created the heaven and the earth. This creation takes place every year on the 25th of March, called Lady Day, or the day of the conception of the blessed Virgin Mary, who, exactly nine months afterwards, on the first moment of the 25th of December, brings forth her first-born, Jesus, and lays him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn" (Devil's Pulpit, pp. 42, 43).

In this sign the Lamb of God, that was crucified in the sign Libra, descends into the grave on the 21st of December, and remains there three days, the 21st being St. Thomas's Day, the shortest day of the year, and the following days are of about the same length; but on the 24th the days begin to lengthen; on which St. Thomas, who, having been fearful that Christ, or the sun, would never rise again, on seeing that the Christ is risen, shouted, "My Lord and my God." Christ, having risen from the dead, ascends up into heaven; that is, the sun rises higher and higher, until it passes the vernal equinox, when occurs the feast of the Passover of the Israelites of the Old Testament, and, since the times of the New Testament, the festival of Easter, to commemorate Christ's resurrection from the dead.

The Rev. R. Taylor says: "Easter is never on any other day than Sunday, because it is the sun, and the sun alone, who is our Lord and Savior" (Astro-Theological Lectures, p. 321). Sir Bulwer-Lytton says: "Before the Christian era, the Sunday was called the Lord's Day, i. e., the day of the Lord, the sun" (Leila, p. 160; note).

These twelve signs of the zodiac are the twelve apostles or disciples of Christ whom he called after he entered the ministry, that is, after he, the sun, had risen above the line at the vernal equinox, and of course the one represented by the fishes was the last one called; and in speaking of them Christ calls them fishermen. After the resurrection they are told by Christ to tarry at a certain place until they are endowed with the Holy Ghost; and while they were waiting in an upper room the Holy Ghost came down on them in tongues of fire. What can better illustrate the allegory than the signs of the zodiac, which are constellations of stars, which are in their houses or mansions in the heavens, and when the sun has risen into heaven, it shines down by fierce rays that may be appropriately illustrated by "tongues of fire."

The twelve signs of the zodiac also represent the twelve tribes of Israel, as has been touched on before; and to show that they not only represented the twelve tribes of Israel, but are in use in the churches of the present day, I quote from Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine for April, 1877 (p. 511), as follows: "The signs of the zodiac are to be seen on the flat, painted roof of Waltham Abbey Church, and also in the restored tessellated pavement in the Lady Chapel of Chichester Cathedral, in England. Josephus' 'Antiquities' states that the signs of the zodiac, with the names of the twelve tribes, were engraved on the stones in the breast-plate of the high priest."

It may be asked, If the signs of the zodiac illustrate or represent the twelve tribes, where is the origination of the children of Israel? The name of Abram, from whom the Israelites sprang, is composed of two parts—ab, father; and ram, elevation; that is, Elevated Father, or Father of Elevation, which is the Arabic name or title given to the planet Saturn, which, being the planet of our system (then known) furthest removed from the sun, and taking a longer time to make the circuit of its revolution, is called the Father of Time, or Father of Heaven, and as such Saturn is represented as an aged man with a forelock, hourglass, and scythe. The Phœnician name of Saturn is Israel, by some nations called Azrael or Esrael, the angel of death, because time mows down all. As the planet Saturn is the furthest from the center, there must be many stars, or hosts of heaven, beneath it; and as Saturn, or Abram, was the Father of Elevation, then those beneath must be the children, and were called Benni Yesroile, or children of Israel. From the rings of Saturn, which appear to be cut off from the father, or male element, is derived the rite of circumcision. The planet Saturn was worshiped as "our Father who art in Heaven," and this worship was made or given on the seventh day, Saturn's Day, or Saturday, the day on which the Creator rested from his labors; but when the worship was changed from Saturn to the sun, the day of worship was changed from the seventh day to the first day, or Sunday. "The Chaldeans discovered the motions of the heavenly bodies. The planets they called their interpreters, ascribing to Saturn the highest rank; the next in eminence was Sol, the sun" (History of Astronomy, in "To Learn and to Know," p. 35).

Christ, in the allegory, is a worshiper of Saturn; in proof of which see his prayer in which he taught his disciples how to pray, commonly called "The Lord's Prayer," but in which there is not a reference to the Lord, but it is to "our Father who art in Heaven;" and in no place does he make a petition to any other than "our Father," or Father Abram or Abraham.

The twelve signs of the zodiac also represent the twelve gates of the heavenly city, in the midst of which is the great white throne on which sits the Lamb—the sun.

In every church in the land, and many times in each service, is the name of the sun invoked, though perhaps unwittingly. It is invocated under its title, Amen, which is generally supposed to mean so let it be; but it is only a transformation, made in the course of time, of the word Ammon, the ancient Ammonian title of the sun; the transformations or changes in pronunciation being: Ammon, Amon, Omen, Aumen, Amen; and under the last pronunciation it is used to end prayers, benedictions, etc., also as giving assent to the subject of discourse. As an ending of prayer which closes, "Through our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen," or Ammon, is really as follows: Through our Lord Jesus Christ, the Sun, or Everlasting Fire.

But it may be asked why the more modern terms, as "Gad" or "God," etc., are used in reference to or with preceding time, as "In the beginning," etc. The only answer I can give is that the Old Testament cannot be traced back further than the time of Ezra, about 450 B.C., which may have been about the time the precession of the equinoxes would have brought the sun's crossing the line first into the sign Aries, and in writing up their traditions they mixed with them the signs of the then present time, and the many translations they have passed through have not helped to elucidate the mystery.

The study of astro-theology is very interesting, as it explains many things that otherwise are only dark sayings; and any one wishing to follow it further can do so in the "Astro-Theological Lectures" and the "Devil's Pulpit," by Rev. R. Taylor, and "The Hierophant," by G. C. Stewart.

IV.

Light always travels in a straight line, through a region which is perfectly and uniformly diaphanous. But a mere difference of density is sufficient to bring about its deviation from the straight line, and to break it up into heterogeneous quantities.

As the various strata of the air all vary in density, it follows that the light of the stars does not come to us in a straight line, and that we do not see them in the position which they actually occupy. At the horizon there are at least 33′ of refraction, or, in other words, rather more than the largest diameter of the sun or the moon. Thus, when the lower margins of the latter luminaries seem to be just upon the horizon, in reality the whole of their disc is submerged beneath it. The same illusions take place in our observations of the stars and of far distant bodies. But as light, in its passage through the various strata of the atmosphere, does not encounter any sudden change of density, so it does not break suddenly off, as, for instance, in its passage from the air into water or a tumbler. It follows a curved line, and not a broken one. The refraction of the light from the sun and moon gives us the benefit of their presence for a longer period, as it anticipates the hour of their rising, and delays that of their setting. It is to refraction that we owe the dawn which heralds the brightness of day, and the twilight which precedes the darkness of night. The refraction of light also flattens these luminaries, and makes their disc look oval. This is all the more pronounced the nearer they are to the horizon, and, as Biot has remarked, "when seen from eminences near the seashore it sometimes equals a fifth of the apparent diameter of the sun. The moon's disc presents the same phenomenon."

Light which, having passed through a very refracting region, reaches a space where the refraction is not so great, will sometimes stop at the point which separates the two spaces, undergo a total reflection, and travel back through the spaee which it had already traversed. This peculiar phenomenon takes place whenever the rays reach the surface of emersion at too great an angle of obliquity. The fact of this total reflection explains all the varieties of magical phenomena known as mirages.

In my work on the "History of Meteors," a chapter is specially devoted to this subject, and contains many facts connected therewith which I ascertained during my travels in the New World.

V.

The phenomena of luminous interferences will appear to people who are not well acquainted with optic discoveries, perhaps even more marvelous and incredible than those of the mirage.

Supposing a bright ray of solar light to come in direct encounter with a sheet of white paper, for instance, it follows that the portion of the paper on which the ray strikes will be made to shimmer. But what seems incredible is, that this portion may be made quite dark without touching the paper, without arresting or diminishing the luminous ray, but, on the contrary, by increasing it.

The magic mode of changing light into shade, day into night, is even more remarkable for its simplicity than for its prodigious effects, consisting as it does, in conducting on to the paper, by a slightly different trajectory, a second luminous ray, which of itself would have made the paper still more brilliant. One might imagine that the two rays, when they met, would have this effect; but, on the contrary, light added to light produces darkness! The movements of these rays neutralize each other, and the light ceases to cast any lustre. It will happen, however, that these luminous rays, by reason of their direction, only partially neutralize each other, in which case there is merely a diminution of the lustre.

These are the curious phenomena, which, obliterating or diminishing light by the adjunction of a luminous ray, have received the name of interferences.

Of the thousand rays of variegated shade and refrangibility which compose colorless (or white) light, those only are capable of neutralizing each other which possess co-ordinate colors and refrangibility. Thus, a red ray cannot be made to obliterate a green ray.

If, again, two white rays cross each other at a given point, it may happen that, in the infinite series of various colored lights of which they are composed, the red ray, for instance, will alone disappear, and that the point of their intersection will become green—green being white minus the red.

Two rays which have been changed from the state of natural light into polarized rays following the same direction, will still possess the property of interference, combining or neutralizing each other like, and under the same conditions as, ordinary rays.

Two rays which pass, without any intermediate stage, from their natural state into that of rays polarized at right angles, are definitely deprived of the property of interference. Though their course, the character, and the thickness of the spaces they traverse be modified in a thousand ways; though they be brought back to the state of reflections combined of the requisite properties, or to parallel polarizations, it will be impossible to make them obliterate each other.

But if two rays which were polarized in two rectangular directions, and which could not, therefore, have any influence upon each other, had in the first place undergone parallel polarizations when transformed from their natural condition, they could be made to obliterate each other merely by restoring them to the state of polarization with which they were originally endowed.

It is impossible to avoid a feeling of surprise when one learns, for the first time, that two luminous rays are capable of destroying each other, and that darkness may result from the conjunction of two lights; but it is still more extraordinary that this property can be given and then taken away from them, in some cases momentarily, in others altogether. The theory of interferences, looked at from this point of view, might seem rather the product of a diseased brain, to use Arago's expression, than the strict and inevitable outcome of numerous experiments which cannot be controverted.

It was in this theory that Fresnel found the key to all the beautiful phenomena of coloration engendered by the crystallized plates, or films, which are endowed with double refraction, proving that they were special instances of interference. Dr. S. Young has achieved his greatest renown by his experimental and complete demonstrations concerning interferences, and the principles which he laid down were set forth and still further applied by Fresnel.

The theory of undulation suggested by Descartes in explanation of the phenomena of light had been already accepted by the savants, and the most recent experiments in regard to interference confirm its perfect accuracy.

VI.

We now come to the question of the spectrum analysis. It is not only the sunlight which can be decomposed and made to produce a spectrum, but any other kind of light as well. It is, however, very remarkable that these lights, when decomposed, give different spectra, and by examining their character that of the bodies which produce them can also be ascertained.

The study of a body by the analysis of its spectrum is termed the spectrum analysis.

M. Delaunay, of the Institute, gives the following résumé of this discovery, so fruitful in its consequences. In order to separate, if possible, the partial images produced by the various unmixed lights, of which uncolored (or white) light is composed, one naturally endeavors to make each of these images as narrow as possible, to prevent them from encroaching upon each other. This may be done by admitting the light from without through an opening in the shape of a narrow chink, standing some distance back to examine it, and placing the prism in such a way that its square edges will be parallel to the length of the chink. Wollaston tried this plan in 1802, a century after Newton had discovered the solar spectrum; and the result partially answered his expectations. Submitting certain artificial lights, such as the flame of a candle and an electric spark, he obtained results analogous to, but not identical with, that yielded by the sunlight. Yet Wollaston, in thus looking with the naked eye through the prism, obtained but a vague glimpse of the phenomenon which he was in research of, and which Fraunhofer was destined to discover in all its splendor.

In 1815 that noted Munich optician, without being aware of the essay made by Wollaston thirteen years previously, endeavored to scan through a prism the spectral outline of a ray of light admitted through a narrow chink; and to observe it more closely he made use of a glass. The spectrum then appeared to him traversed, not by four or five dark rays, as it did to Wollaston, but by a far greater number. He saw, in fact, as many as five or six hundred. He then proceeded to measure accurately the relative positions of a large number of these rays, and made a drawing of the spectrum, with 354 of them in their respective places. He also ascertained, like Wollaston, that the spectra given by artificial lights are distinguished by a special disposition of these rays, and, in some cases, even by a complete absence of them.

Fraunhofer's discovery drew the attention of scientific men to the subject, and numerous experiments were undertaken for the purpose of studying the curious phenomena which he had revealed to the world.

It must be added that a very remarkable relation has been established between the brilliant rays produced by gas in a state of combustion, and the obscure rays which this same gas creates in the spectrum of a light passing through it. These rays, brilliant in the one case, obscure in the other, occupy absolutely identical places in the spectrum Where hydrogen gas, for instance, produces a brilliant ray when on fire, the same gas produces an obscure ray by the absorption which it exercises upon an extraneous light passing through it. This remarkable circumstance, known as the inversion of the spectrum, was first pointed out by Foucault, in 1849, and definitely established by Kirchhoff ten years later.

Such are the various phases which the question of spectrum analysis has passed through.

Mr. Abbot and the Petition.

A SEARCHING REVIEW, BY THERON C. LELAND.

Patience is exhausted. The persistent and unjust attacks upon the seventy thousand signers of the anti-Comstock petition continue in The Index, and the reflections upon their morality and motives seem likely never to end. We propose a counter attack, and hereby make declaration of war. If the war should straggle into "Africa," it will be because we hold envious, faint-hearted, half and half Liberals, who traduce the character of others in order to build up their own, as we hold the rest of mankind—enemies in war, in peace—well, such characters we hold enemies in peace too!

For myself, I have admired The Index, honored its editor, and am in full sympathy with the National Liberal League, of which he was the founder, and is now the active, and I wish I could say the honored, president. Not till his revolt in an important battle, and retreat in the face of the enemy, on the Comstock question, have I had any essential criticism to make upon his Liberalism, or dissent from his editorial work. But, in spirit and in word, he is so radically wrong on that question, so indefensibly bitter and unjust towards the seventy thousand signers of the petition for "repeal or modification," that the endurance we have so long imposed upon ourselves, for the sake of peace, ceases to be a virtue, and would soon degenerate into pusillanimity. A sharp remonstrance, or, if it must be, open war, comes now to be in order.

After long hoping that he had said his last assailing word, hurled his last fling at the wholly innocent victims of the Comstock laws, and would finally not quite abandon the cause of Freethought and ally himself with Comstock, Colgate, & Co., dealers in "free nastiness," to use his own fragrant phrase, born, as we must suppose, of the flowering out of theological culture, the Liberals of this country are at last reluctantly compelled to abandon hope and surrender him to the enemy, to whom he appears bodily to have gone over. In behalf of the seventy thousand signers of the petition, of which I am proud to count myself one, I propose to point a lance in their defense against this pervert, first from Christianity, and then from Liberalism, now become the censor and common scold of the Liberals of this country. I grieve to have to perform the office. I take no pleasure in the punishment of the transgressor; and would infinitely rather agree with mine opponent and become reconciled, if agreement did not lead me clear away back into the bloody centuries of the Inquisition. If the flagellation I am about to administer shall redeem the prodigal from the error of his latter-day ways, it will yield that compensation and consolation which fathers feel when their chastenings bring repentance and work for the good of the offender. If, however, he is unimprovable, and the chastening only hardens his heart and makes him ten times more the child of the orthodox fold—from which he ought never to have departed—and so the last end of that man shall be worse than the first, then I hope my criticism will prove to be words of encouragement to the seventy thousand who signed the petition, and to the hundreds of thousands of other Liberals over the country who mourn as those who cannot be comforted because they had not the opportunity and the felicity of signing it—helping them to lift up their heads bowed down in orthodox and Indexical shame, and feel some small returning assurance that they are not quite the off-scourings of the earth.

Now, I propose to go back to the beginning of this "unpleasantness" and give the whole course of it a critical review in a series of articles for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Many things can now be made manifest which in mid career of the development, while the fur was flying so, could not be clearly brought out. In going back, I propose to go backward, taking the last two anathemas from The Index Vatican first. These last allocutions, after hot blood had been supposed to be cooled, and after the animus of the Comstock prosecutions of Liberals was still more clearly manifest, seemed to be wholly uncalled-for, and have angered the 70,000 the most; especially since two clergymen, one of the last century and one of this, were the only founts of inspiration to whom the theologically educated Liberal could go for texts.

As this introduction is already long, I hold the little sweet-scented bouquet from The Index of May 2d up to the noses of THE TRUTH SEEKER constituency first. Here it follows, and the whole of it; so Mr. Abbott cannot complain that our readers have had no opportunity to see it. I think he will rather wish they hadn't:

"Rev. Mr. Eldridge, pastor of the Congregational Church, East Weymouth, Massachusetts, gave a sermon on April 7, which contained the following passage, as reported in the Weymouth Gazette of April 12:

'If there is a work of hell carried on on earth, it is the dissemination of obscene literature among the young. Comstock, the Christian man who has waged war on this crime, declares that years past tons of the vilest matter have annually been sent to tens of thousands of children in our schools, to defile their imaginations, inflame their passions, and initiate these little ones in a course of vice. Just when Comstock had his hand ready to throttle this gigantic iniquity, a bill [petition] is handed in to Congress to protect it, and on the list the name of Robert Ingersoll stands first. 'By their fruits ye shall know them,' saith the Scriptures; and now look upon these flowers of Infidelity, and tell me what it is worth?'

"That is a specimen of the attacks on Liberalism which have been directly invited by the petition referred to; and they will multiply like mushrooms. Of course we all understand that very few of the Liberals who signed it really intended to protect the kind of literature above referred to; but, misled by unwise counsels, they blindly blundered into the petitioning for the total repeal of the "obscene literature" laws, and not simply for their radical modification. They will have to pay for this blunder by being held up (falsely, of course) by their opponents everywhere as champions and defenders of the vile stuff described above. The consequence in all likelihood will be that, instead of securing the repeal of those vague and dangerous laws, they will fail to secure even the least modification of them. The blunder of despising the necessary discriminations we pointed out at the time will react most mischievously on the Liberal cause everywhere; it gives Anthony Comstock and his backers exactly the argument they wanted. We have drawn an avalanche of angry and absurd abuse on our head by giving timely warning of the trap into which the petitioners have been decoyed, and we expect more of the same sort; but those who appreciate the wisdom of our warning will multiply just in proportion as sober reflection takes the place of undiscriminating excitement among the Liberals of the country. Liberals who have signed that petition, you cannot afford to stand before the people as the apologists or defenders of the kind of literature above referred to; you cannot defend your own undoubted rights, if you persist in confounding free thought with free nastiness; you have got to make the discriminations we have pointed out, and the sooner you do it, the better it will be for yourselves and your cause. You may vilify us all if you please; but you will regret your own vilifications at last, for they will only make your miserable mistake all the sooner visible to the world."

Now, dear, unhappy editor of The Index! please tell us: Were there never any attacks on Liberalism before the Comstock era? Is that petition the only act of freethinking men that ever brought down attacks upon Liberalism? Since when, Mr. Abbot, have Liberals been in the habit of asking the orthodox party what they may say or do in order to not "directly invite attacks on Liberalism"? Did Voltaire, Rousseau, Thomas Paine, or any of the fathers of early dawning Freethought, take counsel of their fears, and study how not to speak their real opinions, and how to write, petition, or appeal in bated breath and in such prudent phrase and ways as would not bring down attacks on Liberalism? And have you, O editor of The Index, all these years, since you drifted into the camp of Liberalism, been advocating its principles with an eye single to the attacks on Liberalism which your advocacy might invite? Did you start out in the first place with the resolution to so write and edit a paper and organize a league that you would evoke no attacks on Liberalism? And do you now mean to call on us 70,000 to so trim and veer and sail by Mr. Eldridge's compass and Comstock's chart, and the orthodox breeze generally, as to invite no attacks on Liberalism? May the great Being whom the clerical side of you calls God help you if you do; for hath he not inspired it to be written, out of the mouth of his only-begotten son, "Woe unto you when all men speak well of you"?

These attacks, he says, "will multiply like mushrooms." Yes, so they will, if all Liberal editors should turn toadies like this one, slink away under their stools, and quote the attacks with cowardly apology if not downright approval.

Did you "all understand," Mr. Abbot, that any Liberal who signed that petition—that one single one of those 70,000—had the first idea of "protecting the kind of literature above referred to"? You could not have so understood it? Even Comstock, his backers, Eldridge, and all the rest of the pious crowd, do not so understand it. It is only your own envious impotence, and impudence, and impdom generally, that simply pretend to so understand it.

"But, misled by unwise counsels!" That is the disastrous mistake we all made. If THE TRUTH SEEKER had been published in Boston, so its editor could have suffered under "the quality of mercy" that is strained—through a Boston court, and so we could have enjoyed the wise counsel of the editor of The Index, we might have surrendered off-hand to Comstock, let him have his own sweet will unresisted, stopped publishing THE TRUTH SEEKER, handed its subscription list over to The Index—then, with such a reaping where other men have sown, everything would have been lovely and serene. But, being published in the great free and independent city of New York, you see, we never thought of Boston, its merciful courts, and The Index, with its 8th Demandment in one column repudiating "Christian morality," and its editorials in other columns "demanding" that 70,000 of us should conform to Christian morality and shouldn't sign that petition. These guarantees against blundering never occurred to us; and, led by the unwise counsels of a sharp New York lawyer—Liberal lawyer, too, at that—who thoroughly examined the question and looked into the law and constitutionality of the case, we just blindly blundered into petitioning for "repeal or modification." Mr. Abbot, in his intense way, says we petitioned for "total repeal," and then makes it more intense with italics. There is a wide difference between "repeal or modification" and "total repeal;" and then "total repeal" in italics widens the difference frightfully. But the exact truth must be very scarce in The Index office, and they have to be sparing of what little they have.

"They will have to pay for this blunder," the Index prophet says. Of course we will. We knew that; but then, the pay is cheap. It don't cost us anything to be "held up." We are always being "held up" whatever we do ("falsely, of course"). The thing that surprised us—just a little, at first, till we remembered Mr. Abbot's theologic pedigree; then we said, "Of course, we might have expected it"—was that Mr. Abbot should appear with such alacrity among those by whom we were being "held up" ("falsely, of course"). One prophecy is as good as another, and it is my opinion that the time will come when he will wish he had "held up."

Now look at the consequence. "In all likelihood [more prophecy] we won't secure repeal or even the least modification." He don't say how long, "in all likelihood," we will fail; it may be for twenty minutes or a thousand years. But some of us, as old-time Abolitionists, remember that we failed to repeal the Fugitive Slave law. We wrote, printed, petitioned, and protested, year after year, and failed every time, to secure "even the least modification" of it. But one day, all of a sudden, some of us have a dim, blurred, almost faded-out recollection that something happened to it. We "heard something drap," and we haven't seen hide nor hair of the Fugitive Slave law since. We are in no hurry to have the Comstock laws repealed or modified. We can stand them as long as the Abbot and Comstock party can. They are a good grievance. They rally the friends of freedom under one flag everywhere. They fire the Liberal heart and induce organization for defense. They rouse public indignation higher and higher at each new outrage, just as the slave law did, and we propose to fight it out on the "repeal or modification" line if it distresses Abbot and Comstock all summer. We can afford a few martyrs for the sake of the good that may come. Abbot is poor stuff for a martyr, we know—he will apologize and recant altogether too quick for any inquisitor; but Bennett and Heywood don't mind it; Heywood rather likes to be kept under bonds—it fills his audiences and his subscription lists, and the general ear of the public with his sayings, as they never were filled before; and as to Mrs. Chase, it was just heaven for the space of the ten days she was worried and hauled before the Grand Jury.

Now pass on to what he says about "the blunder of despising the necessary discriminations." Look at the assumption of the man! "WE," the one editor of a small periodical, too sickly to live without begging for support, and out of health for the very reason that its editor was born into the Liberal world before his time, and so only half made up, and able to extend only cold words and backhanded compliments to every other line of reform except the far-off Boori Boola Gha, which he has mounted for a hobby—I say "WE," the one editor, assumes to twit 70,000 Liberals of this country of the blunder of signing a petition, the wording and force of which they can judge as well as he, and taunts them that he pointed out at the time that the blunder would react. How has it reacted, O most sapient prophet? We deny that it has reacted at all, mischievously or otherwise. It went straight to its mark, as we intended, and your puny arm and Index finger were powerless to prevent. It was the first check Comstock received. It was the first intimation that his career was to be wound up. It loosened his grip on Mr. Bennett and Mr. Heywood. It has had a well argued hearing before Congress, and from Congress flashed all over the country. It has arrested public attention everywhere, and Comstock finds it a harder and harder road, in the pursuit of his victims, every day since that petition. The only conceivable mischief it has "reacted" on the Liberal cause anywhere that Mr. Abbot can put his prophetic pen upon is the malediction of the "pastor of the Congregational church, East Weymouth, Massachusetts." That is damaging, we must admit. We would rather have had that dear pastor's good opinion. We are sorry signing that petition, along with Col. Ingersoll, changed his kind estimation of us; but we hope the eclipse of his faith in us will be only temporary. If, in November last, Mr. Abbot could have pointed out the distressing consequence to us that the pastor of the Congregational church, East Weymouth, Massachusetts, would feel hurt, I do not believe 70,000 of us would have signed that petition. I certainly wouldn't; Mr. Bennett might have gone down to the silent Tombs first. But it is all over now. The wound on his feelings is inflicted, and we must regain the good opinion of the injured pastor the best way we can.

"It gives Anthony Comstock and his backers exactly the argument they wanted." We should think it did! Well they are welcome to it. It gives us exactly the argument we want; so we are all happy, and the millennium will be right along next week.

"We have drawn an avalanche of angry and absurd abuse on our head." Was there really an avalanche of it, Mr. Abbot? An avalanche is so vast a mass, we marvel how you survived it. But it is candid in you to say, "we have drawn," and so confess that you did it yourself. If the other kind of "we"—the 70,000 had done it, we should have felt so self-condemned! But you should have been on the alert when you were warning us so timely about that trap, and stood from under. May be it was the trap you drew on your head. If so it was absurd abuse. And you expect more of the same sort? Well I really wouldn't give timely warning on such loose-trap conditions any more. Let 'em be decoyed and be hanged to 'em.

Let us see, however, about that "timely warning." Mr. Bennett was arrested in November last. Those petitions were all out and being signed all over the country by the 10th of December. I signed one on the 7th at a meeting of the N. Y. Liberal Club, when the whole evening was devoted to a consideration and condemnation of the Comstock outrages. But the first toot of Mr. Abbot's warning horn did not reverberate over the country till the 20th of December—several days too late, you see, Mr. Abbot—behind time as usual, as people always are who go dead against the spirit of the age. If all your other claims, in behalf of Comstock and the reactionary party, are as correct as that "timely warning," you will make out a very respectable case—for our own side. As it is, your timely warning amounts to a mere "I-told-you-so"—only the trouble with it even then is, it isn't so. But we thank thee, O wise Daniel, for the *un*timely warning.

"It takes a mind like Dan'el's, 'n fact, ez big ez all out doors,
To find out that it looks like rain, arter it fairly pours."

"But those who appreciate the wisdom of our warning will multiply," etc. Now we don't know of but one Liberal in the whole country who appreciates the wisdom of that warning, and that one is Mr. Abbot. Once one is one—and at that rate, I am afraid those who "appreciate" won't "multiply" to any encouraging extent.

Now comes the alarming nub of this wonderful discourse from a pastoral text. It is invocation, objurgation, prophecy, and base intimation all rolled into one: "Liberals who have signed that petition"—70,000 blackguards of you!—"you cannot afford to stand before the people," etc. Well, you and Comstock know very well that we are not so "standing before the people." Your insinuations do not make it so. We are standing before the people demanding equal rights in the United States mail, and you know it just as well as we do.

"Call me coward, call me traitor,
Just as suits your mean ideas,—
Here I stand a tyrant hater,
An' the friend o' God an' Peace!"

All these last weepings and wailings about what we "cannot afford," and "cannot defend," and "have got to make," are but the impotent screams of an envious rival—the hysterical ravings of a vixen scorned. I leave them in all their incoherence unanalyzed.

"You may vilify us all you please." Thank you for your kind indulgence—but we had rather not. We don't vilify worth a copper. We have time or inclination only for words of truth and soberness that go straight to the mark.

And now, taken as a whole, isn't that a pretty posy for one sole, self-elected Liberal to cull from all the wide blossoming domain of Freethought to present to 70,00 Liberals of this country? We hope they will take it in all its fragrance into candid consideration.

The giver of all this uncalled for advice seems wholly lost to any appreciation of freedom and independence. He appears to rather like to exist by somebody's leave. He would be the obedient Spitz of Sir Oracle—"When I ope my mouth, let no dog bark!" He has no genuine elevation of sentiment, no real culture, no appreciation of the higher reaches of character nor ranges of virtue. If he had, he would deem it altogether beneath a manly dignity to ask 70,000 Liberals, born freer than he seems to have been, to be slaves. Conformity of human conduct to Christian creeds, subordination of a true, essentially moral government to orthodox requirement, seems to be the highest conception of the man who just squats on one little quarter-section of the Liberal domain and puts up "No Trespassers" on all the outlying lands which do not belong to him. The fight against God in the Constitution is indeed a most important work; but, good heavens! is there nothing in existence but that?

"With every pleasing, every prudent part,
Say, what can Chloe want? she wants a heart.
She speaks, behaves, and acts just as she ought,
But never, never reached one generous thought:
Virtue she finds too painful an endeavor,
Content to dwell in decencies forever."

Editorial Notes.

NO LETTER from the devil this issue. Lucifer being specially busy this week, begs to be excused, and hopes to be duly "on hand" next week.

W. S. BELL lectured at Rochester, N. Y., May 28th; and will speak at Waterloo, N. Y., June 1st and 2d; Macedon, N. Y., June 4th; Nelsonville, O., June 6th.

W. F. JAMIESON is engaged to speak in Ottawa, Kansas, Sundays, June 9th and 16th. He invites correspondence with Liberals in Kansas and Missouri in reference to lectures, debates, and grove meetings. Address Box 1250, Kansas City, Mo.

BROTHER W. S. BELL paid us a short visit on his westward lecturing trip. He was in good health and reasonably good spirits. We hope he will find good audiences to address, for we are sure he will acquit himself well in expounding the truths of Freethought and nature's laws.

PROF. S. B. BRITTAN has sent us a copy of his oration on "Leadership and Organization," delivered in outline on the occasion of the anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, held in Republican Hall a few weeks since. It is an able paper, and will well repay perusal. Price 15 cents. Sold at this office.

WE GIVE in this issue another sample installment—Catherine de Medici—from the forthcoming volume entitled "The Champions of the Church; their Crimes and Persecutions," containing over one thousand pages; will be out about the 20th inst. It will be the largest and finest book we have issued, and will be a powerful indictment against the Church. Let the orders flow in. Cloth, $3.00; leather, $4.00; morocco and gilt, $4.50.

A Useful Present.

With a lively sense of gratitude we return our hearty thanks to our esteemed Liberal friend, Mr. A. H. Bates, of Orange, Mass., for the receipt of a beautiful "New Home" sewing machine, from the establishment of Johnson, Clark, & Co., with which he is connected. He asks us to accept it as a token of the kind regard in which he holds the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Both the male and female branch of our family return thanks to Brother Bates for his generosity—his kind remembrance of us. The machine is an excellent one; and to all our friends who wish to avail themselves of an excellent sewing machine—and every family ought to have one—let us recommend the "New Home," manufactured by Johnson, Clark, & Co. It will undoubtedly give complete satisfaction.

Second Anniversary.

ANNIVERSARY LECTURE BY PROF. FELIX ADLER BEFORE THE SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, MAY 12, 1878.

We have steered forth upon a difficult and dangerous voyage. We have weathered the storm that beat about our course at the opening of the year. The years of our voyage are like watches of the night. Two years, two watches, have passed, and I cry unto you, like the watch upon the vessel, once more that all is well. Two years have passed, two anxious years, and now we meet once more before we shall take a brief respite and part our companionship that to me has grown so dear. Nature now beckons us; the advancing season warns us to leave the confined atmosphere of the city and seek those pleasant fields where we shall draw our inspiration from the fountain-head. Nature offers you her text. Nature will give you her exhortations. Nature will cheer and inspirit you with her undying prophecy. Never does it seem to me that the earth decked herself with such wonderful verdure as in this May month. Never does it seem to me have the flowers been so beautiful or their fragrance so intoxicating. Everything blossoms anew, and an exuberant life is visible in the ground. Behold, then, our temple is prepared for us. The giants of the forest make its pillars, the azure vault its dome; the purling streams murmur therein their benedictions, the whispering winds waft the songs of countless choristers through its leafy aisles, and from afar the sounding sea peals forever and forever its solemn anthem to the infinite.

But before we part for these silent communings with the mysterious power of the universe, which reveals itself to us in the splendors of the summer landscape, let us, kind friends, once more gather together and look out, as from some high belle-view, upon the glorious past which is our past, and which stretches far away before us into the misty future-land.

That we exist to-day is a subject for congratulation. Dismal and sinister is the horoscope which the soothsayers of the time set us when we began. Under an evil star, they said, this enterprise began, and soon would it be consigned to the limbo of stillborn undertakings. The grave-diggers were already waiting, the funeral orations were already prepared, and nothing was wanting on our part but the act of death, and we should have our decent interment. But they did not understand the aim of our organization; the very simplicity of the object held in view deceived them. They did not know the fund of power contained in a mere humanitarian purpose. They gave specific reasons why we should fail, and these reasons have been borne in mind by us and have served and shall still serve on our part as signal-posts of danger.

The first reason they gave for predicting our failure was—and this came from the advanced thinkers—that a permanent Liberal organization in this community is unnecessary. "Can we be more than free?" they say. "We have sawn in twain one link of the chain of superstition, and the whole chain falls from us; it is unnecessary to break every link of the chain in order to be free. We have rejected the superstitions of the past; what good can your teachers do us? If they will deck our thoughts in ornate language, if they will fill our ears with the flattery and blandishments of oratory, then we will listen; it will be pleasing for a time, but soon they must exhaust themselves and see their poverty, like flowers whose honey was stolen, like fountains whose waters are dry." Those who used this language perceived only one aspect of liberty, and that was the negative aspect. And even here they did not thoroughly appreciate the facts of the case. They did not know that it is one thing to have an opinion caught from the air, as it were; from a common, careless view of things, and quite another thing to wall around their opinions with the iron bulwarks of proof; to base the leading thoughts of their lives upon imperishable and immovable foundations. They forgot, likewise, that this Liberal organization never existed for its members alone and is not to be measured by its following. You cannot estimate it by the number of its disciples at any given time; but it stands for a power behind the throne. The Liberal organization is a threat to its opponents when it casts this long, dark shadow over the community. If it can cohere, if it can maintain its life, it stands, not for itself alone, but for thousands of others on whom it smiles. When the sea breaks through its dikes it is not the size of the original rent that so alarms, but the consciousness that the great billowing, boiling ocean is behind and is coming on.

The second objection which they urged against us was this: that not only is a Liberal organization unnecessary, but it is impossible. They forgot that the work of Liberalism is not merely, not chiefly, destructive, but it is, in the main, constructive. It should be measured, not by what it tears down, but by what it shall build up. They said a Liberal organization in this community is impossible; if you wish freedom, how can you tie men's minds to some new principles; will that not contradict the basis from which you started? If you have not mutual assent, cordial consent, to some fixed principles, how will you cohere? How will there be union? Assuredly not. But we answer in the words of Emerson that though men's opinions on theology are continually changing, the same is not true as regards their rules of conduct, as regards their moral convictions, but that these remain, and make an excellent platform where all good men can unite; where the pale morality of the day will be replaced by a vital morality which will grapple with the old dogmas and control them, if we read the signs of the times aright.

A great obstacle in this country in our way is a certain indefinite, vague, unintelligible fear, which we can nowhere localize, nowhere contend against, that Liberalism is somehow identical with license; that it means the overthrow of the sanctities of human life. The blind and dumb herd, long the creatures of custom and tradition, have been accustomed to receive their moral teachings through the artificial pipes of doctrines, and now when we tell them that these pipes are incrusted with the impurities of centuries, and we say drink at the broad flowing rivers from which the doctrines have received their supply, they call us traitors, and say, though a sip was not much, you would take from us our drink. There is an undefinable dread lest the night of emancipation will become a Walpurgisnacht, or witches' sabbath, in which satyrs and all the adulterous forms revel; that the passions and lusts of human nature will have free exercise to celebrate their wild and unhallowed orgies. In self-defense, therefore, we must point out that there is no association between the Liberal cause and those detestible isms that skulk under the name of reforms and lend their grossness to the moral world. True Liberalism demands not less of justice in the relations between classes, not less of righteousness in individual acts, not less of sanctity in the home life, but more; more, more of these we want; and because the creeds cannot give us more, therefore do we rise and say, Let us cut out a new path for ourselves. Morality, is it capable, they say, of supplying the past for you, for generations? The principle which animates a new religious movement must be one that fills a lifetime—fills hundreds of lifetimes and centuries of earnest effort. Is morality such a principle? Cannot its moral dictates be rehearsed in an hour and as quickly forgotten? Not the morality of the shop, assuredly; not that dry, crusty thing which they call morality in their ritual, which is rehearsed and forgotten in an hour, and which leaves the marble heart marble still; which cannot warm and quicken and penetrate. But there is another morality whereof we speak, that whose fullness we stand stammering to express, whose glory we stretch out vain and inefficient arms of speech to grasp; that which begins a new era in the world's history, which means the rending of bonds and the uplifting of down-trodden mankind, which means a remedy for human sorrows and the pantings of aching hearts, which means the lifting up of that great martyr, mankind, as he sways and bends beneath his cross. Do you not see that such a task is not a task of a day; that it enlarges as we enlarge; that the further we advance the greater becomes the problem and the higher the duties, which will never cease to be a source of inspiration and encouragement, so long, at least, as suffering and wrong continue to exist among mankind.

And the third objection which was raised against us was this: that we cannot propagate our movement for want of succession; and they then touched a vulnerable point. It is true that the churches have an incalculable advantage over us in this respect. They are fenced about by immemorial traditions of the past; they are secure in the veneration of mankind. They have been practically as innocent as doves, and wise as serpents; they have amassed a great portion of the world's earthly goods in their sacred shrines, and they are able to offer those who become their ministers material security, and that is not a little; and they offer them social consideration and honor also, and that is not less, especially in this American community, where the clergy receive a degree of respect not accorded to any other class of citizens, not even the highest officials of the State. What can the poor Liberal movement offer to compare with these? Material security? The Liberal organizations are themselves young and struggling for their own existence. Honor and fame? More often dishonor and defamation. And even if they did offer honor and fame, what are those baubles, as the world goes, to any man of sense and comprehensive view? How can these atone for the penalties that must be paid? How can these turn to sweetness the gall and wormwood which they are compelled to drink from the chalice of fate? No, the Liberal movement is poor, and we young Liberals are scattered far over the land, here one and there one, here a beginning and there a beginning. And, what is worse, the Liberals are not themselves ripe; they are not mature for practical union. The great majority still cling to some phantom creed of their own—some creed of negation. The Liberal movement of this country is still full of that intolerant aggressiveness and harshness of spirit which marks the the tyro in the art of free life. Sadly do we feel this lack of coöperation; sincerely do we deplore that the road is so lonely.

The Relations of the Sexes.

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF EAU CLAIRE, WIS., BY C. L. JAMES.

This free-thinking age is as fertile of nothing else as of speculation on what is called by their projectors, the true, or ideal relations of the sexes. I have always observed two characteristics to be common to all these speculations. The first is that they are derived, not from any sound analysis of the conditions to be adjusted, but from arbitrary a priori assumptions, which plainly represent the theorist's tastes, and consequently, though he may not himself be aware of it, his education. The second is that they generally result in proposals so devoid, I will not say of practicability, but even of meaning, that they seem rather fit for the heroines of the Della Crusca novels or "Jerusalem Delivered," than for men who call themselves philosophers and reformers. By adopting a very different course, I venture to say that I have arrived at conclusions of a very different nature. I shall endeavor to show you, not what the relations of the sexes ought to be, but what they have been and are; and I shall deduce from this analysis the exceedingly definite and positive conclusion that their most important characteristic is an enormous wrong, which must be righted before any kind of readjustment becomes even worthy of consideration.

Let us begin this preliminay survey with a glance at the customs of savages. It is notorious that our ancestors were barbarians, and the same is easily shown to be true of all the most important nations, as well as of ourselves. It has indeed been maintained that savages are the degenerate descendants of civilized men. But not to waste time on this pretty well exploded theory, it is at least a historical fact that the civilized nations which we know are the improved descendants of savages. It is to savage life, therefore, that we must look for the primitive types of our most ancient customs.

It is tolerably well known that among savages generally women are held in slavery. There are no exceptions to this rule. I shall endeavor by and by to show that there never have been any, by examining a very important case which has been supposed to present an exception. Few people have any adequate idea, however, to what an extent the savage women are tyrannized over by the men, nor how stolidly this tyranny persists in spite of the refining influence of later civilization. Among the lowest savages there is, as the saying is, no marriage. But it would be impossible to make a greater mistake than that of imagining that these savages practice anything like what is understood by Free-love, or that their women are any less completely slaves than those of tribes a little more advanced. The contrary is the rule. The squaw of a Comanche, who has only one master, is better off than a woman of the still more degraded races among whom the idea of individual property has never been introduced. She is just as much a chattel as the Comanche's squaw, but, being the common chattel of the clan, she has just as many masters as there are men. Her obligation to obey them is legal, as well as necessary, and extends to the prostitution of her person, as well as any drudgery which her tyrants may impose. Thus among the Andaman Islanders, any woman who refused to gratify the desires of any man was liable to severe punishment. These islanders were the most degraded of all savages. They had no weapons to speak of, no clothing, and no houses. They lived among the branches of the trees like monkeys, and frequently went upon all-fours. Of course, they had no arts of any kind and no individual possessions.

It is not difficult to see how, from such a state of things, may have sprung all the different forms of social life which now exist. Let us look at them seriously, and we shall find direct evidence that from this they did all spring.

A very widely diffused custom, particularly among somewhat backward races, is that of polyandry, or one woman having several husbands. The distribution of this curious relation precludes the possibility of its having sprung from one center. Anything which prevails as this does in places scattered over at least half of Asia,* must be of local origin. But its great and chosen site is India, where it is always mentioned as an ancient and somewhat decayed custom. The native poets celebrate it as a relic of the Dwaper Yug; the Golden Age of India.

> Prepost'rous! that one biped vain
> Should drag ten housewives in his train,
> And stuff them in a gaudy cage,
> Slaves to weak lust or potent rage!
> Not such the Dwaper Yug! O then
> One buxom maid might wed five men!

In the Mahabharata, the great epic poem of India, the heroine Drapaudy, in accepting the valiant Arjuna, accepts also his four brothers, and becomes the wife of all five. This fraternal relation among the husbands is characteristic of polyandry wherever it appears, and gives the clue to its origin. When people began to build houses, a thousand considerations of convenience and necessity must have led to separate households, but the members of each household continued to have all things in common, wives among the rest.

Polygamy and monogamy are not easily or regularly distinguished except where the former is unlawful. Every nation is called polygamous which allows polygamy, but it is obvious that the majority of men can have only one wife apiece, except among warlike nations who lose many of their youths in battle, and also buy or capture great numbers of female slaves. It is easy to see that jealousy must always have tended to put an end to polyandry, a custom which could only be perpetuated by the reverence felt for ancient institutions. Where this reverence was not very strong, that is, wherever the people were not, like those of India, intensely conservative about everything, marriage, either polygamous or monogamous, soon followed the division of the tribe into households. Polygamy has always been legal everywhere except in Europe, and among the descendants of Europeans. That it is not legal with them is due to anything rather than moral considerations. It is due to their laws about inheritance. In Asia, where the governments are all either monarchial or theocratic, the land either belongs to the state, or is divided equally among the owner's children at his decease. But in Europe, the fundamental form of government has always been by a land-owning aristocracy, to whom it was a great object to keep the property together. Thus the right of the wife and the wife's children came to be carefully guarded. The children of concubines were bastards, incapable of inheriting anything, and thus concubinage came to be considered discreditable. It was not, however, criminal till after the introduction of Christianity, and the Iliad shows that it was once very common.

While the institution of marriage was growing up, it had to contend with a powerful opposition from the ancient feeling that every woman in the tribe belonged to every man. Hence, among many nations, marriage within the tribe has never been legalized. Of course, the limits of the tribe become somewhat indefinite as civilization advances. In some countries, persons of the same family name are not allowed to marry, and in others the husband and wife must be natives of different villages, etc. That our own laws about incest (derived from those of Moses), were originally due to this feeling, and not to any sound physiological reason, is shown by their grossly arbitrary character. The proportions of kindred blood among relations of different degrees are as follows:

1. Identity—full brothers and sisters.

2. The proportion of half—half brother and sister, parent and child, first cousins, uncle and niece, or aunt and nephew.

3. The proportion of a quarter—grand-parent and child, half-uncle and niece, or half-aunt and nephew, second cousins.

Thus, though the marriage of cousins, and even uncles and nieces is permitted,* it is really just as much opposed to physiology as that of parent and child, which is considered monstrous; not to mention the prohibition of marriage between connections, like brother and sister-in-law, which has nothing to do with the laws of heredity at all.

Among other nations, contempt for foreigners, or some other reason, has led to a prohibition of marriage outside the tribe. With some of these people, for instance, the Parsees, the marriage of near relations is a common and popular custom, and has not, so far as I know, done that harm which might naturally have been expected, though it has been continued for an enormous period.†

Marriage outside the tribe means, for barbarians, catching foreign women, who become the slaves of their captors, though the latter have generally to pay a fine or tax to the tribe for this infringement on communistic principles. This custom lingers among ourselves. A bridegroom is expected to treat, and if he refuses, it is usual in many localities, to give him what is termed a charivari, at which, if very obstinate, he sometimes suffers considerable ill usage.

The extent to which marriage by capture at one time prevailed is hardly credible. Among almost all nations, our own as well as most others, we find customs evidently derived from it. In Australia, among the natives, it still prevails in all its naked atrocity. The gallant, accompanied by a party of his friends with clubs, lies in wait for and surprises the woman whom he has selected. She is beaten senseless, dragged off, and, as the beginning of her wedded life, defloured in the most barbarous manner. Customs like this, of course, are found only among the most degraded savages. But nearly everywhere we find marriage attended with some ceremony implying that the husband takes the wife by force, and that she resists, or at least pretends resistance. Typical instances are these, practised by more nations than you would care to hear me enumerate: 1. The bride runs or rides away from the groom, who has to catch her. 2. She hides herself, and he has to find her. 3. He comes with a posse of armed men to take her. The "best man" of our own civilization, is a relic of this posse. 4. There is a sham fight between the groom's friends and the bride's. Throwing an old shoe after the happy pair appears to be a relic of this custom. 5. The bride feigns resistance or surprise. This is a very widely extended fashion. 6. There is a temporary or even permanent affectation of hostility between the families which have just been united. The departure for the honeymoon is a feeble relic of this custom; but if a strong example be wanted, I may state that there are countries where it is the height of ill manners and bad taste for parents to have any communication with their son-in-law.

Prostitution, according to what we have observed, must originally have been the normal condition of all women. Though to some extent displaced by marriage, it still lingers in all countries. Among a large proportion of the ancient nations, the courtesans were held in great honor. It is easy to understand this. They were compatriots and free women; the wives, slaves and foreigners.

A very prominent opponent of the rights of women has lately endeavored to show that wives in Europe were never regarded as slaves, and that the authority of the husband is a natural arrangement not at all dependent on violence and brutality. His argument resolves itself into this, that though Hector and Ulysses have absolute authority over their wives, the position of Andromache and Penelope, as described in the Iliad, is very different from that of their maidens who really were slaves. Undoubtedly the premise is true, but the conclusion does not follow. The position of a favored slave is always very different from that of a common one, and besides Penelope, as the only woman who could bear legitimate children to Ulysses, had, as I have already explained, a peculiar claim on him, which an Asiatic wife does not have upon her husband. But that very absolute authority which Professor Goldwin Smith, in the article I allude to, admits that Ulysses had over Penelope is surely by itself as good a definition of slavery as could be desired. Indeed, it would be extremely difficult to show that the position of women in Europe, until lately, was any better than in Asia. Draupady, with her five husbands, is the heroine of an epic as pathetic as the Odyssey. Andromache is in no respect more interesting than Seeta. The virtues of Lucretia are not those of a person who had ever known what freedom was, but of one who had always been taught to merge her existence in another. If from poetry we turn to history, we find nothing to indicate that the position of women among the ancient Europeans was by any means high. Marriage was everywhere regarded as a mere business transaction. Married women, and girls designed to be married, received no education. In Greece, though not at Rome, the courtesans were highly esteemed, not only for their utility, but because their independence of convention enabled them to acquire knowledge, which was considered unbecoming in a matron. That Platonic love, which became the inspiration of Christian poetry and romance, was not excited by Plato's wife (indeed he had none) but by women like Phryne and Aspasia, with whom he associated freely, as his master Socrates had done before him.

Christianity introduced a great change, perhaps in some respects a beneficial one, but certainly in other points of view pernicious. Like all Asiatic religions it was ascetic. Its view of the matter may be summed up in this, that the sexual instinct was at best a necessary evil, but outside the law an intolerable one. Though the Christian fathers praise marriage, in language stolen from Plato, they always seem to make a wry face when they do so, and thus never fail to explain that "perfect chastity" is best of all. To Christianity we owe it that the law of marriage is made penally binding upon men as well as women. In a moral point of view, this is no doubt an improvement, since it recognizes in a significant manner the natural equality of the sexes. But practically it is of more than doubtful advantage, for there is not in the universe a creature more worthy of compassion than a woman bound to a "faithful" husband, whose desires she is unfit to gratify; nor has Ashantee or Khiva a practice more disgusting and barbarous than that which makes such horrible relations indissoluble. It is only just to add that the ascetic spirit of Christianity did very much towards refining the manners of Europe in this respect. The nameless vices so common in both Greece and Italy became almost entirely obsolete; prostitution was branded with unmitigated infamy; a mild stigma, and a legal penalty (seldom or never enforced) was set upon incontinence in men; and the charitable institutions of the Church provided a refuge for women who having lost the position accorded to "virtue" were yet desirous of escaping lives of shame and misery. But against all this must be offset the entire abolition of the Roman laws of marriage and divorce, which were very liberal, and if they had continued, would have averted the organized hypocrisy and bottomless rottenness of modern French, Spanish, and Italian social life. All through the middle ages, a reaction against Christian asceticism was in progress. The spirit of Plato, enshrined in the language of chivalry, was too much for that of St. Anthony. This movement reached its climax at the Protestant Reformation, when monasticism was abolished, and marriage (very absurdly) declared to be the normal state of man and woman. Then, in due course, came Swedenborg's "conjugal love," Goethe's "elective affinities," "predestined mates," "spirit brides," "free love vs. free lust" etc., the insipid dregs of Platonism, ostensibly devoted to the service of the marriage system, but really, thank heaven, poisoning and destroying it.

I could easily fill a lecture with the inconsistencies and absurdities of these speculations. The assumption fundamental to all of them, that the man ought to marry one woman is inconsistent with this plain fact, The numbers of men and woman are not equal, as well as with the far more serious and significant fact that many women and some men are unfit for the physical requirement of the married state, while many more of both sexes have passions which, in a condition of monogamy, become simply murderous and suicidal. Points of like import might be multiplied ad infinitum. Many persons who are otherwise fit for married life commit a crime against society if they become parents. The whole system is so full of flaws, or rather so devoid of virtues, that every attempt to rehabilitate it falls to pieces faster than it can be set together.

It is not difficult, from our present point of view, to see how our conventional ideas on these subjects come to be so absurd. They are the expression of feelings derived from barbarous customs, themselves the offspring of lust and violence. That a woman should be "faithful" to her husband, means that she is a slave. That a girl should marry, means that a woman has no business to be free. That women are denied access to the professions is a relic of their once universal absolute bondage. That they are generally housekeepers, is due to the fact that, as slaves, they, in the barbarous state do all the systematic work which is done. That a girl who has "fallen" should be hunted to prostitution, means that women have always been slaves as a matter of course, and if not private, they must be public slaves. Clearly it is vain to discuss the propriety of any of these sentiments or customs one iota further. They are all just like the conditions which gave rise to them—that is to say, as villainous as possible.

Free love, or the natural disposition of men and women to associate according to their inclinations, without any law but that of their own being, has always had to contend with marriage and with prostitution, two forms of masculine tyranny and lust, which correspond to and support each other, and which, between them, have always claimed every woman born into the world. Nevertheless it has always commanded the approbation of the greatest minds. Plato proposed to establish it in his ideal republic. In many nations, both of Europe and the East, it has received a formal sanction by law. Thus, in Abyssinia, we are told by travelers that there is virtually no such institution as marriage. This is not because marriage never has been introduced there, for there is a marriage ceremony, derived like all marriage ceremonies, from capture. It is because the more recent legislation of the only Christian country in Africa permits divorce at the pleasure of either party. The same admirable law prevails universally among the Arabs. These people have slaves, who are often made concubines, but the free Mohammedan woman, lawfully married to an Arab, can always obtain a divorce by asking for it. Under the Roman Empire, divorce was a very easy matter. The reforms which made it so began during the last century of the Republic, and were first checked by the laws of Constantine, after that monarch had adopted Christianity. Thus they just measure the golden age of Rome. From this time till the present century, superstition and barbarism combined to perpetuate the holy and glorious alliance of marriage and prostitution. Still, a little was gained even during this gloomy period. The Church professed hostility to prostitution, but with characteristic inconsistency failed to see that wherever marriage existed, prostitution must exist also. Her experiments have had the happy effect of demonstrating this very clearly. St. Louis, King of France, entirely suppressed prostitution throughout his dominions, and after a few years discovered that "private irregularities" were increasing to such an extent that marriage also was virtually suppressed. Much more recently, another Catholic sovereign, the Empress Maria Theresa, made the same experiment with, of course, the same result. Had these virtuous monarchs really hated prostitution as a Freelover hates it, they would have gone on and killed the other monster also. But marriage is more dear to Christianity than its twin sister is odious. The ordinances against prostitution were repealed, and, except as the convents and Magdalen hospitals intervened, all women who aspired to be free were driven to destruction in the usual manner.

The modern Freelove movement began with Milton. This great man was the first Christian who ever dared to expose the complicated absurdities and evils of the marriage system. Swedenborg, at a later period, introduced a theory of the sexual relation which, though sentimental and foolish in itself, had at least the happy effect of disgusting right-minded people with the grossness of the civil law. Mary Wollstonecraft, at the beginning of the present century, showed the system to be one of slavery for women. The Owens and Frances Wright demonstrated its incompatibility with progress, and set in motion the great reformation of American marriage law. John Stuart Mill fully refuted the various pleas for the "subjection of women" which conservatives have set up. Systematic agitation has been kept up by Woodhull and other recent Freelove writers and speakers during the last eight years. The Oneida communists and other socialists have at least made a number of instructive experiments in free love.

But I shall never lose an opportunity to exhort lovers of progress to concentrate their united energies on one grand objective point—the abolition of all legislation limiting individual freedom in respect to this great matter. The whole of women's rights is summed up in that. As emancipation brought, by the logic of necessity, all civil and political rights, so the abolition of marriage must bring women the ballot, access to the professions, and whatever else they want, because when marriage is abolished they will for the first time be individual sovereigns. We gain two great advantages by keeping this point in view. One is that we lose no time disputing with one another over Swedenborgian metaphysics; the other is that this, being the really vital point, serves as a self-acting test by which the true friends of woman can be distinguished from her enemies. You can rally round that standard every ally worth having.

I suppose most Liberals think the end of this great issue indefinitely distant, and expect that it will be brought about by some very gradual change. Only in that way can I account for their general disposition to treat it with indifference. My own opinion is quite opposite. I think the end is very near, and I think the abomination will go out as it came in—with violence. When, after a strong south wind has blown for several hours, you see black clouds rising in the west, look out for the tornado. When public opinion expressed in legislation has reduced a wicked institution almost to nothing, and all at once its friends go to murdering and trampling all law under foot in its defense, as McFarland and the other representatives of marriage are doing, the crisis is very near, and will be very fearful. "The world," of course, expects nothing, but in the blood which desecrates our land a wise man may see the hand of Doom write "Mene, mene, tekel."

PROVERBS are mental gems gathered in the diamond districts of the mind.—W. R. Alger.

Four Vital Questions.

LEEDS, GREENE Co., N. Y., May 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A copy of your TRUTH SEEKER being placed in my hands the other day for the first time, by a subscriber, has led me to ask you the following questions, viz:

1. Do you actually believe from your heart the doctrine you profess? or do you preach Infidelity for the sake of the almighty dollar, which our Christian clergy say is the root of all evil?

5. Can you show me what men gain by adopting your theory of "common sense" against that of religion. Does it tend to promote the welfare of the human family, and if so in what way?

3. Can you explain the theory of nine men out of ten, although not actually Infidels, still make no pretensions to religion, who upon their death-bed accept religion as preached by Jesus Christ, and die apparently resigned to the future?

4. Can you conscientiously condemn the Christian religion as untrue, simply because a few men who have professed it have turned out hypocrites, both in ancient and modern times.

If you can convince me that the method you are adopting will promote goodness, uprightness, sobriety, and justice, more than the Christian religion does, I am open for conviction.

Although I have been engaged for over two years on a Deistical work, I have given it up, not for want of evidence, but because I think it tends to demoralize the human mind, more than to elevate it. An early answer to my questions will greatly oblige, yours universally, W. H. PINDAR

REPLY.—We doubt not Mr. Pindar is an honest kind of man, and that the four above questions, are asked in the spirit of candor, and we will of course answer them in a perfectly candid spirit, and as directly as possible.

1. We do actually believe the doctrines we profess, and we preach them because we fully believe them to be true, and not for the purpose of making the almighty dollar. We find the dollars quite necessary in the prosecution of our business, but our leading object is to spread the truth. So far as making dollars are concerned, we know of large numbers of Christian clergymen who make ten times as much money as any Infidel, and are not over four times as talented.

2. Men gain by adopting our common-sense theory in contradistinction to what is usually called the religious system, the advantages of truth over fiction; rationalism over superstition, and the reality of natural causes and effects, in place of supernaturalism and impossibilities. The pursuit of truth assuredly does tend to promote the welfare of the human family, by dispelling the blighting effects of ignorance, error, and priestcraft.

3. We do not accept the theory that nine men out of ten who die the world over, whether Infidels or not, accept the religion of Jesus Christ, die any happier for having received it. Only about one in ten of the inhabitants of the earth are believers in Jesus; and those not Christians by education turn no more to him in the hour of death than to Brahma, Buddha, Zoroaster, Confucius, or Mohammed. It is not true that believers in Jesus die any happier than believers in the other characters named.

4. We do not condemn the Christian religion as untrue simply because a few men who have professed it have turned out to be hypocrites, nor because millions who have professed it have turned out to be hypocrites both in ancient and modern times. We condemn it as untrue because it is made up of the old fables of paganism that originated in the days of great ignorance and superstition, when men were ilIy prepared to devise a truthful system of religion, and because its fundamental doctrines not only make out God to be an inhuman monster who created beings on purpose to make them endlessly wretched through the countless ages of eternity. We believe all the religions of the world to be of human origin and necessarily imperfect, and that Christianity is no exception to the rule.

It should not be hard to convince our friend, if he will take the trouble to examine, that the doctrine which teaches men to practice virtue for its own sake is a better incentive to a good life than is the fear of a devil and a hell. The belief that every individual is himself responsible for his conduct, and that if he wins happiness he must gain it by performing good deeds, is far more conducive to a good life than depending upon the good deeds of some other individual, who saves him because he believes in him; and it is far better for promoting goodness, uprightness, sobriety, and justice.

We are glad our friend is open to conviction, and we hope he will continue to investigate the truths and errors connected with theology, and all the old myths and fables, until his mind becomes freed from the effects of early education and he is able to perceive the truth clearly, without being befogged by prejudices and preconceived opinions.

We are sorry he has had no better success with the Deistical work he has been toiling at for two years, and that he finds the idea of three gods in one less demoralizing than is the idea of one true God, without Father, Son, or Ghost. Perhaps if he will give three months to some sound Atheistic works he will find them less demoralizing to the mind. There is no doubt that the god idea—of an austere and revengeful ruler above the clouds—has been one of the most demoralizing and degrading ideas that man has ever held. We recommend to our friend the works of D'Holbach, Feuerbach, Büchner, Holyoake, Huxley, Draper, and Tyndall. They will not permanently demoralize him.

"Culture;" What is it, and What is it Not?

The cultured editor of the cultured journal of cultured Freethought in his last week's issue has a cultured article on the very important subject of "Culture." Under the impression that culture is a very nice thing to have—a very important commodity to be in possession of—we read the article with fully our usual attention to see if we could not become cultured, somewhat, in reference to this vital question. We are not sure that we are one of the fortunate number capable of being cultured. Our soul—provided we are furnished with an attachment by that appellation—craves culture; our aspirations reach after culture; our body, even, leans kindly towards culture; yea, our very bowels yearn after culture; our whole being feels extremely genial towards this mysterious quality called culture, if we can only find out exactly what it is. We even read the article with avidity, to learn this important secret, but the cultured editor hardly succeeded in making it quite clear to the ordinary comprehension—and that is the kind we have—exactly what culture is, except it is a very essential ingredient in Radicalism, for the cultured editor says: "Radicalism is nothing, if it be not the demand for culture, in all its length, and breadth, and depth; and he who sneers at it in any aspect, whether in outward or inward things proves himself a renegade to Radicalism."

Now there is not the slightest doubt but what that is exactly the true state of the case, and we slightly suspected all the while, that it was just that and no more. It must be, or that cultured man would not say so. Then, if it is a fact that culture is the sine qua non of Radicalism; if without that most important and mystical quality, we are only renegades to Radicalism, we mean to obtain culture if it is a possible thing—even if we break our neck in the attempt—for if there is anything we despise it is a renegade, especially to Radicalism.

What a lucky thing it was for Thomas Paine that he left the world before culture became so essential to being an Infidel or a Rationalist, for he would certainly have been ruled out. He would have been counted a "renegade." Poor Paine! he was wofully deficient in high culture. He had only reason and common sense, and talked about the rights of man; but of the importance of culture he said very little. Poor man, indeed! what a renegade to Radicalism!

Many others who have departed would have been equally unfortunate, and it is well they died as early as they did, for it is better to be dead than to be an uncultured renegade. It is to be feared, too, that there are very many who are not yet dead who cannot be admitted into the cultured fold. They are simply renegades, and the quicker they skedaddle to the Gehenna of the uncultured, the better it will be for the fortunate cultured aristocracy who claim to make up the head and front and the entire body, too, of Liberalism.

As in the truly cultured article alluded to we fail to learn precisely what this very desirable something called culture really is, it may not be amiss to consider the subject negatively, and see if we can decide just what it is not.

We hope that to be cultured is not to be proud and exclusive, causing one to feel unfraternal and unsocial towards those who have not enjoyed as good early advantages in acquiring an education and polished manners as himself, or who has not received a degree from some orthodox college.

We hope culture is not another name for aristocracy, whether of wealth, social privileges, or of intellect. Aristocracy is advantageous only to the few who are fortunate enough to gain admittance within the favored ring, but unfavorable to the unlucky wights who make up the rank and file of the great human army. The aristocrats are those who have the emoluments of position, and obtain the perquisites of superiority, while the plebeians and the under classes are allowed to do menial service for the favored ones for little or no pay, and to furnish them with the very bread and butter they eat. All aristocracies are inimical to the general weal. Their domination is haughty, cruel, and imperative; and the aristocracy of intellect forms no exception to this general rule.

We hope culture does not mean that exclusive, strait-laced, Pharisaical feeling which causes its recipient to feel, and act, and say, "I am holier than thou; stand afar off; pollute not my presence with your plebeian, uncultured person and manners."

We hope culture does not mean a pretentious claim to superiority, nor an inclination to placate Mrs. Grundy or her self-righteous crew, nor that it leads one to ape the orthodox churches, and to wish to follow in their wake and advocate the same unjust measures and the same liberty-destroying principles that they enjoin. It is at least questionable to see a Radical fearful that the orthodox devotees will not acknowledge his claims to respectability and culture. It is painful to see a professed Radical willing to sacrifice or throw overboard his Radicalism, or a part of it even, to secure the favor or recognition of the orthodox.

We really hope culture does not mean Comstockism, with all the "informer" system, decoy letters, espionage, tyranny, subterfuge, falsehood, and perjury that belong to it. It is the vilest oppression and wrong that America has ever known. Sad is the alternative if it lies between Comstockism and a renegation to Radicalism.

We hope culture does not mean untruthfulness, unfairness, and misrepresentation, which incite their possessor to misrepresent an opponent, and to accuse him of the gross crimes of forgery and obscenity when he is not guilty of them at all; and in order to do this to quote the language of bitter and evilly-disposed enemies. If to do this is to be cultured, or if that means the "purifying of Liberalism," as desirable as those qualittes are, and as enviable as is their possession, we shall be compelled to dispense with them, and we believe there are thousands of others who will feel the same way. They will even incur the danger of being called renegades to Radicalism rather than to be a misrepresenter of the truth, or a falsifier.

We hope it is not culture that induces the cultured gentleman to accuse those of impurity and criminality who have signed a petition to Congress for the repeal or modification of an unjust, unconstitutional law, destructive of the very principles of personal freedom, the passage of which was surreptitiously procured by the direct effort and influence of the Young Men's Christian Association, and which gives the power to a vile, bad, and impure man to annoy, arrest, disgrace, and ruin hundreds of men and women far better than himself. If this is culture, if this is the pearl of great price which is held up before our dim vision as the most desirable of all acquisitions, without which we must be a mere renegade to Radicalism, and guilty, even, of a "contemptible spite," then, despite our grand aspirations and our longing desires for something that is fashionable, recherché, au fait, the very crême de la crême, we shall be compelled, after all, to decline culture, and be willing to patiently plod on in the good old way of honesty and common sense, with plain, old-fashioned, but honest-hearted, people.

The Christian Observance of the Sabbath.

The General Synod of Reformed Presbyterians, which has lately been holding sessions in this city, expressed on Tuesday its sentiments concerning the observance of the Sabbath in the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas, Sabbath desecration is rapidly increasing in the great centres of our population and throughout the land in the following forms, namely, Sabbath excursions by land and by sea; running of freight and passenger trains; the employment of railroad hands in workshops; entertaining friends at dinner parties; driving to our parks for recreation; attending to secular business in counting-rooms and thoroughfares; reading secular papers and works of fiction, thereby depriving domestics and others of the privilege of attending the house of God, and thus doing dishonor to God and His holy law; therefore,

"Resolved, That this Synod condemns all such forms of Sabbath desecration and all other forms, whether springing up in our own land or imported from foreign countries; and further

"Resolved, That foreigners must be taught that this nation is a Sabbath-keeping nation, and that we will not barter our Sabbath birthright for the profane practices on that day so prevalent in Continental Europe."

The above is the very quintessence of modern orthodox Christianity. Its devotees are determined no man shall keep Sunday according to his own wishes, and his own convictions, but that he shall conform to their rigid and Puritanic views. They would have it declared a crime to walk in the parks, to ride in a carriage, to read a story or secular newspaper, to take a glass of beer, or have any amusement or recreation whatever on Sunday. It is the same spirit of intolerance which the Christian Church has always manifested.

How different their course is upon the Sunday question from that of their reputed Savior. He never exhibited the slightest fear that the Sabbath would be desecrated, nor that it would not be observed with due solemnity. In fact, he desecrated it without compunction himself, as on the occasion, when he and some of his followers strolled into the cornfields and plucked corn. There is no account that he ever attended church on Sunday, or that he spent it in long-faced sanctimoniousness. He never uttered one word by way of command that his followers keep the Sabbath day holy; never one word that Sunday is any better than any other day. He was supposed to be a pretty good sort of Christian, and we can well believe that in toleration and indifference on the Sunday question he far transcended his bigoted, intolerant, and hypocritical followers who wish to compel everybody to keep Sunday just as they prescribe.

It is barely possible that if the clergymen who passed the above resolutions could only manage to come into possession of the hundreds of dollars that are expended in excursions, etc, their minds would feel easier about the desecration of the Sabbath. It may to a great extent be a matter of dollars and cents with them. They find in running God's business that money is of the greatest consequence, and they dislike to see a dollar go into the devil's treasury. They want it all for themselves and God.

THE following notice, of personal friends of ours, for whose integrity we are ready to vouch, we clip from The Winsted [Conn.] Press. We will be glad to place friends in communication with the party should it be desired.

"It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. It is our pleasure in these hard times to be able to say to our readers that we can commend any of them who is a good, live, honest business man, and has 2,500 dollars in cash to invest, to a "rousing business," in the line of the manufacture of jeans, linseys, cassimeres, blankets, yarn, etc., with an unlimited home market for their sale, in one of the most salubrious of climates—in Virginia, in fact; and we will put any such good man or woman so desiring into communication with the proper parties. This is no exaggeration, strange as it may seem in these times; and what may seem as strange to some people is that this item is gratuitous, unsolicited, and unpaid for. All we shall ask for it is the thanks of the successful applicant, and his perpetual subscription to the Press after his installment in the business. We should add that a man or woman of liberal sentiments on religion would be more desirable than a praying Puritan."

That Noted Firm.

Britton, Comstock, & God, who are trying to do a wholesale decoy and perjury business in this city, do not seem to be flourishing hugely. [It will be remembered that Comstock, in his late annual report of his pious Society for the Suppression of Vice, first reported what he had performed himself in the work of the year; then he accorded due and well-deserved credit to his worthy partner and accomplice, Joseph Britton; for the valuable assistance he had rendered; and, last and least, he thanked God, the third member of the firm, or trinity, for the assistance he also had rendered.]

A few years ago this powerful firm used to do an extensive and successful business. They had only to arrest a poor devil who had sent out a book catalogue or had sold a syringe, or bought or sold a photograph of a nude or semi-nude human being, and get them before Judge Benedict, and his chance for from two to five years in prison, with a fine of from two to five thousand dollars, was almost a certain thing. Anthony, the big Mogul of the concern, was in his glory, and he watched his helpless victims, as they were marched off to prison in irons, and coupled, perhaps, with a convicted thief, with all the gusto and absolute pleasure that a wild tiger evinces when he plays with and tantalizes a helpless kid.

But things have greatly changed. Six months ago he pounced upon the editor of this paper with all the cruel and remorseless greediness with which a wolf ever devoured a lamb (beg the wolf's pardon; also the lamb's) or a boa constrictor crushed and swallowed its prey, and marched him off to the United States Court. But after a few weeks a still, small voice came from Washington, by due course of mail, and the United States District Attorney found it convenient not to prosecute the devout editor. This disappointment was a heavy blow to Anthony; he had expected to send the old man to prison, and it raised his wrath up to the boiling-point to thus be foiled. He declared, with almost the emphasis of an oath, that he would have revenge upon the old editor yet. But since that day Anthony and his firm have been comparatively powerless for harm. They have made a good many arrests, but few convictions, and very few imprisonments. It is said that the old editor aforesaid has injured the business of the firm, and that the third partner talks of retiring. It is more than suspected that he is getting ashamed of the other two members, and that he will put very little more of his personal assistance into the concern.

The following are some of their successes since the old Truth Seeker was honorably discharged: 1. Dr. William Morrison; this was the medical gentleman to whom Comstock, as a young lady by the name of Bender—who wished to go on a bender with perfect impunity—wrote very pleadingly and very affectionately to send her certain appliances to place her beyond fear or apprehension as to any danger she might incur. This beautiful Miss Bender, with sandy hair and a big scar on one cheek, resided at Squan Village, N. J., whence a male member of the same distinguished family wrote for information as to how kangaroos and opossums propagate their young, and also for that reverential Open Letter to one Jesus Christ. Being of a studious mind, he also wrote to The Truth Seeker for a copy of Dr. Trall's "Sexual Physiology;" and, lest one copy should not impart all the information of this delicate nature that he wished, he sent to Mr. E. H. Heywood, of Princeton, Mass,, for a second copy, as well as one of his famous Cupid's Yokes. It was from this point, also, that the same sainted individual engaged in the smut business. He advertised in the Waverley Magazine, over the name of J. G. Phillips, that for fifty cents he had something nice for sports; and when that moderate price was sent him, he mailed a section of a very filthy book, with very indecent plates, which even Miss Bender herself would not call modest.

Well, Miss Bender, in familiar language, "had the dead wood" on the old doctor, and in Judge Benedict's court it was likely to go hard with him. In fact, Miss Bender presented her side so strongly that the poor doctor was convicted; but before sentence was passed upon him, he forfeited his bail, and had immediate and urgent business that took him to Europe; thus no fine was imposed, and Miss Bender, or, rather, the second member of the firm aforesaid, got nothing from that source.

Heywood's case has proved little more profitable. As yet, it has not been disposed of, but, despite Judge Clark, it is hoped Heywood's life and liberty will be spared.

Madame Restell promised a big bonanza. She had bonds and greenbacks without end, and here was a regular "Comstock lode," and the Active Member of the firm applied his mad, seductive arts. He had, by some process, become in a very "interesting condition," aud needed some of the Madame's skill to place him all right. Her sympathetic nature, backed by a twenty-dollar greenback, enlisted her services to the extent of a box of pills. It is not known certainly whether the Active Member took the pills or not. A smell of them was, perhaps, sufficient. But the conduct of the Active Member of the firm caused Madame Restell extreme uneasiness, and about two o'clock, A. M., on the first of April, by a severe cut across the jugular, she took a short cut to that unknown bourne from whence it has not been convenient for her to return. This was the fifteenth person which the Active Member boasted that he had driven to suicide, and it was a sad blow to him—the firm! His bank account was getting low; the saintly Suppression Society had not "put up" as in days of yore; no "big hauls" had been made for a long time, and a state of impecuniosity absolutely prevailed at 150 Nassau St., and now the rich Madame Restell had gone to Kingdom Come without leaving the firm a dollar. It was a sad case, and the Active Member felt it keenly, and would have procured a bill of certiorari or habeas corpus, or something of the kind, to bring the Madame back to justice, but he could find no court here whose jurisdiction extended to the kingdom whither the Madame had gone. The man with a beauty spot on one cheek was sad fully three days and nights. He has been looking for another Madame Restell, and feeling that he was foul and needed syringing out, he called on Dr. Sara B. Chase with one of his beautiful decoy letters, and procured one of her five-dollar syringes of the improved pattern and sponge attachment. He liked the operation of this syringe so well that he persuaded the Senior Member of the firm to procure one, and, in fact, was kind enough to accompany the godly Joseph to the doctor's mansion where another five-dollar bill procured another syringe for the Senior Member; but before he had an opportunity to use it the Active Member proceeded to business, and, for the doctor's obliging disposition, he took her down to the Egyptian Tombs, before Judge Morgan, where the Active Member intended that she should, at least, stay over night; but the kind-hearted Mr. Smith said, No, she should return home.

But the Active Member duly appeared before the Grand Jury, whether with the improved syringe with the sponge attachment or not, does not clearly appear. But it does appear that the Grand Jury were a grand jury indeed, and they found that it is not quite a State Prison offense, just yet, for a person to sell a female syringe for cleansing purposes, and they inquired of the Active Member if it was his purpose to drive Dr. Chase to suicide as he had driven Madame Restell. They allowed the doctor to remain at home, and since then it is understood that the Senior and Active Members of the firm of cultured decency have retired to Squan Village to practice with their syringes.

Those two worthies did seduce a Mr. Charles F. Blandin into showing them a certain fancy photograph which he had obtained from a friend in Boston, and for this obliging deed the active member marched Blandin to prison, where he lay thirteen weeks, when, by the strong swearing of the two members a conviction and another imprisonment was secured. But Governor Robinson, seeing the villainy of the firm, pardoned the young man, and thus struck another heavy blow to Comstock.

But there was some hope in the Baxter case. Mr. E. W. Baxter had for years conducted an extensive business in this city, selling furniture, but had failed. By legal advice he engaged in selling a "preventive" of sulphate of zinc. The Active Member needed a preventive, and wrote a decoy letter to Baxter for it, and obtained a circular, or something of the kind through the mail. This was enough for the Active Member. He marched Mr. Baxter to prison. His case hung several months, but a short time ago the trial came off, and from a flaw in the indictment the unfortunate Baxter was discharged. He was so overjoyed at his good fortune that when he left the court-house, he was delirious with joy; for a few minutes he knew not which way to turn when finally, as the Telegram stated it, "he got his bearings and started off on a bee-line for his home, shouting out his thanks" for that flaw in the indictment. It is indeed a joyful thing to escape the toils of the Comstock firm, and it is not strange that such a piece of good fortune makes one delirious with joy.

The active member next smelt out something in the Brooklyn schools. He became impressed that a great amount of obscenity was being circulated among the scholars. He appeared in his organ, The Tribune, upon the subject and took other steps; but, the superintendent of the schools indignantly denied the lying assertions of the Active Member that any obscene matter had been introduced into their schools, and here he received another snub. His charges proved as false in this case as they have been in numerous other instances when he horrifies such men as the editor of The Index about the tons of obscene and immoral matter sent to school children.

There is one flagrant case which the active member declines to prosecute, and U. S. District Attorney Woodford also declines to bring the case to justice. It is an appalling instance of favoritism most serious to contemplate by every lover of equal justice. The offender in this case is no less than the very pious Mr. Samuel Colgate, President of Mr. Comstock's Society for the Suppression of Vice, who has before been alluded to in these columns. He has been doing a very lucrative business in selling vaseline, and has been sending extensively through the mails pamphlets describing its use, and recommending its excellent qualities as a prevention of conception and possibly for procuring abortion. The Active Member will not show his activity in this case. He is evidently disposed to let Mr. Colgate enjoy a monopoly of the "prevention" business the same as he, himself, does the smut business. He has nearly all the obscene books and pictures in the country, and it is asserted that he is sending the same through the mail. Proofs are very strong in this direction. Mr. Samuel Colgate can continue "prevention" and he will not be annoyed.

The biggest case the firm have secured lately was the boy from Philadelphia, whom the active member with imperious airs marched off to the Tombs for selling on the street a picture of a little child sitting on a "chamber." Here was a terrible outrage upon decency and morality, sufficient to excite the horror of the active member of the godly firm, as well as the maledictions of certain cultured and respectable people in Boston. The case is not disposed of yet, and whether the child will be executed, or sent to State Prison for life, or be frightened into cutting his throat, is not known. But it is a big case, and the Active Member is proud over it and is busily working it up. These are dull times with him and small favors are thankfully received.

It is whispered around in private circles that the third member of the firm is getting ashamed of the other two, and that upon the plea of other urgent business requiring his constant attention, he proposes to withdraw from the firm. He has been caught in very mean company before, but never worse than his two partners in the firm under consideration. If a dissolution of the firm is announced at an early day, and the Senior and Active Members go into bankruptcy, the public need not be surprised. In this case, it is expected that the only truly respectable paper in Liberalism will appear in mourning for thirty days.

Science Hall, Saturday Eve., May 25th.

A meeting in sympathy with Dr. Sara B. Chase was held at the above-named hall on Saturday evening last. The Doctor addressed the audience in a lecture of more than an hour's duration. She said:

"The great question agitating the minds of thinking people to-day, on both sides of the Atlantic, is either abortion or the prevention of conception. This question is forced home especially upon every physician who meets from day to day the demand in his practice. In the past, war, pestilence, famine, and natural causes have presented sufficient checks to population. Science is teaching us to prolong life and protect the weak where in the past they would have died. Men, women, and children, who would have been condemned to death in a savage state have their lives prolonged by civilization. The sickly are saved by medical skill. The average of life is lengthened, wars less frequent and bloody, famines impossible; and with the advancing light of science must come checks to population more enlightened and humanizing. There is limit to the means of subsistence, and the inevitable result of an overcrowded population is abject poverty and starvation. We should feel that we are responsible, not only for the well-being of ourselves and children, but for the effects of overpopulation upon the race."

Mr. G. L. Henderson followed with some very appropriate remarks upon the philosophy of Malthus, Mill, and Mrs. Besant, and took the position that humanity has the right to consider and discuss the questions pertaining to the propagation of its kind; that whatever tends to increase the age, the health, the usefulness, or the happiness of the race is legitimate and proper to be discussed, and that all laws restricting that right are oppressive and wrong.

James D. McClellan, attorney, followed in appropriate remarks touching personal rights; then he considered the character of Anthony Comstock, and narrated a case where a dealer in rubber goods, with an interesting family, had been arrested, by means of a decoy letter, for sending a syringe through the mail, and thrown into prison; that it fell to his duty to defend the unfortunate man, and—despite the hard swearing of Comstock and the severe rulings of Judge Benedict that however innocent and useful the instrument might be in itself, and however meritorious might have been the intentions of the manufacturer in making it, if it was capable of being put to an immoral use, then the jury were bound to find the prisoner guilty—he succeeded in hanging the jury six to six.

He proved by several eminent physicians of this city that the syringe was a valuable one, and innocent of any harm. This amounted to nothing with Judge Benedict. The speaker pronounced the rulings of Judge Benedict—from whose court there was no appeal—as being severe towards the prisoner in the extreme. He was rejoiced that the law had been changed, and that now there was a chance for a case to be opened and appealed, and, if justice demands, a rehearing can be obtained. After the jury had thus disagreed, a new trial was obtained, and for the second time he succeeded in hanging the jury six to six. Even for the third time he succeeded in hanging the jury six to six, but on the fourth trial the rulings of the judge were so severe upon the prisoner that he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. After the man, whose only wrong had been to sell a syringe, had been incarcerated, the young wife saw very hard times. She could get work but a part of the time; one article of jewelry after another, and one keepsake after another, was pawned to buy bread to keep herself and her children alive; but at length every article of value was pawned, and her children were upon the very verge of starvation. A few months after this, he one morning saw that young woman arraigned as a lawless prostitute before the police court. He took the occasion to talk with the wretched woman, and asked her how in the world she had come to occupy that position. With tears in her eyes, she said she had struggled to obtain bread for her children as long as she possibly could, and when everything was gone, and her children were starving, she had yielded to the importunities of her landlord and prostituted her body to save the lives of her children, and that she had gone down step by step, till she was where she was. "Ah," said the attorney, "if there is a God; if there is a future world of retributive justice; if there is a place of torment, that man Anthony Comstock will there have to answer for the human wreck and suffering he has produced."

He further said that the cases of conviction which Comstock proudly counted had caused the hottest tears of anguish and the keenest pangs of sorrow known to the human heart, and that they had been brought about by the vilest arts of the informer, who had used his skill in entrapping the simple-hearted and unwary. He said they had also been produced by perjury of the blackest kind. More than once, he asserted, had Comstock and his accomplice been guilty of perjury in prosecuting the helpless victims they had sent to prison. He believed Comstock to be one of the worst men he had ever known—one who was utterly lost to every feeling of pity and compassion. The way in which he pictured the miscreant, the heartless villain stood out plainly before the vision of each person present. The speaker was loudly cheered by the audience he effectually carried with him.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER XIV.

ENTITLED PARABLES.

Simon is Armed, and Continues his Journey.—Meeting with Blunt.—Comes to Grief.

1. Who is this that cometh with lordly steps? That paweth the air like the impatient ass? Who is he that that cometh with his garments dyed? His garments are dyed with blood, and smeared with pellucid mire.

2. He cometh with the aspect of a king, and prancing like unto a war-horse. Declare to us his name, that we may greet him with due reverence.

3. Blow the loud trumpets, and waken the timbrels. Aha, thou proud charger, why dost thou bray? Why arch thy soft neck?

4. Whoa! Whoa!

5. And it came to pass, that when Simon was duly welcomed, his bones were sore. And the city was illuminated by much moonshine, and the trumpeting began.

6. Yea, the trumpeting began, and it was a jubilant trumpeting, and the city shook again. And the guides shouted with a great shout, and took the yellow metal from him.

7. Then did they take Simon to a certain smith's, and having put an halter upon him, they tied him fast to a stall, and the smith came and lifted up one of Simon's feet and took off his shoe, and in its place nailed on another called gospel, and when he had shod him on the one, he did likewise to the other.

8. And after this they took a helmet made of green paper, in the shape of a cone, and put it upon his head, and put a sword in his hand. And the name of the helmet was Deafears, and the name of the sword Intolerance.

9. But the armory of the city was in woeful plight, for the Giants did continually break into it, and break the swords in pieces, so that the pilgrims were unable to arm themselves as of yore.

10. And they put upon him a cloak called Righteousness, made of linen, but exceedingly transparent and rotten withal, so that it was soon in rags. And people saw through it, and that under it was much filthiness.

11. Now they who were masters of the gate called Katholikos, which goeth into the city of Conversion, boasted that they could cleanse this cloak by means of a certain soap called Confession, and make it smooth and straight by means of a mangle called Penance.

12. But they of the gates by which Simon entered had neither soap nor mangle.*

13. Then they put Simon into a press, and pressed his face until it was of sufficient length, and when they had done that he was ready to go on his way.

14. And Godlyguts blessed Simon, and he was blest indeed. And he went on his way singing—King, Lamb, and Ghost, ye glorious host. I sing your praises. But for ye three, I should, I see, have gone to blazes. But here I am, in blood of Lamb, I've had a wash. Yet I deserve, without reserve, immortal smash. Good Godlyguts, his hand he puts, upon my head. And well I'm blest, and from my breast, all fears are fled.

15. And having sung and recovered from his labor, he set himself to his journey afresh, and having traveled but a little way he fell in with the man whose name was Blunt.

16. And Simon was very valiant, and feared not any, for said he, I am armed with armor that is able to overcome even Ahrimanes. So he talked with Blunt.

17. And Blunt said, Come now and I will speak a parable unto thee.

18. A certain man had many children, and he made himself a garden, and sent his children into it to play.

19. Now in the middle of the garden he had dug a great pit, and at the bottom of the pit he placed a great number of very sharp thorns, so that should any fall in, they should be grievously hurt and wounded thereby; and he concealed the whereabouts of the pit.

20. And he spake unto his children saying, Ye shall not go near the middle of the garden, for thereabouts I have dug a pit, into which if ye fall I will assuredly burn you alive.

21. And Simon was wroth, and said, What sayest thou? Did he lay snares for his children, knowing they would fall into them, and when they fell into them burn them alive?

22. And Blunt answered and said, Yea, and had a very great fire in readiness. Moreover there went a man to the children and persuaded them vehemently to go into the middle of the garden for that all the choice fruits were there, and that there was not any pit. And the father of the children knew that this man would persuade them, and that his persuasions would prevail, and he could have hindered the man from persuading them and would not.

23. And Simon said, Then the father desired to burn his children alive, and with much care sought occasion and excuse to do it. Surely no man is so vile. Surely there is no man so unjust, nor any so full of malice and cruelty?

24. And Blunt went on saying, And the children were persuaded, and went into the middle of the garden and fell into the pit, and were grievously wounded.

25. And the fire which the father had made surrounded the garden on every side, and grew nearer and nearer.

26. And the father to justify himself said, I have prepared a way of escape for them; there is a pathway under the ground by which they may come out. But the children knew not where the entrance to the pathway was, and though they strove hard to find it they could not.

27. And the father hid himself from his children and would not tell them where the entrance was.

28. And many men went and said to the children, Your father hath sent me to point out to you the entrance.

29. And one of the men said, It is here, and another said, It is there, and another said, It is yonder; some say, It lieth this way, and some said, It lieth that way; and thus were the children mocked, and knew not which way to go.

30. And the father knew the true way and could have shown it them, and have hindered the men from deceiving the children, and he would not.

31. And he justified himself by saying, One of the men knoweth the true way, and will lead them to it, if they will but give heed to him.

32. And he would not hinder the other men from deceiving the children, and thus the most part of them were caught in the flames, for they knew not which of the men to follow, for they all alike said, We are sent by your father.

33. And Simon was very wroth at the father of the children, and said, Truly he was the vilest of men, and unspeakably wicked, and deserved to be torn to pieces by the dogs; nay that no punishment could be devised great enough to sufficiently punish him.

34. And Blunt went on saying, And the children not only were caught in the fire, but the father had cunningly devised that the fire should not slay them outright, but on the contrary keep them alive, and torture them horribly, not only for days and months, but for many, very many years.

35. Then said Simon, He was not a man, but some accursed demon, and he cursed him very bitterly, and Blunt joined in the curses very heavily.

36. And Simon said, Tell me I beseech thee who he is, that I may curse him by name.

37. And Blunt with a deep voice cried out, Thou hast adjudged him. Oh Simon, he is thy king, even the King Jah.

38. Hereabouts some one fell down in a swoon, and when I looked to see who it was, I saw it was Simon.

39. And presently there came up innumerable hobgoblins, and many horrific creatures, and tore Simon out of the gutter and made much sport of him, tossing him from one to another, and kicking him hither and thither, and bemauling and bespattering him without pity, and his new cloak and his armor came hideously to grief.

40. And many days afterwards the guide whose name was Godlyguts was prowling about, when he stumbled over a mud heap.

41. And the mud heap moaned pitifully, for it was no other than Simon, and Godlyguts ran to the city and returned, bringing with him some of the other guides; and they brought vessels of water and threw them upon Simon, and when they had sufficiently cleaned him, they took him and drew him into the moat called Mystery.

42. And when they had rinsed him, they threw him out and having dried him in the moonshine by which the city was illuminated, they took him into the city and armed and clothed him afresh.

43. And Simon revived and was more valiant than before, and addressed himself to his journey anew.

*It is singular that popular cries should so long outlive all recollection of their original meaning. Here we have undoubtedly the origin of the cries, "How are you off for soap?" And "Has your mother sold her mangle?" so common in our streets, and the meaning of which not even the most ingenious dealer in Folk-lore has been able to discover. Nay, the cries in question may have been usually supposed to have no meaning whatever, and yet how pithy and apt they become when viewed in the light our invaluable MS. throws upon them.—Trs.

The Printer's Estate.

This it good enough for anybody to read.

The painter's dollars, where are they? A dollar here, a dollar there, scattered over numerous small towns all over the country, miles and miles apart; how are they to be gathered together? We imagine the printer will have to get up an address to those widely-scattered dollars something like the following:

"Dollars, halves and quarters, dimes and all manner of fractions into which ye are divided, collect yourselves and come home! Ye are wanted! Combinations of all sorts and ages of men that help the printer to become a proprietor, gather such force, and demand, with good reason, your appearence at his counter, that nothing short of the sight of you will appease them. Collect yourselves, for, valuable as you are in the aggregate, singly you will not pay the cost of gathering. Come in here, in single file, that the printer may form you into a battallion, and send you forth again to battle for him and vindicate his credit."

Reader, are you sure you haven't a couple of printer's dollars sticking about your old clothes?—The Socialist.

Catherine de Medici.

From the forthcoming volume, "The Champions of the Church," as a specimen of the character of the work.

No one can reflect without a shudder of horror upon the career of this wretched woman, who, for a time, held in her unsteady hand the destiny of fair and progressive France. By most of Roman Catholic writers this French Medea is adorned with all saintly virtues as the guardian and defender of the faith. To the historian she is an incomprehensible mystery. If ever a woman was guided by a malignant star, it was Catherine de Medici. Only an impartial statement of some of her cruelties and crimes will be attempted in this short sketch. The wife of one French king, the mother of three, the leader of the revelries and politics of the age in which she lived, the career of this female fiend, whose malevolent touch checked for a time the civilization of France, is one of more than ordinary interest.

Catherine was born at Florence in 1519, and was the daughter of Lorenzo de Medici, that ruler of Florence for whom Machiavelli wrote the "Prince." She was sent to a convent at an early age, having lost both of her parents. It was foretold at her birth that she would bring destruction to the city where she was born, and the townspeople of Florence would have exposed the babe in a basket to the balls of their enemies. But she was preserved alive, was shut up in a convent, and in the school of Machiavelli learned dissimulation and fraud.

When only fourteen she was married to the Duke of Orleans, afterwards Henry II. Pope Clement VII. was her uncle, and Francis I., king of France, anxious to win his support, married his heir to the portionless orphan.

During the reign of Francis, Catherine exercised no influence in France. She was young, a foreigner, and was utterly thrown in the shade by more important persons. She seemed a child of evil omen. Her uncle, the pope, soon died. Francis regretted the hasty marriage. Her husband neglected her for Diana Poitiers; and she had come into the family of Valois only to be contemned by her regal relatives as the impoverished descendant of a race of merchants. Only the nominal wife of a depraved king, she lived for many years powerless and obscure. For ten years after her marriage she had no children. A divorce began to be discussed at court. Catherine now resorted to her wonderful Italian tact. She presented herself to the king, threw herself at his feet, and swore her willingness to remain the wife of his son, or in case another wife should be chosen, to be one of her humblest attendants. She won the heart of Francis, and the divorce was heard of no more. She had the happiness of bringing him grandchildren before she died.

Her husband succeeded Francis, and during his reign, from 1549 to 1559, she led a passive but observant life. Henry was completely under the influence of his mistress, Diana of Poitiers. After the accession of her son, Francis II., she exercised little or no authority. Francis seemed completely under the spell of Mary Stuart, and the cardinal of Lorraine and the duke of Guise managed the affairs of France. Yet Catherine was singularly beautiful. She inherited the large and lustrous eyes of the Medicean family, and her graceful form, her brilliant complexion, her large and lustrous eyes, and her hand and arm that no sculptor could imitate, were set off by manners so soft and engaging as to even win the admiration of her foes. No one would suspect that her placid countenance concealed the passions and relentless hatred of the most ambitious of women. From Lorenzo the Magnificent she had inherited a taste for lavish elegance. She shone at tourneys and glittered in stately processions. The death of Francis opened to Catherine a career worthy of the most soaring ambition. She became the regent during the minority of the new king, Charles IX., her second son, then only ten years old.

At this time France had fallen into a critical condition. The hostility between the Reformation and the old religion was beginning to assume a dangerous character. After more than thirty years of unrelenting persecution, of dreadful atrocities perpetrated in every town by emissaries of the pope, the patient Huguenots had taken up arms in self-defense. They determined to meet the savage barbarians of the Inquisition with more effectual weapons than spiritual arms. For ten years all France was filled with civil discord. Factories were closed, the seats of industry sunk into decay, and an exterminating warfare wasted the vigor of the nation. The ambitious family of the Guises stood at the head of the Catholic faction. They inculcated an undying hatred towards the Huguenots, and incessantly called for their extermination. Pope Paul IV., actuated by strong wine and the insanity of a corrupt old age, had instigated the persecutions that led to the outbreak. Pius IV. and V. fanned the fires of fanaticism and aroused the maddened Catholics to deeds of cruelty and bloodshed.

The two Guises, duke Francis, and Charles, cardinal of Lorraine, controlled the court and king. Their aim was to extirpate heresy, and to lay France at the feet of the Roman pontiff, purified by a general massacre of his foes. Duke Francis and the cardinal were called by their contemporaries "the Butchers." Nothing afforded them such savage satisfaction as the spectacle of a heretic dying of torture. It was the custom of the cardinal, after a stately dinner at his regal palace, to show his guests a fair array of martyrs, executed for their entertainment, or sometimes to hang up a burly Huguenot in the banqueting chamber itself. Such monsters as the Guises could only have been produced by Catholic Christianity. At the battle of Dreux (1562) the Huguenots were defeated by the duke of Guise; but at the siege of Orleans the duke fell by the hands of an assassin. Upon his death Catherine became the most important personage in France. Hers was now an eventful career, and civil wars succeeded each other to the close of her life. But it is with the massacre of St. Bartholemew (twenty-fourth of August, 1572) that her name will be especially associated in history.

The terrible tragedy of Bartholemew was the direct consequence of the teachings of the popes. Catherine had become weary of incessant war. She resolved to end it by the total extermination of all the Huguenot leaders at one fell blow. She had been brought up in the school of Machiavelli. As if to exemplify the lessons she had learned she now matured a dark and horrid plot for drawing into her toils all the chiefs and eminent men who had successfully resisted the force of the Catholic armies. And so she planned the massacre of St. Bartholemew. A secret joy filled the hearts of such faithful Catholics as she had trusted with a premonition of the approaching slaughter.

She proposed a pacification between the hostile parties. The union was to be completed by the marriage of her daughter Marguerite to young Henry, son of Jeanne, queen of Navarre, her hated rival. The queen of Navarre was the most austere of the Huguenots, but for the sake of peace for her party had yielded to the arts of Catherine. For the sake of the oppressed Huguenots, this grand queen suffered her son to marry the child of the house of Valois, and ventured to come up to Paris, the citadel of her bitterest foe. Her death soon followed. It was said by the annalists of the period that the mother of the expected bride had poisoned the mother of the bridegroom by presenting her with a pair of perfumed gloves, prepared with a deadly powder. There is no doubt that the spotless queen of Navarre was made away with by the Italian arts of Catherine. Jeanne d'Albret died as she had lived. Rejecting the proffered offices of the profligate ladies of Catherine's corrupt court, she expired asking the prayers of the Huguenot pastors and their simple ceremonies of burial.

Coligny was one of the most eminent chiefs of the reformers. He also was lured into the fatal snare. Trusting the word of his king, he rode boldly into Paris. He had been warned by faithful friends. The wife of a peasant had clung to the reins of his horse and warned him of his fate if he proceeded. But he came, with his companions in arms, right into the center of his foes. Henry of Navarre and his cousin, the prince of Condé, came to Paris in the first days of August. They were assigned the palace of the Louvre. Charles IX. welcomed Coligny almost as a father, and gave him a hotel on the street of Breese. Catherine received her noble victims with eager civility, and the city rang with revelry.

The great horror was near at hand, and was preceded by a dreadful hilarity, inspired by Catherine and her corrupt train of beautiful women. The wedding took place on the eighteenth of August, 1572. The ceremony was performed beneath a richly-adorned pavilion before the Church of Notre Dame. Attired in yellow satin, covered with precious stones, and attended by a long procession of princes and nobles, Charles IX. and Henry ascended the platform. The king led in his sister, who was robed in violet velvet, embroidered with the lilies of France and glittering with pearls and diamonds. Catherine came next, followed by her frail, fair circle of maids of honor. It was a gay and brilliant pageant that there gathered under the summer sun that gleamed over the towers of Notre Dame. Cardinal Bourbon performed the ceremony. The Louvre was the scene of a grand entertainment in the evening. Royal revelers filled its wide saloons, and for days the gay capital was given up to feasts and tourneys and merriment.

But the week of the wedding carousal was to close in the butchery of Bartholemew. Paris was crowded with the best and the bravest of the Huguenots. Orders were dispatched to the governor of Lyons to prevent couriers passing to Rome until the twenty-fourth of August. It was designed to apprise the pope of the wedding and massacre at the same moment. The first deed of crime was committed on the twenty-second of August. Coligny was shot at by order of the young duke of Guise. The admiral was borne back to his hotel bleeding, but not mortally wounded. The king came to express his sympathy for his suffering friend. Catherine also came and wept over the wounded Coligny. The Huguenots were startled for their security. They gathered around the bedside of their beloved chief and in the chamber of Henry of Navarre. They could now scarcely go into the city without danger.

A great gloom seemed settling over Paris. The French capital at this time was noted for its narrow and filthy streets, for its sordid and starving population, and the fierce superstition of its monks and priests. It was neither paved nor lighted, and was the perpetual haunt of fever and plague. A strange and ominous stillness rested upon the gloomy lanes of Paris on the night of the twenty-third of August. The body-guard of the king had been stationed under arms. Citizens were furnished with arms at the public cost. The houses of the Huguenots were marked.

Charles hesitated in his horrible design. He was weary of bloodshed, and wavered. Some traits of humanity still lingered in his breast. Catherine arose after midnight, and went to his room. He delayed to give the final order. His feeble, imperfect intellect was crazed. At one time he cried out that he would call on the Huguenots to protect his life. He paced the room with rapid strides, incapable of decision. He was scarcely twenty-two years of age, and had been accustomed from infancy to tremble before his mother's glance. She now told him that it was too late to recede, and that the order must be instantly given. Her voice of rage was filled with a sinister meaning. He knew that it would cost him his life to refuse; that his mother would remove him by her secret arts to place her favorite Anjou on the throne. In a sudden burst of fear and frenzy the feeble king gave the fatal command. Whatever was good and gentle in the nature of Charles now died forever. He became simply an instrument of Rome for the commission of an unequaled deed of crime. The signal for the slaughter was given, and the work of carnage commenced. Guise began it by the murder or Coligny. The clatter of his horse's hoofs broke the stillness of the Sabbath morning as he furiously galloped at the head of his soldiers to the quarters of the admiral. Coligny was stabbed in his bed-chamber, and his body thrown from the window into the court below.

And now the great clock of the church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois gave an ominous peal, which awoke such an awful clamor over silent Paris as had never been known on earth before. From every tower and belfry resounded the clangor of bells. The Catholic citizens seized their weapons and hastened to the houses of the Huguenots. All the inmates were to be mercilessly murdered, from the innocent infant to the gray-haired grandsire. The city was illuminated, and the blaze of torches lit up the labor of death. Charles, Catherine, and their coadjutors at the court, kept closely together. They gathered at a window overlooking the tennis court. Charles shot at the flying Huguenots from the window. The splendid saloons of the palace which a few days before had rung with nuptial festivity now echoed with the shrieks of dying Huguenots.

It will be impossible to tell the details of this terrible event. Mad and malignant women, and young children nursed on the milk of malice, lent their aid to the religious massacre by torturing the dying and abusing the bodies of the dead. The previous morning Henry of Navarre had been arrested and confined in the king's chamber. Marguerite had a premonition of the impending danger. The evening before, she clung to her sister Claude, oppressed with a sense of the approaching horror. The murderess Catherine had violently driven her to the apartment of her husband, lest her absence might excite suspicion. She passed the night in sleepless terror. Henry's rooms were filled with his companions in arms. At length the door was thrown open, and a man covered with blood rushed into the room, pursued by soldiers. He threw his arms around the screaming queen, clung to her, begged piteously for life. Marguerite released herself and fled hastily across the halls of the Louvre to her sister's room. The rooms that had so lately rang with the revels of her wedding night now resounded with the clamor of the general massacre. She saw fugitive Huguenots pierced by the spears of their pursuers. Horror-stricken and faint, she threw herself at the feet of her mother, and tremblingly and tearfully begged the lives of two of her husband's retainers. Of Henry's band of Huguenot attendants but a few escaped. They were driven out into the court, where, between two lines of Swiss guards, they were cut to pieces without mercy. In the morning there lay piled under the windows of the palace over two hundred of the purest and noblest gentlemen of France. Catherine and her corrupt court came out and insulted their dead bodies.

After Coligny had been cast into the street his head was cut off and embalmed with spices to be presented to the pope. The murderous mob then cut off his arms and dragged his mutilated body through the streets of Paris. He was afterwards hung up by the heels outside of the city and exposed to the scorn of the populace. The whole city was now in arms. Sixty thousand furious and frantic Catholics ran up and down the streets committing atrocities beyond the power of imagination to paint. Every papist became an assassin, and every hat or cap was marked with a white cross. The infirm were murdered in the bed of sickness; the aged stabbed while tottering on their crutches; children snatched from their mothers, and tossed on the points of spears; infants strangled in their cradles, and men and women indiscriminately murdered.

All through that fearful Sabbath day, the feast of St. Bartholomew, and for two succeeding days, the murders went on. Charles rode through the streets a raging lunatic. Oaths, shrieks, and the discharge of firearms were heard in all directions. Houses were smeared with the blood of their owners, and the streets were strewed with corpses. The Seine was turned to blood. Nothing but the blood of women and babes appeared to appease the tigerish rage of the murderers. Infants were dragged through the streets with cords around their necks and thrown into the Seine from baskets. An infant smiled in the face of the man who had seized it, and played with his beard, but the monster stabbed the child, and with an oath hurled it into the Seine. Three hundred and fifty Protestants were confined in a place called the Archbishop's Prison. To this place a number of soldiers repaired, picked their pockets of what money they had, took from them such garments as they thought proper to appropriate to their own use, and then drawing their swords, cut them to pieces without the least remorse.

For three days the butchery continued with all the excessive atrocities that religious zeal and hate can inspire. It extended throughout the kingdom. Every effort was made, by orders of the king, to exterminate the Huguenots. Four thousand reformers were murdered at Lyons. Bordeaux, Orleans, Auger, and all the provincial towns ran with blood. The most eloquent of the Jesuit preachers employed all their eloquence in urging on the work of slaughter. The number of the slain throughout France is estimated to have been upwards of one hundred thousand.

History offers no parallel to this wholesale religious massacre, even in its bloodiest and most barbarous periods. After the slaughter had subsided, the assassins paraded the streets of Paris, boasting that they had dyed their white cockades red with the blood of the Huguenots. A papist apothecary suggested that money might be realized from the fat contained in the multitude of dead bodies that lay about; accordingly the plumpest bodies were selected, and the grease extracted from them was sold for three shillings per pound. The inhabitants of the villages which lay below Paris, on the borders of the Seine, were astonished to see the numbers of dead bodies that floated down the stream. Even some Catholics were led to exclaim, "It surely could not be men, but devils in their appearance, who have committed these cruelties."

The news of the fate of the Huguenots was received by Pope Gregory XIII. with unbounded joy. Rome rang with rejoicings. The guns of the castle of San Angelo gave forth a joyous salute. Bells sounded from every tower, and bonfires blazed throughout the night. Attended by a pompous procession of priests and cardinals, Gregory proceeded to the church of St. Louis, where the cardinal of Lorraine chanted a Te Deum. The death gurgle of the butchered hosts of Bartholomew was music to the court of the Vatican. His holiness sent Charles the Golden Rose for his dutiful conduct. A medal was struck to commemorate the glorious massacre, and from all the pulpits of Rome, Charles, Catherine, and the Guises were eloquently proclaimed the new founders of the papal Church.

But the effect of the dreadful deed upon the feeble intellect of Charles proved fatal. His health began to decline. His conscience never slept. His mind was racked by terror and remorse. He heard strange noises in the air like the death cries of dying Huguenots. His room seemed smeared with blood, and the ghosts of the murdered haunted his bedside. "I am lost! I am lost!" he shrieked amidst sobs and tears to his faithful Huguenot nurse who had watched over him from the cradle. Catherine came to console him with the news of the capture of one of his enemies. He only said to her, "Madam, such things concern me no longer. I am dying." He received the last rites of the Church, and soon after died. This was in 1574. Then Catherine's favorite son, the duke of Anjou, for whom she had so long plotted and schemed, became king, under the name of Henry III. There is little doubt that Charles was carried off by poison administered by the hands of his mother. Catherine continued her old career of policy and poisoning.

She died in 1589; her son Henry III., was assassinated, and her guilty race faded forever from the earth. But her murderous spirit still seems to have lingered in unhappy Paris. It was this murderous spirit which ripened into the enormities of drayonnades, the horrors of the Reign of Terror, and the bloody excesses of the modern commune; and it seems as though only through the blood of its own citizens can the splendid capital expiate the massacre of St. Bartholomew and the crime of tolerating such a monster as Catherine de Medici.

Human Sacrifices.

Among the most remarkable features of this rite of destroying a straw-man or other puppet—a right to which a historical air has been given among us by our burning of Guy Fawkes, a religious meaning among the Southern Catholics by their hanging of Judas Iscariot—are the traces which they retain in some lands of an ancient custom of human sacrifice. To this day in remote districts, especially in Russia, not only are fruits and flowers destroyed along with the figure which seems to be an effigy of either the genius or the enemy of vegetation, but living creatures are also put to death. Thus, in olden days, the Parisians were diverted by the screams of a score of cats, which were burned to death in the Midsummer St. John's fire on the Place de Grève. And thus, at the present day, the inhabitants of Luchon in the Pyrenees extract great delight from the wrigglings of the snakes which, on St. John's Eve, they throw into a fire which is lighted under the auspices of the clergy. For the clergy have, in many lands, given their sanction to what is really an old heathenish custom, connected with the ancient Baal or Moloch fires of Asia, the Palilia fires of the old Romans, and the Not feur or plague-staying Need-fire of our Teutonic and Celtic ancestors. There seems to be good reason for supposing that into these fires, in very ancient times, human beings also were flung. In some places the straw-man, or other figure representing a human being of ordinary size, was replaced by a gigantic wicker-work form. Such a figure as this, six yards high, made of osier twigs, used to be burned every July in the Rue des Ours at Paris, after having been led in procession through the whole city. This custom, which lasted till 1743, was popularly supposed to date back to the burning of a blasphemous soldier on the same spot in 1418. But that was a perversion of history. Just as figures of the Guy Fawkes kind are yearly burned in lands which never heard of a gunpowder plot, so were similar figures to "The Giant of the Rue des Ours" yearly given to the flames in other places. Thus in Brie (Isle de France) un mannequin d'osier is said to be burned every 23d of June. Very interesting is it to compare this osier-twig figure with that in which the ancient Britons are said to have burned human beings to death. According to the testimony of Cæsar, Strabo, and Diodorus, the Druids used to construct huge figures of twigs, which they filled with human beings, and then consumed with fire. Thieves and murderers were preferred as sacrifices, but if there were not enough of them forthcoming, innocent persons also had to suffer. Cæsar's gigantic figures, contexta viminibus, seem very like the osier-twig giant of the Rue des Ours and his monstrous kin. And there appears to be good reason for supposing that the human sacrifices thus offered up by the Britons were intended to accompany some such rites as those with which the inhabitants of a great part of Europe still hail the advent of spring or Midsummer, or attempt to ward off pestilence from their fields and homes. Within the last few years, at least one Russian peasant has been known to sacrifice a poor relation in the hopes of staying an an epidemic.—The Contemporary Review.

Jesus Pays It All; or, Who Settles the Bill?

BY HOMER A. BILLINGS.

Said a Christian to me,
"Salvation is free
For the rich and the poor, the great and the small:
So now don't displeas use—
Have faith in our Jesus,
Who died to redeem us and ransomed us all."

If Jesus paid this infinite debt—
A debt not very small—
Why should I worry then, or fret,
Since Jesus paid it all?
No wonder Christians lie and cheat,
And do things mean and small—
They're free; they claim a heavenly seat;
For Jesus paid it all.

"Believe, or be damned," said the Christian to me;
(This was said with more gusto, I fear, than good will.)
We Christians are guiltless; from sin we're set free,
For Jesus, our Savior, has settled the bill.

"Go, thou, repent, thou child of the devil."
"Hold on, neighbor Christian," said I; "pray keep still;
I had always supposed that good Christians were civil,
Since Jesus, their Savior, had settled their bill."

"But you are a skeptic, and talk about Reason;
Your damnable doctrines you seek to instill
In the minds of good Christians. Reflect for a season;
Grieve not our dear Savior, who settles the bill."

"Did Jesus pay all? and if so, what then
Remains in the contract for me to fulfill?
You say that Christ Jesus once died for all men—
That he satisfied justice and settled the bill."

"He paid for us Christians, and those who believe
And rely on the promises made in his will;
But for scoffers like you, who wish to deceive,
I fear that the devil will settle your bill."

"I thank you, good Christian. I'm learning, you see;
Though your language to me don't express much good-will.
We are both, alike, guiltless from sin; we're 'scot-free.'
Since Christ and the devil both settle the bill."

I told this dear Christian that always, from youth,
I had tried to gain knowledge by searching for truth—
Had read the big Bible and about his dear Savior,
And had tried to sustain a respectful behavior;
I did not believe in some things, which I could not;
But my friend still insisted that 'twas because I would not.
His peculiar belief I had failed to inherit.
Neither faith nor belief is entitled to merit.

Kind words with kind actions to all whom we meet
Will yield us a joy unspeakably sweet.
I had rather have these than this faith of my neighbor's,
To sweeten life's ills at the close of my labors
When my neighbor's great Day of Assizes shall come.
When he's ready to enter his heavenly home,
Neither Christ nor the devil the contract will fill,
Since every man's left to pay his own bill.

REVIVALISMS.

BY LA ROY SUNDERLAND.

And Moody-mad the converted become;
Each shouts his own dogmas aloud;
Each relies on his faith in the unknown—
And all this in a maddening crowd.

For the human brain, when inflated
By faith or gas, like the balloon,
Becomes a nuisance to be abated,
As men are when struck by the moon.

To get up a scare, such are the means used,
The human mind to overcome;
And men do not know when they are abused
When to such extremes they succumb.

Human progression falters in its gait,
And in its growth the soul is chilled;
For the higher good it is compelled to wait,
And humanity's hopes are killed.

Quincy, Mass., April 23, 1878.

THE coal production of China is reckoned at 3,000,000 tons annually. The anthracite beds of Shansi represent 1,000,000: the bituminous coal of that province, 700,000. All the eighteen provinces contain coal; and, although the extent of the coal fields and the age and quality of the coal vary, yet China may now be regarded as one of the first coal countries of the world. The area of her coal fields exceeds even that o North America, and with the greatest of them—that of Shansi—no other coal region can be compared in the union of the most fortunate conditions as regards position, quality, and quantity. Along with the coal, brown iron ore is also found in great quantity. With a yearly production of 300,000,000 tons, it is estimated that this extensive bed of anthracite alone could cover the whole present demand of the world for 2,400 years. But the working of the Chinese coal fields is yet so much in its infancy that the production at present, in spite of the most favorable circumstances, is only equal to about one-fifteenth of the production of Germany or the United States.

Platform of National Reformers.

It has ever been a question with past ages how politicians could best govern the people. We propose now, for the first time, to inquire how the people may best govern the politicians. For this purpose we propose the PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL REFORMERS.

1. All public officers are servants, and not rulers of a free people; the only ruler should be law.

2. Petitions reading, "As in duty bound, will ever pray," etc., are degrading to sovereigns in addressing their servants, and should be changed to requests, which, when sustained by a majority, should always be obeyed by our Congress and Legislatures, and a veto power should remain in the hands of the people, to be exercised by ballot.

3. All sham dignities or titles should be abolished as relics of monarchy and aristocracy.

4. Civil service reform should be enforced and strict accountability of all servants required.

5. Abolition of the Electoral College, and election of president and vice-president by the people.

6. Election of postmasters by the people they are required to serve.

7. The graduation of the salaries of all officers to that of the average of the people they serve; national to those of the people of the whole nation; state to those of the whole state; and county and city to those of the county and city; and let economy and not extravagance become the rule, and emulation and frugality become popular.

8. The sale of the president's (nation's) White House; the abolition of all perquisites, and no servants of the government be permitted to prosecute claims against the government they serve.

Let it never be the interest of a servant to wrong his employer. He should work for the interest of the great whole, and not of his little self; for the people, and not for the individual. If he cannot do this, he has not philanthropy or patriotism enough for an office-holder or public servant.

One party, when striving to oust another, continually cries out for retrenchment and reform, which means, Let a well-filled lot of leeches be put off, and an empty hungry lot be permitted to take their places.

Servants are now paid more than their masters; subjects more than their sovereigns; the employee exalted above his employer; the servant served and honored by the master who humbly, with hat in hand, petitions him to do the very thing he is employed to do, and paid for doing, and great thanks are rendered for doing what he is in duty bound to do. Servants determine their own perquisites and salaries, rights and privileges and immunities, and make rules for and govern their masters.

Neither Congress or legislative power should have any right to grant subsidies, or vote away public money without public consent, give state dinners, or entertain illustrious characters at the people's expense; be absent one day from the post of duty while drawing their pay for being there at actual work, or in any other way defraud the people they are required to serve.

The following is offered as a solution of the financial problem.

Let us first inquire, What are the people's real needs?

1. Ascertain the amount of money in circulation to each individual in prosperous times. We need as much to make us prosperous now. This is the basis.

2. Let Congress pass an act requiring the U. S. Treasury to manufacture the amount needed in greenbacks, counting in the money now in circulation. Then appoint certain postmasters (under such rules as the wisdom of Congress may enact) as government agents by whom this money may be loaned on first mortgages on the people's real estate at one third its usual assessed value, and at a rate of interest not exceeding three per cent.

Thus the Treasury instead of paying interest would receive it; instead of growing poorer would grow richer; our money matters be transacted among ourselves, without foreign aid; national banks and bankers find less to do; no gold interest-bearing bonds issued tending to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer; money made abundant as before; the people's needs supplied; the rates of interest everywhere lowered; the trade of capitalists and money-lending usurers, who loan money at ruinous rates, and become rich by foreclosing mortgages and securing the property of their unfortunate neighbors, find their business among the things that were; a new impulse given to business, for with money abundant, business will be resumed, and employment given to the idle; and men can afford to invest when money can be obtained at low rates and long time, and little or no danger from foreclosure or bankruptcy; the post-office department made self-sustaining; immense revenue derived from interest cheerfully paid; taxation and the national debt lowered; no necessity for failures in business, for when conducted with ordinary prudence, it would be sure and reliable, and prosperity once more dawn upon all our people, and our government become less corrupt, and our politics no longer a school of vice for the nation. D. JENKINS.

Was Prof. Henry a Buddhist?

[The following outspoken, radical remarks are from the Evening Telegram, of this city, one of our most popular dailies.]

A long letter written, but never sent, by the late Professor Henry, secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to his friend, Mr. Joseph Patterson, of Philadelphia, and found among the Professor's papers after his death, is published this week and extensively quoted as evidence that the conflict between Christianity and modern scientific reasoning is not so radical as is commonly supposed. On a careful perusal of this very interesting letter we cannot see it in that light. It is an enthusiastic argument for the existence of "a Spiritual Being, infinite in wisdom, in power and all divine perfections which exist always and everywhere, and who has created us with intellectual faculties sufficient in some degree to comprehend his operations as they are developed in nature by what is called science." But it is scrupulously silent concern ing the main point of difference between Christians and so-called men of science—namely, inividual immortality. A few years ago the following declarations were imputed on responsible authority to the Rev. Thomas M. Clark, the learned Protestant Episcopal bishop of Rhode Island. They will be found in the late Mr. Robert Dale Owen's "Debatable Land," but without a specification of the bishop's name.

Evidences of Infidelity, he said, were multiplying among us; he had lately heard a professor of Harvard College express the opinion that three-fourths of the scientific men of our day are unbelievers, and that skepticism is beginning to intrude among the clergy. He told me that he himself, a few weeks before, had visited the death-bed of an aged brother in the ministry, a man who had devoted a long life with rare faithfulness to the duties of his profession. As they spoke of the evidences of Christianity, a shade of sadness passed over the dying man's face. "Ah, bishop," he said, "the proof, the proof! if we only had it!" These and similar experiences had led the bishop to believe that the evidences of a future life which satisfied our ancestors are insufficient to convince some of the most honest and able of their descendants.

There is not a phrase in Professor Henry's letter which contradicts the supposition that he was an unbeliever like "three-fourths of the scientific men of our day," and that he died yearning for "the proof" of Christianity, like Bishop Clark's aged brother in the ministry. St. Paul proclaims that immortality is the essence of the Christian religion. He speaks of "the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus," and of "the grace of God made manifest by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." Professor Henry, acknowledging the existence of God, nevertheless is silent concerning any such manifestations of divine grace. For aught that appears, he died in doubt whether what he called "the thinking, willing principle" within himself, "capable of intellectual activity and of moral feeling," did not expire with his physical frame.

The theory of the majority of modern men of science concerning individual immorality has been boldly and precisely expressed by Prof. Huxley as follows, and let Americans remember, when they read these words, that they were not deemed a disqualification for the tender to their author of the chair vacated by the late Prof. Agassiz in Harvard College:

In the interests of scientific clearness I object to say that I have a soul, when I mean all the while that my organism has certain mental functions which, like the rest, are dependent upon its molecular composition and come to an end when I die; and I object still more to affirm that I look to a future life, when all that I mean is that the influence of my doings and sayings will be more or less felt by a number of people after the physical components of that organism are scattered to the four winds. Throw a stone into the sea, and there is a sense in which it is true that the wavelets which spread around it have an effect through all space and all time. Shall we say that the stone has a future life?

The predominance of this view among the ablest and clearest scientific reasoners of the present day is conclusively attested by the offer of one of the two foremost universities on this continent, which maintains two schools for special instruction in Christian doctrine, to place Prof. Huxley at the head of its scientific faculty. If he had accepted the proposal, as at one moment he inclined to do, we should now behold the anomaly of a corps of theological professors on one side of Divinity avenue in Cambridge, Mass., teaching the Christian scheme of salvation, while on the other side, scarcely a hundred feet distant, the chief of the scientific professors would be denying that we have any souls to save.

If Prof. Henry dissented from the theory of substantive annihilation of the individuality of man by death, the fact needs better evidence than his letter to Mr. Joseph Patterson; and his family are under obligation to give such evidence to the world if it exists, for it is they themselves who have provoked the inquisition by volunteering the publication of the Patterson letter. Our suspicion is, that like a certain minority of men of science which shrinks from the radical confession of Huxley, he held opinions concerning an immortal life for human beings which are scarcely more satisfactory to Christians. This minority, acknowledging a vast spiritual existence pervading the universe, even as there is a vast existence of matter, believes that when man dies "the thinking, willing principle" within him, as Prof. Henry calls it—in other words, his soul—loses its individuality by absorption into this universal mind. In short, as to a future life, they are Buddhists.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

THE

and one of the youngest may both now be had at the price of the former by any NEW subscriber to "the grand and sterling old Boston Investigator." Col. Ingersoll said: "The Investigator is the best of the Liberal papers." (This was before he read the Evolution.) We will send both papers, prepaid, one year, to any bona fide new subscriber to the Investigator, for $3.50, which is the price of the Investigator alone.

The Investigator is now in its forty-seventh year. It is a weekly of eight large folio pages, contains the news pertaining to Liberalism, reports of meetings, correspondence all over the world, abstracts, and sometimes full reports, of such Liberal lecturers as Col. Ingersoll, B. F. Underwood, Horace Seaver, and other eloquent Freethinkers.

Every Radical in America should take these two papers and induce others to take them.

In addition to the above splendid offer, we offer until May 1st to send, in addition, to any one not now a subscriber to either the Evolution or the Investigator who will send us $3.50—to reach us before May 1st—a copy of a choice edition of the Koran. Address

SPRINGFIELD HYGEIAN HOME.

That others may know more of what we are trying to do, I will simply state that during the three years we have been here nearly 1,000 persons have been successfully treated by us for a great variety of diseases, both acute and chronic, including Fever and Ague, Congestive Chills, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Neuralgia, Female diseases, Insanity, Consumption, Inflammatory Rheumatism, White Swellings, Paralysis, etc. But one death occurred in all that number, and every one benefited or permanently cured where the laws of life were strictly adhered to. With a fair trial, where cure is possible, we may safely promise good health to all. Please state definitely the nature and probable cause of your disease, when contracted, age, amount of drugs taken, etc., and we will give you an honest reply as to the probability of recovery.

For circular and other information, please address J. S. LYON, M.D., Springfield, Mo., Box 247. 4t

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF

CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact fac simile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is in England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on live issues with a promptitude unequaled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest, cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers.

Published every month.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL OR OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

Gems of Thought.

WHATEVER you dislike in another person take care to correct in yourself by the gentle reproof.—Sprat.

THE soul is cured of its maladies by certain incantations; those incantations are beautiful reasons, from which temperance is generated in souls.—Socrates.

REALITY surpasses imagination; and we see, breathing, brightening, and moving before our eyes, sights dearer to our hearts than any we ever beheld in the land of sleep.—Goethe.

HALF the misery of human life, might be extinguished would men alleviate the general curse they lie under, by mutual offices of compassion, benevolence, and humanity.—Addison

LET us labor for that larger and larger comprehension of truth, that more and more thorough repudiation of error, which shall make the history of mankind a series of ascending developments.—Horace Mann.

IN science, read, by preference, the newest works; in literature, the oldest. The classic literature is always modern. New books revive and redecorate old ideas; old books suggest and invigorate new ideas.—Lytton.

HE that takes away reason to make room for revelation puts out the light of both, and does much the same as if he would persuade a man to put out his eyes, the better to receive the remote light of an invisible star by a telescope.—Locke.

IF virtue promises happiness, prosperity, and peace, then progress in virtue is certainly progress in each of these; for to whatever point the perfection of anything brings us, progress is always an approach towards it.—Epictetus.

ALL our progress is an unfolding, like the vegetable bud. You have first an instinct, then an opinion, then a knowledge, as the plant has root, bud, and fruit. Trust the first instinct to the end, though you can render no reason.—Emerson.

MANKIND never loses any good thing, physical, intellectual, or moral, till it finds a better, and then the loss is a gain. No steps backward is the rule of human history. What is gained by one man is invested in all men, and is a permanent investment for all time.—Theodore Parker.

THERE are three classes of readers: some enjoy without judgment; others judge without enjoyment; and some there are who judge while they enjoy, and enjoy while they judge. The latter class reproduces the work of art on which it is engaged. Its numbers are very small.—Goethe.

DURING our prosperity, and while things flow agreeably to our desire, we ought with great care to avoid pride and arrogance; for, as it discovers weakness not to bear adversity with equanimity, so also with prosperity: equanimity, in every condition of life, is a noble attribute.—Cicero.

REFORM, like charity, must begin at home. Once well at home, how will it radiate outwards, irrepressible, into all that we touch and handle, speak and work, kindling ever new light by incalculable contagion; spreading, in geometric ratio, far and wide; doing good only, wherever it spreads, and not evil.—Carlyle.

UPON the present theological computation, ten souls must be lost for one that is saved. At which rate of reckoning, heaven can raise but its cohorts, while hell commands its legions. From which sad account it would appear that, though our Savior had conquered death by the resurrection, he had not yet been able to overcome sin by the redemption.—Sterne.

"CAN any good come out of Nazareth?" This is always the question of the wiseacres and the knowing ones. But the good, the new, comes from exactly that quarter whence it is not looked for, and is always something different from what is expected. Everything new is received with contempt, for it begins in obscurity. It becomes a power unobserved.—Feuerbach.

WHEN I look upon the tombs of the great, every emotion of envy dies; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire forsakes me; when I meet with the grief of parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion; when I see the tombs of the parents themselves, I reflect how vain it is to grieve for those whom we must quickly follow; when I see kings lying beside those who deposed them; when I behold rival wits placed side by side, or the holy men who divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the frivolous competitions, factions, and debates of mankind.—Addison.

NOTHING to live for? Fie upon thee, then, selfish idler! 'Tis thy own fault if life does not bristle all over with desirabilities. Come up out of the depths of thy misanthropic, contemptible whinings, and make of life just what thou wilt. What matters it if all that gave to the past its brightness and beauty has faded and gone? Bestir thyself and create new enjoyments, new aspirations, and new desires. Think of something besides the now and present, of self and selfish gratification. Go to work and do something, if not for thyself for some one else who needs thy labor. Nothing worth having can be obtained without necessary toil. If thou desirest love thou must deserve and win it. If fame be thy wished-for prize, labor and toil for the boon. If virtue be thy goal, seek her with clean hands and a pure heart; then she will be thine. Up! and be doing. Earnest, persistent labor is the one universal key to sure and unfailing success.—Mrs. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

IT is argued, and with great plausibility, that Columbus did not deserve the credit he received for discovering America. All he had to do was to keep going right ahead and he was sure to strike it somewhere. The wonder would have been if he had missed it.

AN old colored woman of one of the back counties sings all the good old Methodist hymns, but she gets them mixed sometimes. She sings:

"Sweet prospects, sweet birds, and sweet flowers,
Have lost all their sweetness but me."

And another:

"Am I a shoulder of a hoss,
A quarter of a lamb?"

She means all right, though, bless her good heart!—Hartford Times.

HOW TO DETECT MARRIED PEOPLE.—If you see a lady and gentleman disagree upon trifling occasions, or correcting each other in company, you may be assured they have tied the matrimonial noose. If you see a silent pair in a cab or railway carriage lolling carelessly, one at each window, without seeming to know they have a companion, the sign is infallible. If you see a lady drop her glove, and a gentleman by the side of her kindly telling her to pick it up, you need not hesitate in forming your opinion; or if you see a lady whose beauty and accomplishments attract the attention of every gentleman in the room but one, you need have no difficulty in determining their relationship to each other—the one is her husband. If you see a gentleman particularly courteous, obliging, and good-natured, relaxing into smiles, saying sharp things, and toying with every pretty woman in the room excepting one, to whom he appears particularly cold and formal, and is unreasonably cross—who that one is nobody can be at a loss to discover. The rules above quoted are laid down as infallible in just interpretation; they may be resorted to with confidence; they are upon unerring principles, and deducted from every-day experience.

OLD SI ON ROUND DANCES.—Old Si read an article on the "Dance of Death," otherwise the waltz, and remarked:

"Dey's kicken' up er moughty rumpus 'bout er little swingin' o' corners in dis country."

"Well, what is the matter now?"

"All dis hyar hoorah 'bout folks pattin' juba an' sasshayin' round. Now whar's de harm in dat?"

"Why, they say it is unhealthy and sinful."

"Yes, I sees dat; but ar' hit onhealthy when er ole 'oman waltzes round at er camp meetin' wid fo' presidin' elders exercisin' dar muscle tryin' ter hold her on de ground?"

"That is not the question."

"Dat's de queschin I'se puttin'! An' I wants ter know ef hit's sinful fer de parson ter put his arm round de gals an' go in washin' wid 'em at dese big creek-baptizin's?"

"Are you in favor of waltzing and balls and such unchristianlike proceedings?"

"I ain't needer 'gin ner fer hit, dat I knows on; but my flatform on dat is dis: Ef folks 'll keep dere boys out of dese groceries and ballyard shops, and dere gals offen de streets so much, but make 'em stay at home, work fer dere bred, prance round in de parlor ez much ez dey pleaz, and not shout 'glory halleloo' tell dey means hit, dar'll be er big enflashun in religion in dis country 'fore long. Yer heah me!"

JOSH BILLINGS ON MARRIAGE.—Sum marry bekause they have been highsted sum whar else; this iz a cross match, bay and sorrel; pride makes it endurable.

Sum marry for love without a cent in their pocket nor a friend in the world, nor a drop of pedigree. This looks desperate, but it shows the strength of the game.

Sum marry bekause they think wimmin will be scarce next year, and live to wonder how the crop holds out.

Sum marry to get rid of themselves, and discover that the game was won that two could play at, and neither win.

Sum marry the second time to get even, and find it a gambling game—the more they put down the less they put up.

Sum marry to be happy, and, not finding it, wonder where all the happiness goes to when it dies.

Sum marry, they can't tell why, and live, they can't tell how.

Almost everybody gets married, and it is a good joke.

Sum marry in haste, and then sit down and think it carefully over.

Sum think it carefully over fust, and then sit down and marry.

Both ways are right, if they hit the mark.

Sum marry rakes tew convert them. This iz a little risky, and takes a smart missionary to do it.

Sum marry coquettes. This is like buying a poor farm, heavily mortgaged, and working the balance ov yure days to clear oph the mortgages.

But, after all, married life is full as certain as the dry goods bizziness.

No man kan swear exactly where he will fetch up when he touches calico.

No man kan tell jist what calico has made up its mind tew do next.

Calico don't know even herself.

Dry goods ov all kinds iz the child ov circumstansis.

If ennybody asks you why you got married (if it needs be), tell him you don't recollekt.

Marriage is a safe way to gamble; if yu win, yu win a pile; and if yu loze, yu don't loze ennything only the privilege of living dismally alone, and soaking yure own feet.

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS

FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 23. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, June 8, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. Mr. Partridge, a Baptist missionary at Swatow, China, writes that the Chinese have for a long time had telephones, made chiefly out of fine strips of bamboo. They work well, although not over very long distances.

THE Supreme Court of Massachusetts decides that a man who gives a note for a church subscription need not pay it unless he wants to, as there is no real "value received" in the matter, and without that the note cannot be a legal obligation. This may be a relief to some of the brethren who have pledged under the impulse of Kimball.

PARADISE AND THE ZOO.—The Dean of Chichester was select preacher at Oxford the other day, and, after his usual brilliant fashion, demolished the Darwinian theory with an apostrophe. "Ye men of science," said Dr. Burgon, "ye men of science, leave me my ancestors in paradise, and I do not grudge you yours in the Zoological Gardens."

A GREAT lace house at Nottingham, England, holds a half-hour daily prayer meeting for its 800 employees. If these employees go to prayer meeting, they are paid for their whole time. If they absent themselves from the prayer meeting, the half hour is deducted from their wages, unless they are on duty in the establishment while the meeting is in progress.

THE SANCTUARY MUST BE RESPECTED.—The story comes from Deadwood that a member of a certain church congregation was bowieknifed by a zealous deacon for putting a counterfeit quarter in the contribution-box, and the excited pastor, without leaving his pulpit, shot the good deacon for creating a disturbance during divine service.—Chicago Times.

THE London Daily News contains the following announcement: "Within the last five years the Rev. J. P. Eden has been presented to four benefices in succession, by the Bishop of Durham. The last is Wearmouth, value £2,000 a year!" All doubts as to the exact locality of the Garden of Eden are now, of course, set at rest. It blooms in the county of Durham.

LAST Sunday's Sunday school lesson was on Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego in the fiery furnace. The day was very warm, and an ingenious Sunday school boy said to his teacher: "Well, I don't see the good of putting these three fellows in a furnace, and telling us about it this hot day; let's make believe it was an ice cream freezer that they were shut up in."

A BROOKLYN pastor issues to each person whom he baptizes a "certificate of dedication," testifying that on such a day the baptized person was by baptism dedicated to the service of God. Finding these useful outside of his own immediate wants, he sells them at a shilling apiece retail, or wholesales them for a dollar and a quarter a dozen. They are meant for framing or putting in family Bibles. If he would also furnish paid-up policies for heaven perhaps they would sell well.

AT a recent meeting in England, which was characterized by much religious excitement, an old man gave expression to his joy by shouting until it began to interrupt the service. Brother W—— was requested to "go and stop the old man's noise." He went to him and spoke a few words, and the shouting man at once became quiet. "Brother W——, what did you say to the old man that quieted him so promptly?" "I asked him for a guinea for foreign missions," replied Brother W——.

A CALVINIST mother had read of a morning to her little daughter that chapter of the New Testament in which mention is made of a sin that shall never be forgiven. After the reading, the child sat silent a minute, then said: "Mamma, won't God forgive them ever, ever?" "No, my child." "But why not, mamma." The embarrassed mother answered as best she could; that is, with the commonplaces about God's constraining justice. The little girl seemed to accept the explanation, and was again silent, but presently cried out, "Well, mamma, God isn't a Christian, then, is he?"

VIOLENT convulsions of nature are coming thick and fast this year. Closely following the hurricane in southern Wisconsin and northern Illinois of a week ago, by which fifty persons were killed, is that of Saturday in Richmond, Missouri, where dwellings were demolished and stores and warehouses leveled, until one-third of the town was destroyed. The death list is already fifteen, and it will be swelled to twenty, for sixty or seventy persons are seriously hurt. Yet another violent cyclone unroofed buildings and uprooted trees in Quincy, Ill., yesterday. Does it not look indeed as though Providence was on a rampage?

IT seems, from a paper read the other day before the London Society of Arts by Mr. W. H. Preece, that the flies which are now becoming so numerous with the increasing warmth, have a speech of their own, and are not confined to the irritating buzz with which they have been so long associated. This fly language can be heard with the assistance of the microphone, which magnifies sound and aids the ear as the microscope does the eye. Mr. Preece states that with it he has heard the tramp of a little fly across a box with a tread almost as loud as that of a horse across a wooden bridge. A curious sound accompanied the tramp of the fly, which, it is suggested, was caused by the neighing of its proboscis.

THE terrible sufferings of a Tenth Cavalry company on the Staked Plain of Texas, through thirst, are described by Surgeon King. They were four days without water, and the weather was intensely hot. Their predicament was caused by the death of their guide, leaving them to wander by themselves until a spring was finally found. Their mouths became so dry that brown sugar would not melt in them. Their voices grew weak and strange, and their sight dim, and when asleep they dreamed of banqueting. A sense of suffocation was extremely painful. They drank water greedily, but it did not quench their thirst, which shows, the surgeon thinks, that the sense of thirst resides not in the stomach, but in the general system, and in this case could not be relieved until the remote tissues were supplied.

M. EDWARD ANDRE has an article in the Illustration Horticole, showing that the original home of our common potato is South America, in the Andes, near the equator. He first found it growing wild on the summit of Quindio, near the volcano of Tolima, at a height of 11,400 feet, in latitude 4 degrees and 34 minutes north. He next found it at 6,200 feet high in the Cauca in latitude 1 degree, 33 minutes north, in May, 1866. It was growing as a handsome vine, supporting itself on the neighboring trees and bearing magnificent flowers of a deep purple. M. Andre also found it in North Lima in the Amancoes mountain, where, in the midst of a very scanty vegetation, the potato is found growing in abundance. It is equally common in the island of San Lorenzo, near Callao. M. Andre is convinced that Humboldt is entirely mistaken in his opinion that the tuber did not exist either in Chili, New Granada, or Peru.

DIVORCES IN ROUMANIA.—A Bucharest correspondent of the London Times says divorces are extremely common there, and considered as one of the usual attendants of society. The Roumanians say that some men and their wives will always quarrel, and sometimes separate. This happens in all countries; therefore it is better to part quietly and remain good friends, so to speak, than to live in continual wrangling, or separate after a divorce suit and part enemies for life. The following incident of this custom is narrated: "I knew a young man here who informed me that he had been recently divorced from his wife; this he did in a casual conversation, and without any of the embarassment that would attend such information in an English city. Some time afterward I had occasion to call at his residence, and was presented by him to his mother, and then, much to my astonishment, to his ex-wife, who had called to visit them with their little daughter. There they had a pleasant chat together. When I reflected on the probable result to hair and eyes which would ensue from a meeting between an Anglo-Saxon mother and her divorced daughter-in-law, I was somewhat staggered in trying to institute a mental comparison between the merits of the two systems."

ATHEISM.—It is hard to understand why religious—and even non-religious—people should show such extreme horror at the very idea of Atheism. Any crime against man is more easily pardoned than perfectly harmless speculation as to the existence of a Deity. Believers in God seem to forget that if God be a fact, if he be a reality, then no amount of reasoning can do away with his existence. Let us suppose that God's existence is as real to some people as the color green is visible to others; let us suppose that a man is color-blind, and is unable to distinguish the greenness of the leaves of the forget-me-not from the blueness of its petals; does the color-blind man commit a crime when he says that the leaves do not appear to him to be green? Suppose the Atheist to be entirely in error, is he any more criminal when he is unable to acknowledge that the arguments for the existence of Deity carry conviction to his intellect? Men speak as though belief and non-belief were matters of the will; they are nothing of the kind. Belief depends entirely upon the evidence submitted in support of the view which challenges acceptance. It is not a voluntary thing; on the contrary, if the evidence be convincing we must believe; if it be not convincing we cannot. Not only do believers in God regard Atheism as a voluntary crime, but they endeavor to strengthen their own illogical arguments by more forcible methods of persuasion. If they cannot convince the inside of the head by reason, they try to appeal to the brain by blows on the external senses. Death, imprisonment, torture, fine, deprivation of property—these have been the missionaries employed by believers in God for the conversion of the Atheist. The Christians have here carried off the palm as persecutors, and no religion can pretend to vie with Christianity in the amount of suffering and misery, murder and torture, which it has inflicted on the unbelievers unfortunate enough to be in its power. "Atheism has been a useful kind of generic name under which to class all thought which endeavored to force its way into the light through the Church walls. Christians have not deigned to trouble themselves with any questions as to the scientific accuracy of the designation employed; in dealing with heretics and unbelievers truth was a secondary matter; these criminals had dared to think for themselves, and what further need was there of investigation? Thus Atheism, has, historically, become synonymous with independence of thought, and in the long roll of those who have suffered as Atheists is to be found every grandest name of the army of progress. Bruno was a Pantheist of mystic type with no clearly defined belief, even as to the God of Nature. Bruno was condemned as Atheist, and as Atheist was burned in Rome. Spinoza was a Pantheist of sterner mould, but it was as Atheist that the world frowned on him, and his race cast him out, and as Atheist he passed his suffering life, too pure, too great, too sublime as thinker for the pigmies around him to grasp his thought aright. Time and space would fail to reckon over the glorious names of Liberty's soldiers who have fought for her as Atheists, and strange, indeed, would it be to-day if we—who of our own choice wear the grand old title, and whose creed is truly Atheistic—strange would it be if we failed to acknowledge it as ours, although the acknowledgement to-day, as in bygone days, brings us into the law courts of the Christian persecutors, and may deprive us of that which we hold dearer than personal liberty, costlier than our property and fame. The leopard Christianity cannot change its spots; but as changeless as is Christianity in its persecuting hate, so changeless also is Atheism in its unbending courage. The Atheists of the nineteenth century are not all unworthy of their parentage, nor do they fear to bear their part in the long struggle of right against might, of freedom against slavery, of humanity against gods. The Atheist to-day no longer fights alone when attacked by Christian bigots; many and many a friend gathers round to cheer and encourage the champion. The night of persecution, of intolerance, of ignorance, is long and dark, but now it breaks to the morning; the black of the dreary sky is now riven with the gleaming of the dawn; already as we turn our faces eastward there comes to us the cool fresh breath of Aurora, and soon on our helmets will glitter the first red slant beams of the sun. Courage yet for awhile, though sharp blows be falling; the black hosts of Christianity will fly as the morning breaks, and over the battle field where now rages the struggle will float the white banner of peace and good will to men, the peace which no God shall again destroy, the good will which no religion shall again transform into hate.—Annie Besant.

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

In the cases just mentioned, it is the bodily "struggle to the death" which determines the origin of the secondary sexual characters. But, besides these mortal struggles, there are other important competitions in sexual selection, which no less influence the structure of the rivals. These consist principally in the fact that the courting sex tries to please the other by external finery, by beauty of form, or by a melodious voice. Darwin thinks that the beautiful voices of singing birds have principally originated in this way. Many male birds carry on a regular musical contest when they contend for the possession of the females. It is known of several singing birds, that in the breeding season the males assemble in numbers round the females, and let their songs resound before them, and that then the females choose the singers who best please them for their mates. Among other songsters, individual males pour out their songs in the loneliness of the forest in order to attract the females, and the latter follow the most attractive calls. A similar musical contest, though certainly less melodious, takes place among crickets and grasshoppers. The male cricket has on its belly two instruments like drums, and produces with these the sharp chirping notes which the ancient Greeks curiously enough thought beautiful music. Male grasshoppers, partly by using their hind-legs like the bow of a violin against their wing coverings, and partly by rubbing their wing coverings together, bring out tones which are, indeed, not melodious to us, but which please the female grasshoppers so much that they choose the male who fiddles the best.

Among other insects and birds it is not song, or, in fact, any musical accomplishment, but finery or beauty of the one sex which attracts the other. Thus we find that, among most gallinaceous birds, the cocks are distinguished by combs on their heads, or by a beautiful tail, which they can spread out like a fan; as, for example, in the case of the peacock and turkey-cock. The magnificent tail of the bird of paradise is also an exclusive ornament of the male sex. In like manner, among very many other birds and very many insects, principally among butterflies, the males are distinguished from the females by special colors or other decorations. These are evidently the results of sexual selection. As the females do not possess these attractions and decorations, we must come to the conclusion that they have been acquired by degrees by the males in the competition for the females, which takes its origin in the selective discrimination of the females.

SEXUAL SELECTION IN MAN.

We may easily picture to ourselves, in detail, the application of this interesting conclusion to the human community. Here, also, the same causes have evidently influenced the development of the secondary sexual characters. The characteristics distinguishing the man, as well as those distinguishing the woman, owe their origin, certainly for the most part, to the sexual selection of the other sex. In antiquity and in the Middle Ages, especially in the romantic age of chivalry, it was the bodily struggles to the death—the tournaments and duels—which determined the choice of the bride; the strongest carried home the bride. In more recent times, however, in our so-called "polished" or "highly civilized" society, competing rivals prefer to contend indirectly by means of musical accomplishments, instrumental performances and song, by bodily charms, natural beauty or artificial decoration. But by far the most important of these different forms of sexual selection in man is that form which is the most exalted, namely, psychical selection, in which the mental excellences of the one sex influence and determine the choice of the other. The most highly intellectually developed types of men have, throughout generations, when choosing a partner in life, been guided by her excellencies of soul, and have thus transmitted these qualities to their posterity; and they have in this way, more than by any other thing, helped to create the deep chasm which at present separates civilized men from the rudest savages, and from our common animal ancestors. In fact, both the part played by the prevalence of a higher standard of sexual selection, and the part played by the due division of labor between the two sexes, is exceedingly important; and I believe that here we must seek for the most powerful causes which have determined the origin and the historical development of the races of man. (Gen. Morph. ii., 247.) As Darwin, in his exceedingly interesting work, published in 1871, on "The Origin of Man and Sexual Selection," has discussed this subject in the most masterly manner, and has illustrated it by most remarkable examples, I refer for further detail to that work.

But now let us look again at two extremely important organic laws which can be explained by the theory of selection, as necessary consequences of natural selection in the struggle for existence. I mean the law of division of labor, or differentiation, and the law of progress, or perfecting. When the phenomena due to these two laws first became known, through observation of the historical development, the individual development, and the comparative anatomy of animals and plants, naturalists were inclined to trace them to a direct creative influence. It was supposed to be part of the plan of the Creator, acting for a definite purpose, in the course of time to develop the forms of animals and plants more and more variously, and to bring them more and more to a state of perfection. We shall evidently make a great advance in the knowledge of nature if we reject this teleological and anthropomorphic conception, and if we can prove the two laws of Division of Labor and Perfecting to be the necessary consequences of natural selection in the struggle for life.

DIVISION OF LABOR.

The first great law which follows directly and of necessity from natural selection is that of separation, or differentiation, which is frequently called division of labor, or polymorphism, and which Darwin speaks of as divergence of character. (Gen. Morph. ii, 249.) We understand by it the general tendency of all organic individuals to develop themselves more and more diversely, and to deviate from the common primary type. The cause of this general inclination towards differentiation and the formation of heterogeneous forms from homogeneous beginnings is, according to Darwin, simply to be traced to the circumstance that the struggle for life between every two organisms rages all the more fiercely the nearer the relation in which they stand to one another, or the more nearly alike they are. This is an exceedingly important, and, in reality, an exceedingly simple, relation, but it is usually not duly considered.

It must be obvious to every one that in a field of a certain size, beside the corn-plants which have been sown, a great number of weeds can exist, and, moreover, in places which could not have been occupied by corn-plants. The more dry and sterile places of the ground, in which no corn-plant would thrive, may still furnish sustenance to weeds of different kinds; and such species and individuals of weeds will more readily be able to exist in such conditions in proportion as they are suited to adapt themselves to the different parts of the ground. It is the same with animals. It is evident that a much greater number of animal individuals can live together in one and the same limited district, if they are of various and different natures, than if they are all alike. There are trees (for example, the oak) on which a couple of hundred of different species of insects live together. Some feed on the fruits of the tree, others on the leaves, others again on the bark, the root, etc. It would be quite impossible for an equal number of individuals to live on this tree if all were of one species; if, for example, all fed on the bark, or only upon the leaves. Exactly the same is the case in human society. In one and the same small town only a certain number of workmen can exist, even when they follow different occupations. The division of labor, which is of the greatest use to the whole community, as well as to the individual workman, is a direct consequence of the struggle for life, of natural selection; for this struggle can be sustained more easily the more the activities, and hence, also, the forms of the different individuals deviate from one another. The different function naturally produces its reaction in changing the form, and the physiological division of labor necessarily determines the morphological differentiation—that is, the "divergence of character."

Now, I beg the reader again to remember that all species of animals and plants are variable, and possess the capability of adapting themselves to different places or to local relations. The varieties or races of each species, according to the laws of adaptation, deviate all the more from the original primary species, the greater the difference of the new conditions to which they adapt themselves. If we imagine these varieties—which have proceeded from a common primary form—to be disposed in the shape of a branching, radiating bunch, then those varieties will be best able to exist side by side and propagate which are most distant from one another, which stand at the ends of the series, or at the opposite sides of the bunch. Those forms, on the other hand, occupying a middle position—presenting a state of transition—have the most difficult position in the struggle for life. The necessaries of life differ most in the two extremes, in the varieties most distant from one another, and consequently these will get into the least serious conflict with one another in the general struggle for life. But the intermediate forms, which have deviated less from the original primary form, require nearly the same necessaries of life as the original form, and therefore, in competing for them, they will have to struggle most with, and be most seriously threatened by, its members. Consequently, when numerous varieties of a species live side by side on the same spot of the earth, the extremes, or those forms deviating most from one another, can much more easily continue to exist beside one another than the intermediate forms which have to struggle with each of the different extremes. The intermediate forms will not be able to resist, for any length of time, the hostile influences which the extreme forms victoriously overcome. These alone maintain and propagate themselves, and at length cease to be any longer connected with the original primary species through intermediate forms of transition. Thus arise "good species" out of varieties. Thus, then, the struggle for life necessarily favors the general divergence of organic forms—that is, the constant tendency of organisms to form new species. This fact does not rest upon any mystic quality, or upon an unknown formative tendency, but upon the interaction of Inheritance and Adaptation in the struggle for life. As the intermediate forms—that is, the individuals in a state of transition—of the varieties of every species die out and become extinct, the process of divergence constantly goes further, and from the extremes forms develop which we distinguish as new species.

GOOD AND BAD SPECIES.

Although all naturalists have been obliged to acknowledge the variability and mutability of all species of animals and plants, yet most of them have hitherto denied that the modification or transformation of the organic form surpasses the original limit of the character of the species. Our opponents cling to the proposition, "However far a species may exhibit deviations from its usual form in a collection of varieties, yet the varieties of it are never so distinct from one another as two really good species." This assertion, which Darwin's opponents usually place at the head of their arguments, is utterly untenable and unfounded. This will become quite clear as soon as we critically compare the various attempts to define the idea of species. No naturalist can answer the question as to what is in reality a "genuine or good species" ("bona species"); yet every systematic naturalist uses this expression every day, and whole libraries have been written on the question as to whether this or that observed form is a species or a variety, whether it is a really good or a bad species. The most general answer to this question used to be the following: "To one species belong all those individuals which agree in all essential characteristics. Essential characteristics of species are those which remain permanent or constant, and never become modified or vary." But as soon as a case occurred in which the characteristic—which had hitherto been considered essential—did become modified, then it was said, "This characteristic is not essential to the species, for essential characteristics never vary." Those who argued thus evidently moved in a circle; and the naivete with which this circular method of defining species is laid down in thousands of books as an unassailable truth, and is still constantly repeated, is truly astonishing.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher on Skepticism and Infidelity.

A MOMENTOUS AGE.—TENDENCY OF MODERN THOUGHT DRIFTING AWAY FROM THE CHURCH.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher preached a notable sermon on the morning of May 19th on the "Signs of the Times." The effort was a brilliant one, and seemed to produce much effect upon the immense congregation which had been drawn to Plymouth Church by the beauty of the day. Mr. Beecher took for his text a part of the third verse of Matthew, xvi.: "O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?" The community to which Christ spake, the preacher began, represented at that time the highest form of religious faith—a faith which was clouded by no shadow of infidelity to the forms and doctrines of the Jewish Church. They held to the Scriptures and to the Temple with a hold which nothing could release. But there were influences at work which were to supplant the Temple, to subvert the ritual, to change the whole religious economy of the Hebrew faith; to give it a broader expression, a purer flow and a larger power in the individual and in the race. There were signs of the coming change in the air. But those who clung to the Temple did not discern it, or if they did they sought to conceal it and to trample it under foot. Therefore Christ rebuked them. They were bound to discern the signs of the times, and so are we. There is a growing impression that Christianity is loosing its hold on men, that the Church is a waning power, and all this causes widespread alarm among devout, religious people. The sermons and discourses on skepticism show this, and the age is often called an age of Infidelity. Many persons are trying to get back on the foundations from which they have slid. I think there is a change abroad in the air, and men are everywhere concious of it—some rejoicing and others mourning over it. The time is a momentous one. I propose now at a general view to show what cause there is for alarm, and to-night to show that there is enough to inspire the hope and confidence of men in spiritual religion.

There is among educated thinkers a growing impression that Christianity is losing its hold upon men, and that the Church is a waning power. There is serious alarm on this matter among some teachers. We hear much about the decay of faith. The drift of educated thought in science, in art, and in philosophy is away from Church life, and if religion and church life are identical it must be admitted that the direction of modern thought is away from religion. But I do not admit that religion and Church life are so identical. It is declared that the Church is not a Divine institution. There is a widespread feeling that the teachings of the past in regard to order of worship are vain. There is a doubt whether the minister is other than a man fitted for moral teaching, without any special direction or authority. There is no doubt as to the ordinances. It is held that they are not Divine in any other sense than that which is useful is Divine. That the government of the Church is prescribed and that the general features of worship are laid down—this, I say, is being largely doubted by educated thinkers outside the churches, and just as much by educated thinkers inside the churches. The rigor of belief as to the mechanical forms of worship has undergone a great change everywhere.

Among thinkers the drift is away from formulated religious truth, that is from theology, as a system which furnishes a complete account of God's dealings with the world. The systems of Augustin and Calvin covered the whole ground of possible thought on religious subjects. So with the systems of Edwards, Hopkins, Emmons, and Dwight. We have some systematic writers to-day, and it is to be hoped that they believe their own systems; but what a contrast in this point between the feeling of Christian men now and in times past. Shall we have another Dante, another Milton, another Pollock, who give the literary view of God's dealings with men? The day seems past. The growth of human knowledge has brought out material for which theology has no place and no explanation, and men's thoughts are busy with things for which no account is given in the systems of theology.

Special doctrines have undergone a great change. The nature of sin, the nature of penalty, the possibility of reform, the method of reform, the power of the will in relation to material and social circumstances—many things have come in to change these special doctrines, which were formerly received almost without question. There is wandering, drifting, and uncertainty among Christian teachers. The sermons of to day are as far from the sermons of my childhood as it is possible to conceive. The pulpit has changed. This shows that the wants of the community are not the same. The great bulk of Christian men believe in the Christian religion, but they realize that the old methods of statement have lost their power. And men say that they are losing the power of the old belief before they have got the new.

There has been a great change in the Protestant world on the subject of the Bible, and as to the meaning of inspiration—as to what it is and what it is not; whether man was the channel through which God injected his own thought; whether the inspiration ran through every word and line; whether it extended through translations; whether it belonged to the age and the Church or to the minds of all men who were in sympathy with God, or whether the penman simply expressed the average experience of all men. The question of inspiration is not narrow and settled. The extent of revelation in the Word of God is also a question—whether it was needful to reveal what men could find out by their own natural investigation and study. The scope and meaning of miracles have also been the subject of searching investigation, and dissent and variations of opinion on this matter exist. The authority of the declarations of God's Word in the presence of a just reason—whether the Bible determines what we shall think, or whether our moral sense shall be the test of Scripture—these things run deep and are widespread.

Still more profound is the change that has taken place in respect to the views of the existence and government of a Divine Being. Ten years ago, Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, said that the question of the age would not be inspiration or no inspiration, but whether there was any God to inspire. This prediction is coming to pass. Multitudes of men who are not ignorant nor malignant, but who profess to have trained their minds to regulated and scientific thought, have Atheism as the basis of their belief. That in England, France, and Germany, and to some extent in America, there is a growing number of Atheists, no man who has observed the facts will care to deny. They are not beasts nor malignants. And even more are those Atheists who compose the school called Pantheists, who say that God is but a name that included the universe, another name for nerve and brain, the sum of all facts and possibilities, and therefore without personalty, vague and exclusive. This view has especial attraction for mystical, poetical natures. Then there is a Christian Atheism on the side of those who teach that God is unknowable. They do not deny; they hope that there is a God, but he can't be found out. This is taught by some from the pulpit, and by some from the scientific forum. There is a large class who feel that they are not called to think about the subject at all. These forms of Atheism are increasing the number of their disciples, and they are not ignorant and vicious, but men of philosophic reputation and great thought; sincere men, and we may as well open our minds to it.

These are the facts: That there is a change all sects recognize. The Roman Church discerns it with the clearness of vision which it has had in every age. Protestants recognize it, and many declare that old things have passed away and that all things have become new. It is more widely diffused among the laity than men suppose. Men for various reasons listen to orthodox preaching every Sunday, and don't believe a word they hear, but they don't say anything about it. A great many lawyers, a great many physicians, a great many teachers, go to church for various reasons—some because they wish to bring their families up in that way, others because it is respectable, it is fashionable; our churches are filled with men who are at loss concerning their religious belief—who are fluctuating and changing. This is one effect of general education. The pulpit is no longer the chief instructor. A thousand magazines are carrying out knowledge every year. Science is extending its tunnels under the foundations of moral questions; the structure of man, the range of thought, social relationships, are becoming topics of scientific investigation. Our daily papers and our weekly journals are diffusing thought as they did not a hundred years ago. The pulpit is one tribunal among a score. It is complained that men have abandoned the churches and that they are thinly attended; and where they are thickly attended it is said that men are attracted by the fantasies of the preacher or his mountebank attitudes. It is taken for granted that men don't want to go to church. Lay thought, though silent, is steadily acting. I have no doubt there are people in this congregation who don't believe what I say.

The great mass of the community have so fallen off from the authority of preaching and the influence of the Church that they can maintain their laxity of belief and the fact not appear. If a spiritual photograph could be taken, say of Dr. John Hall's congregation—if you could take the belief of the hoary-headed listeners and determine what they are thinking about while listening to the preacher, the contrast would doubtless be the most extraordinary ever known. When they hear a ponderous doctrine, they shake their heads and say, "may be, may be." But "may be" is a good doubt. When you shake a man's absolute faith in a doctrine it has lost its power over him.

The whole condition of men's minds is undergoing the change I speak of. It is not narrow, local, transient.

It has all the appearance of a march, of an advance. If Christianity has brought the world to a point where the old forms are not adapted to its new life; if there are to be a larger thought and statesmanship and world-life; if there is the putting off of childish things and the putting on of manhood, then no man need be alarmed or afraid. That God is moving in his providence no one can doubt. I do not believe that theology will ever pass away. We owe a world of gratitude to the past systems. But that there is to be no new light I do not believe. Any system that is adequate must include all the facts, all the light and truth from every quarter. We are preparing the way to build larger and deeper, and with more authority and power. To maintain an old view has the whole force of religious lazinesss in it. Three-fourths of total depravity are laziness. In the Ritualistic Church they claim to have everything settled infallibly. But God meant man to be an investigating creature, fit to think with the Divine Thinker and to create with the Supreme Creator. On every man he has laid the responsibility of thinking and deciding. God's voice is being heard in his providence among us to-day. We are bound to listen and consider. There may be such a thing as Infidelity; there is such a thing as idolatry. A man may reject truth by not receiving it, and he may lose it by holding on to the body after the life has gone out of it. Railing and accusation are peculiarly untoward and unwise in such a state of feeling as exists in the community. This cannot be remedied by tightening Church forms by councils or Presbyteries, or by examining men more thoroughly. You can examine candidates for the ministry as much as you please when they are young and don't know anything, but you take them in as eggs and they hatch out eagles, and then what are you going to do with them? Above all, any attempt to resist this movement by hiding behind Church barriers is foolish. Dr. Ewer, of New York, has declared that Protestantism is a failure, and therefore he is working back toward the old Roman Church. That is about as wise as if I should declare that the whole modern science of navigation is a failure, and that I was going back to Noah's ark and get in it if I could. To take a broom to keep back the tide, or a straw to stop the course of a river, were wisdom compared with the effort to stop a movement which has in it the will of God and the force of human consciousness.

One thing is certain: no folly is equal to that of cowardice. No counselor is more detrimental to the Church than fear. To say "Do not think; do not listen," is spiritual suicide. The salvation of the times is a belief that God will never forsake the race to which he has given an impulse that causes it to run ever upward, and that he is not going to leave his Church and men who love and fear him. Hope then in God. Don't be afraid to think and investigate. Don't believe that change, which means new life in nature, means death in religion.

Christianity and Materialism.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Christianity assumes the existence of a God, infinite in presence and duration, yet he is a personal being, notwithstanding the fact that personality implies limitation in space and time. He is of the masculine gender, although without body, parts, or passions. He is an intelligent being, although intelligence—the only intelligence of which we have any knowledge—implies limited faculties, such as reason, memory, imagination, ideality, calculation, benevolence, etc., which can exist only in a being confined to locality, finite in knowledge, and subject to infirmities.

If God reasons, he must compare objects or ideas, and deduce conclusions; but conclusions arrived at by a process of ratiocination cannot have been known to him prior to such reasoning. If he possesses memory, the faculty of recalling past events, a knowledge of things present at one time is absent at another. If he has imagination, something must be invisible to him, for the ideal objects of this faculty exist in the realm of the unseen. If he has hope, his knowledge must surely be limited, and his feelings variable, for hope is made up of uncertainty and desire. If he designs, he must be finite both in knowledge and power, for to design is to calculate, to doubt, to cogitate, to decide, and then to use intermediate agencies to accomplish certain ends which are directly unattainable. If he is benevolent, he cannot be perfectly happy, for benevolence implies sympathy with the objects of its efforts, and therefore feelings in common with the party needing aid. These faculties and powers, together with others that might be named, can be conceived as existing only in a being confined to locality, limited in time, finite in knowledge, and subject to infirmities. Does God possess them? If he does, he is a finite being. If he does not, then he is a being without reason, without memory, without calculation or design, without hope, without benevolence; and a being without these mental qualities or powers is a being without intelligence.

To say there is a great intelligence in which there are none of the characteristics of the only kind of intelligence of which we know anything, is equivalent to saying there is something of the nature and the mode of existence of which we know nothing.

He is a creator, and made everything from nothing, although to create is to act, to act is to apply force, to apply force requires something to apply it to, and since, therefore, there was nothing in existence but himself, he must have applied force to, and made the universe out of himself, in which case, there was formation only, and not creation, and the question naturally arises, is he still an infinite being after having evolved from himself an illimitable universe? He is unchangeable, yet remained in a state of "masterly inactivity" during a beginningless past, and only a few thousand years ago aroused from his idleness and said, "Let there be light." What occupied his mind during the countless trillions of ages that preceded the magic fiat by which the universe appeared, when there was nothing in existence to think of save himself, "the expounders of the ways of God to man," do not attempt to inform us.

If God created a universe, he must, in creating it, have assumed a new relation, a relation to the worlds he created, and he must have had a new experience, the experience of making something out of nothing, the experience of becoming a cause and author of a universe.

But if God, at any time, assumed a new relation and acquired a new experience, he must be finite, for that to which addition can be made is necessarily finite or limited.

Can God be infinite and yet become what he previously was not? In becoming a cause and creator, did he not become what he was not before, did he not pass beyond his former limits?

If it be said God was always a cause, it must be admitted there has always been an effect; but an effect that has always existed, that had no beginning, never could have been created, produced, or caused; and considered as an effect, is an absurdity.

If God became a cause, was not the state of causal activity higher than the state of inactivity that preceded the first creative experience? If there were a change in his condition, must there not have been improvement, since he is a being who makes no mistake and does nothing in vain? If the change were no improvement, nor the contrary, must not the act of creation have been one of entire indifference? If the change were for the better, if the condition of causal activity were higher than the state of quiescence, must there not have been improvement, progress, in God? Could he have been previously infinite or perfect? If the state of activity is inferior to his previous quiescent state, does it not follow that in becoming a cause he must have lost his original perfection?

As well speak of a square circle or round triangle as of an infinite creator.

This God is not a being subject to wants or infirmities, yet, to our human reason, it is evident that when he created the world, he must have felt a want, or been conscious of a desire; the creation must have afforded gratification of this want or desire; and since the gratification of a desire in a being is an addition to the happiness of that being, and since that which admits of addition is finite and incomplete, God's happiness must surely have been imperfect before the creation, and he is not, therefore, a being free from infirmities. If the desire for a universe was not first experienced at a certain time, if it always existed, then there was, during a time without commencement, an unsatisfied want, and consequently discontent, in the mind of Deity up to the time of the creation.

This being, we are told, desires the happiness of all men, and has the power to make all men happy; thousands and hundreds of thousands of the human family are miserable, and none are entirely happy. His watchful eye observes everything, even the falling of a sparrow, and "his tender mercies are over all his works;" yet war, famine, and "the pestilence that walketh in darkness," slay every year, immense multitudes, including the gentle, the noble, and the good. Patriots and philanthropists languish and die in loathsome dungeons, martyrs expire amid the flames, the poor are robbed, vice glitters in the palace, slaves writhe under the cruel lash of their masters, and whole nations are impoverished by tyrants and priests, yet this God, whose pretended oracles pledge his aid and assistance whenever needed and asked in faith, never interposes to help poor suffering humanity. While we are told that if we have faith, like a grain of mustard seed we can move mountains, all experience teaches that mere faith to the amount of a mountain will not avail to move a grain of mustard seed.

Materialism, rejecting these notions regarding a God, recognizes the existence of the universe, the power and sufficiency of nature, and the operation of invariable and universal laws. Matter exists now. There is no evidence that there was ever a time when it did not exist. We know of no power or process by which an atom can be destroyed. To whatever changes subjected, to whatever condition reduced, the amount is not diminished. Since matter is indestructible it will never cease to exist; it will endure forever. From its indestructibility, and consequent endless existence in the future, we infer its self-existent nature, and its consequent beginningless duration in the past. If matter has always existed, it had no commencement; if it had no commencement, it was not created; if it was not created, there is, of course, no Creator of the universe outside the imagination of the religionist. A self-existent universe is more reasonable to us than a self-existent being who existed alone through a past eternity, and of a sudden, by a mere dictatorial word, brought into existence from nonentity the billions of suns, planets, and satellites that fill the immensity of space. It is difficult to think of a universe that has existed from eternity. It is still more difficult to conceive a personal, intelligent being, without any maker, who is infinitely more wonderful than nature, and who made the universe out of nothing.

Abbot on Ingersoll and the Petition.

BY THERON C. LELAND. ARTICLE II.

The Index editorial, of May 16th, which readers will do well to peruse carefully, is one of those learned essays which writers of mere culture, in light soil, so delight in building up out of the least possible idea to go upon, and then palming it off on uncritical readers for simon-pure wisdom. It is mere spider-web, spun out of an impoverished inner consciousness, with nothing but gauze and gossamer for raw materials, and so, hard run for something to say in advocacy of a bad cause.

It is just the unsubstantial product of a warped, one-sided culture, and of a brain enveloped in whims and phantasms which the fond writer nurses, and from time to time spreads before his readers as so many undoubted facts. But not one fact, not one principle of science, not one true estimate of the "state of things," or trace of the real, active, busy world in which we live, appears in the article from beginning to end. It is a cunning attempt to build up a double-and-twisted thong of words, full of sound and fury, for the purpose of putting a snapper in the end of it to crack over the head of Col. Ingersoll, to drive him into repudiation of the petition. That is the object, and all it amounts to.

The text of this homily, like the one reviewed last week, is drawn from the inspired writings of a clergyman, only this is an explanation from the theological mold of last century. It imports that Christians are good and Infidels are bad; but if one Infidel should ever happen, by any chance, to be good he would just "bust" Christianity into ten thousand flinders—and from this text, the Rev. F. E. Abbot, as he is still called in the newspapers, proceeded to preach.

We have space only for the following, which will well represent the whole:

COL. INGERSOLL AND THE PETITION.

Rev. Richard Cecil, an eminent theological writer of London in the latter half of the last century, declared that, "if one moral and upright man should deny Christianity, he would do the faith of England more harm than all the sneers of Voltaire or all the sentimentalism of Rousseau."

It is the well-founded dread of finding the moral sense of mankind arrayed against their religion that makes so many Christian clergymen unwilling to acknowledge real moral excellence in those whom they are pleased to denominate "Infidels." They are discovering with alarm that the world's faith in Christian dogmas is rapidly decaying; they are coming to perceive that the strongest bulwark of the Christian Church is the yet undecayed conviction of the majority that, in some way or other, the Church is absolutely essential to the maintenance of social order and public morality. The instinct of self-preservation makes them cling to this conviction as the sheet-anchor of salvation for instituted Christianity; and they are right. Once satisfy the public mind, always slow to move in untried directions, that society will incur no moral loss by the dissolution of the great theological and institutional system of Christianity, but will find its permanent moral interests far better subserved by rational than by ecclesiastical morality, and the one chief obstacle to the triumph of enlightened views of religion will have disappeared forever. It is dread of some vague and undefined peril to morality that shuts the minds of average men and women to all the light of the best religious thought of the country. . . .

This state of things creates special difficulties and dangers in the path of all Liberals who become in any degree publicly identified with the cause of Liberal principles and opinions. They are exposed to attacks from which no innocence can wholly shield them. They need to be not only innocent, but also bold, wise, and circumspect. They cannot afford to make grave mistakes. If they do, they are certain to be misrepresented in the worst possible manner by ecclesiastical critics, all for the "glory of God." Especially if a charge of hostility to public morality can be plausibly brought against them, they cannot escape it, no matter how grossly false and unjust it may be. The effect of such a charge is to excite the unreasoning fears of the community for the safety of its own highest interests, and to arouse its indignation against all speakers or writers who are thus implicated; nor is it much to be wondered at if, in default of sound arguments to uphold the tottering cause of orthodoxy, unscrupulous orthodox advocates eagerly resort to this far easier method of drowning truths they are unable to refute. . . .

It would be useless to multiply these illustrations of the manner in which this distinguished Freethinker, whose personal character is declared by all who know him to be singularly pure and high, has been exposed to the grossest insinuations because, in a moment of heedlessness and good nature, he permitted himself to be made use of to further a petition with the main object of which he has no sympathy whatever, and of which he seems to have been in utter ignorance at the very time when he lent to it his name.

The letter of Colonel Ingersoll to the Boston Journal shows that he was quite ignorant of what he was doing when he signed or presented that petition. He says explicitly that "no one wishes the repeal of any law for the suppression of obscene literature"; that for his own part he "wishes all such laws rigidly enforced." Nothing could be clearer than that Colonel Ingersoll carelessly and good-naturedly allowed himself to be made use of by persons whose real objects he did not understand, and who have involved him in difficulties from which it will be very hard to extricate himself. The reader has already seen what slanderous insinuations have been uttered against him on this account, and will also see, from the letter above quoted, what gross injustice they do him. Col. Ingersoll does not even go so far as we have gone in the matter; he only demands freedom for publications that "contain nothing that can be called obscene or impure," whereas we have demanded equal freedom for orthodox and heterodox publications, if they contain only such incidental impurities as the Bible itself contains. Let it be distinctly and universally understood that Colonel Ingersoll was ignorant of the real character of the petition he signed—that he is avowedly and publicly opposed to the main object it seeks—and that it is a gross libel on his good name to quote him as intentionally in favor of the repeal of the law of 1873. He is as strongly in favor of the enforcement of that law as the editors of the Christian Union, the Indianapolis News, and the Boston Journal, provided only the law is not perverted to become an instrument for the suppression or restriction of religious liberty. To prevent this perversion, however, the law ought to be radically modified. This is the ground we have taken from the beginning; and all sober-minded Liberals will sooner or later take it too, for the simple reason that the priceless principles of a free press and free mails neither require nor permit any other ground.

The pervading tone of this article is that Christians do not expect Infidels to be moral, for 'tis not their nature to. From the very fact that they are Infidels they must be immoral; and whatever an Infidel does, no matter how correct his life, he cannot be moral—and the syllogistic conclusion is, it behooves all leading Liberals, all you seventy thousand who signed that petition, and especially you, Col. Ingersoll, to be scrupuously moral; and if you can't be moral, be as moral as you can. "Though thou be chaste as ice," Christian morality is of that sublimated, high-potential, and unattainable character that, try thine utmost, "thou canst not 'scape calumnious strokes"—therefore scrupulously observe all the Christian moralities. If that isn't a hybrid of Liberal logic, crossed upon Christian dogma, with a depraving strain of untaught heathen thrown in, then no faith can be reposed in genealogy any more.

After the thorough dissection, last week, of the frantic demand on all Liberals to retreat, and go back on the petition there is less need to go into an exhaustive analysis of the diatribe now under examination. The same general tone of surrender and apology runs through it all, and many of last week's comments will apply to this. Nevertheless there are a few points which should have attention.

One would suppose that a Liberal writer, who can perceive and concede that "the world's faith in Christian dogmas is rapidly decaying," would go on his way rejoicing, redouble his blows upon the waning faith, and let the dogmas go on decaying; and, if the Christian Church can get any comfort out of her "yet undecayed convictions," why, poor creature, let her enjoy them a little longer, or while it is yet night. The dogmas and convictions are rapidly decaying because the Spirit of the Age is shedding its disintegrating sunlight upon them, and because Liberals and Freethinkers have, for the last several centuries, been steadily pouring in hot shot. Liberals do not specially need to change their tactics now, in the full tide of their success. All they have to do is all the more freely and independently to vindicate their own views of inherent right and absolute wrong, judge of their own morals, and live their own lives, justified and encouraged by their success in the past; and still press on in the same line of strategy which has borne them so resistlessly forward from conquering and to conquer. Isn't it the most craven of counsels, then, in a quasi-Liberal editor of a semi-Liberal journal, just as a great Christian system is about petering out, when the Protestant faction of it is vehemently discussing among themselves whether it isn't a failure, and when the writer himself would have us believe he repudiates, and has thrown off, the religious side of that system—to ask other and more advanced Liberals to be specially careful to conform to the moral exactions of that same decaying faith? It almost makes one suspect that the hand that has forgot so much cunning conceals beneath his stern, ascetic toga the stumpy remains of a once elegant fox-brush, since he is so urgent that we step up to the Christian captains office to be docked.

"This state of things," the fearful and tearful writer boohoos, "creates special difficulties and dangers in the path of all Liberals," etc. Here crops up the timid spirit of the man again. Difficulties and dangers! He has the keenest, alertest eye for difficulties and dangers and the safety of his precious conservative neck. "But for these vile guns he would himself have been a soldier." Not for him,

> "When a path is dangerous known,
> The danger's self is lure alone."

Whenever he sees a danger he bolts for the rear, and begs "all Liberals who become in any way publicly identified with the cause of Liberal principles and opinions" to follow him in his disgraceful retreat.

> "The timid it concerns to ask their way,
> And fear what foe in caves and swamps can stray;
> To make no step until the event is known,
> And ills to come as evils past bemoan.
> Not so the wise; no coward watch he keeps
> To spy what danger on his pathway creeps;
> Go where he will, the wise man is at home.
> His hearth the earth, his hall the azure dome;
> Where his clear spirit leads him, there's his road.
> By God's own light illumined and foreshowed."

By that wise counsel of the Sage of Concord we propose to guide our feet, and dismiss the Boston adviser to that limbo where all good cowards go.

But, my dear peer and personification of Falstaff, you deceive yourself. What Liberal peccadillo is it that makes you "fear each bush an officer"? what "quickened conscience" puts you in such a tremble? There positively are no dangers. We deny your asseverations of difficulty and danger. "This state of things," even as you draw and color the situation, absolutely does not "create special difficulties and dangers in the path of Liberals." On the contrary, it removes difficulties and dangers, and renders the path of Liberals more safe, easy, and pleasant from year to year, as the future opens. "The well-founded dread of finding the moral sense of mankind arrayed against their religion" increases year by year, and is even now becoming a certainty, and this dread becoming realized is de-moralizing, not only many Christian clergymen, but still more the laymen, who have no motive of salary and a living to attach them to a failing cause; then weakness, trepidation, and defeat follow demoralization. We are the conquering party. Every day witnesses the capture of a new outpost, the abandonment of one and another position grown untenable. So, dear General, Commander of the League, permit a common soldier in your ranks to receive you, fainting, in his arms, fan your fevered brow and fluttering bosom, calm your agitated nerves, and assure you there is no danger in an advancing army pursuing one in retreat. If we are "exposed to attacks from which no innocence can wholly shield us," what is the use of being innocent? Don't let's try to come the innocent dodge on them for a shield. Let's strike out from the shoulder and deliver right between the eyes the "sockdolager" of "You're another," you infernals! with your Averys, Onderdonks, Kallocks, Hustons, Glendennings, Gilmans, Chaces, Hathaways, Christian statesmen, and a long line of Christian violators of their own moral commandments; and then let's oppose to their examples our own magnificent and unterrified manhood and womanhood, born into a universe of life and intellect and sensation, with permission to live our lives, use our intellects, delight our senses, and, on the whole, enjoy all things whatsoever, under no limitations except those prescribed by positive science, natural law, and the rights of others.

"Liberals cannot afford to make grave mistakes." Why not? Everybody makes mistakes. There are none good—no, not one; and we had better not set up to be any "goodder" than the "state of things" will permit, and claim that we never make mistakes. The Christian party, who claim to be so stainlessly immaculate, according to a false and whimsical standard—they are the fellows who can't afford to make grave mistakes; and yet they are the party that is all the time making them. There isn't a day nor an hour but some prominent personage among them is on trial, or put upon his defense, for some grave mistake; and that is why the whole faction of them split off by Luther are now on the keen run for some safe refuge from their "Protestant failure." We can point you out ten defaulters, adulterers, and makers of grave mistakes in their ranks, to one Ingersoll conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity to that depraved extent that he signed a petition for impartial freedom of the mails.

Now comes more of the timid man's mortal terror: "If we do make grave mistakes, we are certain to be misrepresented by ecclesiastical critics." An ecclesiastical misrepresentation doubles him right up—just as if it was anything new under the sun!—and out he whisks his ecclesiastical chart and Christian moral compass, and shouts to the captains of the Liberal fleet to steer their craft by them, else we will collide with a misrepresentation. We will see him back in the ecclesiastical bosom first! We will run our end of the Liberal schooner according to the most modern, best known, and most scientific laws of navigation; he may have the ecclesiastical kind all to himself, crouched down on his attenuated end.

He continues: "Especially if a charge of hostility to public morality can plausibly be brought," etc. Here it is "public morality"—that is, Christian morality; not a word now about the Eighth Demandment, "that all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty." That is a most noble demand, and we 70,000 accept it gladly. It seems to us, however, dear editor, that somehow you ought to make your paper "consist." We beg of you, as did the boy of his religiously amphibious father, "to either stop praying or swearing, and we don't care which."

Now come several quotations from the Comstock organs which make up the terminal string of this lash prepared for Col. Ingersoll—among them the utterance of the good pastor of East Weymouth, which he is so much in love with that he publishes it twice. As I am in controversy now with a so-called Liberal editor, and not with the avowed Comstock organs, I have no call either to quote or comment on them. Mr. Abbot's comments on the articles which he quotes are pervaded with but one idea. That is expressed twice in nearly the same words; first, "In a moment of heedlessness and good nature he permitted himself to be made use of;" and, second, "Col. Ingersoll carelessly and good-naturedly allowed himself to be made use of." To this there can be but one fitting reply, and that is, It cannot atone for the aspersion on so spirited a gentleman as Col. Ingersoll is, to ostentatiously exonerate him from being a knave and then pity him as a fool. All who ever dealt with him know him to be one of the most honorable of men; and all who ever heard him speak, or have read his writings, know him to be one of the brightest intellects of the age; and the Rev. F. E. Abbot, by his effort to reduce him to the category of dupe, only spikes himself on the unenviable altitude of his own steeple as a calumniator.

THE PSYCHO PHYSIOLOGICAL SCIENCES AND THEIR ASSAILANTS; being a response by Alfred R. Wallace of England. Prof. J. R. Buchanan of New York, Darius Lyman of Washington, Epes Sargent of Boston, to the attacks of Prof. W. B. Carpenter of England, and others. Colby & Rich, Boston. This work of 216 pages consists of essays by the persons named, and is a work of rare ability, and contains the ablest arguments that have yet been issued giving the Spiritualistic theory of the sciences indicated. The price is probably 50 cents, in paper, and 75 cents, in cloth.

THE GREAT STRIKE: Its Relations to Labor, Property, and Government; suggested by the memorable events which originated in the tyrannous extortion of railway masters, and the execution of eleven labor reformers, called "Molly Maguires," June 21, 1877, and culminated in burning the corporation property in Pittsburgh, July 22d following. This essay carefully defines the relative claims of work and wealth involved in the irrepressible conflict between capital and labor, which engages increasingly the attention of thoughtful people the world over. By E. H. Heywood, author of "Cupid's Yokes," "Hard Cash," "Yours or Mine," and several other pamphlets. Price 15 cents.

B. F. UNDERWOOD lectures at Jacksonville, Ill., June 7th 8th, and 9th.

Editorial Notes.

W. S. Bell will lecture in Indianapolis, Ind., June 11th; Tonica, Ill., June 13th; Minonk, Ill., June 15th; Paxton, Ill., June 16th.

"The Darwins" was omitted this week on account of the copy not reaching us in time. There will probably be no further interruption in that interesting story.

W. F. Jamieson organized a Liberal League at Kirksville, Mo., with twenty-six members, during his debate there with Rev. Jacob Ditzler, of Kentucky., and one at Moberly, Mo., Sunday June 2d. He speaks at Gardner, Kansar, grove meeting, Sunday, June 9th; at Ottawa, Kansas, June 16th. Address Box 1250, Kansas City, Mo. Will attend grove-meetings in Kansas and Missouri, June, July and August.

Attention is called to the advertisement of the "Champions of the Church" which will be out about the 20th inst. It will be the largest and finest work we have yet issued. We hope to receive a large number more of orders for it. We wish every reader of The Truth Seeker would order a copy of it. It will be richly worth the moderate price we ask for it—in cloth, $3; leather, red edges, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50, postage included. Generous orders assist us in the prosecution of the work we are engaged in.

Choice of Pursuits or What to do and Why.—This valuable work of 500 pages by Nelson Sizer should have received, as it deserves, an earlier notice. Every page is full of instruction and subjects for thought and reflection, calculated to lead to wise and considerate action. It seems to be almost necessary as a guide to parents and teachers who have in charge the direction of the minds, faculties, and the training of the habits of the young, and no young person capable of reasoning and choosing for himself should be without it. Published by S. R. Wells & Co., 737 Broadway, New York.

"Facts for the People."—We have received from the publishers of The Spiritual Offering, Springfield, Mo., a package of tracts, No. 3, of their series "On Money," by J. S. Loveland. It treats of the Origin of Money; Primitive Money Essentially Valuable; Its Failure; Usury; Human Progress Necessitates Commerce; Human Happiness depends upon Money; Abundant Money is Necessary to Secure Social Order; How can we Obtain an Abundance of Money. We can furnish the tracts to callers. Price, five cents, by mail. In this connection we would call attention to the fine appearance of The Spiritual Offering, a forty-eight-page monthly magazine, devoted to the interests of humanity, from a Spiritualistic and scientific standpoint. It boasts a corps of superior contributors, and in every way is a first-class Spiritual magazine. $1.25 per annum, or 75 cents for six months. Springfield, Mo.

The Waterloo Meeting.

Mr. Charles Ellis called upon us upon his return from the meeting of The Friends of Progress at Waterloo, N. Y., on Saturday and Sunday last. Over two thousand persons were present and the meeting was a very pleasant one. The subjects discussed were "The Relation of Science to Religion," "Capital and Labor," The Currency Question," "The Rights of Woman," and "The Liberal League movement." The speakers were Prof. Oliver, of Cornell University, Prof. C. D. B. Mills, Mrs. Joslyn Gage, Mrs. Clara Neyman, Mrs. Somerby, T. C. Leland, W. S. Bell, H. L. Green, and Chas. Ellis.

Mr. Ellis informs us that he will spend the summer in the East, and proposes to put in a portion of his time in the lecture field. He wishes to spend his time mostly in northern New York during July and August. Those of our Liberal friends in that section of the country, who wish during those months to avail themselves of the services of a good Liberal speaker, will do well to correspond with Mr. Ellis upon the subject. He may be addressed at No. 8, Portland St, Boston, Mass.

Voltaire's Centennial.

It is a cause of congratulation with all friends of mental liberty that the Centennial observance of Voltaire's death, in Paris a few days ago, was observed with so much respect for the memory of the talented author and philosopher. It was all that could be desired.

The following cable dispatch from Paris will give some idea of the Voltaire festival at the French capital.

Paris, May 31.—"The Voltaire celebration, which was organized by the men of letters and took place at the Gaieté Theatre yesterday, was attended by about two thousand persons. The admission was by tickets, for which from fifty centimes to eight francs were charged, according to location, the receipts being devoted to the poor of Paris. The proceedings were quiet and orderly, and marked by no special scenes of excitement.

"A celebration was held at the same hour by the Free-thinkers at the American Circus on the Place Chateau d'Eau. The admissions were by ticket, but without charge. The audience numbered about six thousand. Several speeches were made, wholly devoted to proving Voltaire's enmity to all religion. The audience was very enthusiastic. After the speeches, a statue of Voltaire was crowned with flowers. Deputations representing Paris and the provinces with banners, marched around it, while bands played and the audience sang the 'Marseillaise.' It was the original intention of the movers of the meeting to erect the statue publicly in the Place Chateau d'Eau, but the government forbade it. The government also prohibited a public ceremony by the Clericals in honor of Joan of Arc.

"While the two Voltaire celebrations were in progress the Cathedral of Notre Dame was filled by an immense congregation, consisting principally of women, to take part in the expiatory services ordered by the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris. The interior of the church was darkened, expiatory tapers burned before all the altars, while from the pulpit a discourse was delivered in which the preacher denounced Voltaire and glorified Joan of Arc."

It is also cheering to see the greatly improved sentiments towards this great man which is visible in our own country. Several of our dailies contained editorials of considerable length referring to Voltaire's Centennial, and made complimentary remarks in reference to the scholar and thinker. We saw nothing that was harsh or unjust, but each seemed actuated by the desire to do the Sage of Ferney simple justice. It certainly is an improved state of things if justice can be done such a noted Infidel, even when he has been in his grave one hundred years.

Comstock in Boston.

Comstock did not achieve a great victory in his meeting in Boston on the 30th ult. He went on there with the Rev. Mr. Frederick Courtney, of St. Thomas' church, for the purpose of organizing an auxiliary Society for the Suppression of Vice for the purpose of raising more funds to run his present concern in this city, and more especially to pay his salary of $4.000 per year, which he is understood to be anxious to have in his pocketbook or to add to his bank account.

Mr. Comstock made the principal speech, and narrated his usual exaggerated stories about the tons of obscene matter that is sent out to little school girls to pollute them and initiate them in habits of vice. He told about his usual amount of falsehoods, and he singled out Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker, editor of The Radical Review, who was present, and denounced him as an enemy who was following him, etc. The assembly at once sung out, "Where is he!" "Show him up!" "Put him out!" "He has no right here!" with other exclamations of a similar character. Upon Comstock's promptly pointing out Mr. Tucker, the latter arose and calmly denounced Comstock as a liar. This created not a little excitement, but Comstock continued his remarks.

While he was speaking the Rev. Jesse H. Jones, Congregational clergyman, arose and expressed a wish to ask Mr. Comstock a few questions. Some objections were raised and some shouted out, "Sit down!" "Put him out!" "Let him ask his questions," etc. Mr. Jones said he was a clergyman; that he had entered by ticket, and that he had as much right there as any other individual. He then propounded three questions to Mr. Comstock as follows: 1. "Did you ever use decoy letters or false signatures?" 2. "Did you ever sign a woman's name when writing a letter?" 3. "Did you ever try to make a person sell you forbidden wares, and then, when you had succeeded, use the evidence thus obtained to convict him?" To each of these interrogatories Mr. Comstock was compelled in truth to answer in the affirmative, whereupon the Rev. Mr. Jones remarked that Mr. Comstock had done what would be considered disgraceful in a Boston policeman. The Rev. Mr. Courtney of this city apologized for Mr. Comstock and owned him as a friend. He sustained Comstock's system of decoy and hypocrisy as all have to do who defend him. The Christian Church is indeed reduced to a pitiable expedient when it has to resort to such dishonorable measures to persecute and annoy.

The Philedelphia Record in commenting on the occurence thus sensibly remarks:

"Mr. Comstock has been trying to trap unwary sinners by forging letters and buying forbidden wares. It strikes us as bad policy to use as instruments for reforming offenders men who are meaner than the offenders themselves. People judge a cause by the character of its advocates, and principles by their exponents; and the cause of morality must suffer seriously when such men as Comstock publicly espouse it and become known as its ministers. He is meaner by a few degrees than the agents of our Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and this is saying much against Comstock, but we have his own confession in proof of our assertion. He is a self-convicted sneak and hypocrite, without moral honor, and must naturally do the cause of morality far more harm than good."

Mr. Tucker is to be heartily commended for the independence and fearlessness he exhibited when attacked in a Christian congregation. He called Comstock a liar, and was prepared to prove it. We fancy some difference can be discerned between Mr. Tucker and a certain very cultured gentleman who would not dare to say a word derogatory to the very reputable Anthony Comstock. See Mr. Tucker's letter to The Boston Journal, in another column.

Two Grievous Wrongs.

The English courts have recently been guilty of two acts which have cast a thick cloud of opprobrium upon them that time can scarcely remove. The first is the conviction, sentence, and imprisonment of Edward Truelove, an old man, of London, nearly eighty-five years of age, for selling Robert Dale Owen's "Moral Physiology," a work of decided merit, and Mrs. Besant's pamphlet entitled "The Law of Population, its Consequences, and its Bearing upon Human Conduct and Morals." He is a worthy old man, and there is nothing in either work the selling of which should be censured in the slightest degree. It is a shame to Christian enlightenment that in the closing quarter of the nineteenth century, and in a nation of the highest civilization and wealth, such cruel injustice should be enacted in the name of religion and morality. London also has a Society for the Suppression of Vice, upon which our Comstock society here is modeled, and it is that society that has cast the aged man behind prison bars, and prohibited his aged wife, also, from entering his cell, and simply because he sold a little book touching the law of reproduction, which it would be well for every person to peruse. If this is an illustration of the beneficient effects of the religion of Jesus, the inhabitants of the world will have reason to be rejoiced when its rule shall have entirely passed away. The sentence was four months' imprisonment and a fine of £50, or $250.

The second wrong is the legal decision that Mrs. Annie Besant shall be deprived of the guardianship of her sickly little girl, eight years of age, because the mother—though a woman of the highest intelligence and worth—cannot believe in the Jewish and Christian God, in other words, because she is an Atheist.

It would seem that at this age of the world intelligence and Christian toleration should have advanced far enough so that a worthy, accomplished mother should not be deprived of the natural custody of her own child because her faith does not conform to the standard the State sets up, or because she is faithful to her honest convictions. It is one of the greatest outrages of modern times, and, in consideration of the period in which we live, it is a greater iniquity than the Church perpetrated three hundred years ago, when intolerance and bigotry ruled with a heavy hand. It is enough to raise a doubt whether, after all, though intelligence and civilization are spreading over the earth, the spirit of charity and mental freedom is really gaining in the world. It is an appalling instance of what the Church is still disposed to do to crush the spirit of freedom of thought which is inherent in the sons and daughters of humanity. If the London Society for the Suppression of Vice cannot be directly thanked also for this exhibition of criminal cruelty and tyranny, it is another blot on the escutcheon of Christianity that time can with difficulty efface.

Slanders Refuted.

The last number of Payne's Age of Reason issued, dated May 4th, contained some twenty-five gross slanders respecting ourselves, so vile in character that we deemed it due to ourselves that the edition be suppressed, and we took the necessary steps to effect it. But previous to this some two or three hundred copies had been obtained from the printer and were sent out. Several friends have asked us as to the truth of some of the charges, especially in reference to the following, which Peterson has also published in his Common Sense.

"As an example of the liberality and humanity of good brother Bennett, we will cite but one instance here. About a year ago he solicited a poor woman to read proof for him. The lady being in reduced circumstances and not knowing the good man except by way of those distant admirers, who knew him not, accepted the situation. She worked in this capacity nearly every day for three months, and to this hour has not received a farthing for her labor."

There are some half a dozen falsehoods in this one short paragraph and scarcely a single truth; whatever our faults may be, we can say this in truth; we have never failed to pay every person who has worked for us in any capacity, and always promptly. In the last conversation we had with Mr. Payne we asked him what woman we had employed and refused to pay. He replied that it was his wife. The facts are simply these. We never solicited her to read proof nor employed her to do so for an hour. Let the following statement from Mr. S. H. Preston explain the truth.

"I was engaged in The Truth Seeker office throughout the year 1877. Mrs. Payne was in the habit of calling in the office nearly every day, to borrow books and papers which she was free to take. One day when she thus called we were engaged at reading page proofs of The Truth Seeker. She asked to read some of the pages, saying she had nothing to do and would rather read them than not. Mr. Bennett let her take the pages to read the same as he would a book, magazine, or other paper. Her reading the pages was of no earthly use to us, for it made not a minute's difference in our labor upon them. We read them all over just the same as though she had not read them at all, and if her reading had been of any value I am sure the books Mr. Bennett gave her, together with the files of papers he loaned her were ample payment, for all, the proof reading she did would make but very few hours. She was not employed by Mr. Bennett to read at all and we had not the slightest idea that she expected pay. And had she charged in full for all the time she devoted it could not have amounted to more than a dollar. S. H. Preston."

That settles that detestable falsehood, but here is another of a smaller calibre, which perhaps should be exposed. After Payne ceased to issue his libelous sheet called the Age of Reason he wrote a letter to Dr. Monroe of the Seymour (Ind.) Times, in which he uttered several falsehoods, and among others, this: "It can be said of Mr. Bennett that he shed tears and admitted he had been somewhat oppressive to his rival brother in the work of reform and Free-thought." The man's great predilection for lying is shown in this short quotation. Nothing of the kind occurred. We had but one conversation with the man for the last four months, and that was on the morning we suppressed his last issue. We neither admitted that we had been too oppressive upon him, nor did we shed tears. "The boot was entirely on the other foot." It was Mr. Payne who shed tears and it was Mr. Payne who acknowledged that he had wronged us. The conversation took place in the presence of Messrs. Henderson and Brown, and let them say who shed tears:

"We were present during the conversation between D. M. Bennett and S. W. Payne; in fact it took place in our office, where the gentlemen casually met. The remarks of Bennett were temperate and mild, but in the spirit of one who felt that he had been injured. Bennett assuredly shed no tears. Payne gradually yielded his ground, and finally broke down and shed tears freely. He acknowledged he had wronged Bennett and begged pardon for the same. We could not help feeling that the charges which Bennett had made against Payne were true, for Payne admitted them, and he exhibited the appearance of a contrite penitent.

"G. L. Henderson,
"Hugh Byron Brown."

Here are the facts, and we will be glad if we never again have the necessity to write or speak the name of Seth Wilbur Payne, or to refer to the numerous foolish but malicious lies he uttered.

The Radical Pulpit.

Second Anniversary.—Concluded.

ANNIVERSARY LECTURE BY PROF. FELIX ADLER BEFORE THE SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, MAY 12, 1878.

It has been said that Liberal organizations cohere by force of personal influence, and that unless there be personal influence they quickly separate into atoms and fall asunder. It is true, I confess, that it is unavoidable in the beginning of every movement. So it was with the Hebrews. The great leaders by their personal influence drew around them a following, and so it was in the earlier days of Christianity. The masters drew around them Christian communities by force of their personal influence. But the aim of the leader of Liberal movements, believe me, is not personal aggrandizement but the highest and greatest aim of all his life is to make himself unnecessary, to found such institutions and usages as shall live their own life long after he is gone. Then will it be easy for him to sink into Lethe's stream; then will it be easy to forget and be forgotten, if we leave behind us that which is unforgetable—a purer light beaming from the sun of righteousness, a fairer harmony rising above the world's discords. And so we can but call out for help in this work; we can but cry out, hoping that the slumbering echoes may awake in some young soul. Nay, we can do more. We can sit down patiently and build up young minds for the work. We can go into our schools and mold young souls and fit them to be leaders hereafter in this movement for freedom in religion—leaders who shall not hanker after wealth, who shall not hunt for fame, but who shall enter this glorious fight for truth because it has its own compensation, its own unspeakable reward.

In the first year of the society's existence we paved the way for this work. We fully defined our position as brought against demagogue religions. We sketched in general the outlines of the new ideal, and in the past year we have taken up the specific problem of larger morality under the name of the social question; the problem of the training of the young, under the heading of our ethical school. Let us fix once more our attention upon the leading thoughts presented to us during the winter's work and meetings.

The sermon of humanity—what is it unless it becomes practical? That was the exclamation with which we started upon our course. Long enough have we spoken of brotherly love in the abstract; let us see what brotherly love signifies in the concrete. There are great needs to be supplied; there are great grievances that plead and supplicate for redress. Let us at least give them audience. The subject of social grievances is a dangerous point to touch. Already the tocsin of alarm has been sounded; already in hostile camps gather the opposing classes of society; already the ominous mutterings and moanings that predict the coming of the storm are heard. In such times the prudent seek shelter. But we believe that society demands, above all things, honesty and frankness in the speaking of convictions. We believe that we should render those a service who did not agree with us by boldly speaking our convictions, in giving them a deeper and clearer insight into their own by comparing them with those delivered from this platform.

The great duty of religion, it seems to me, is to be a peacemaker—peacemaking by helping. And though we flatter ourselves that we can cure, why resort to quack-medicines that deceive the patient? The remedial work of religion must be numbered in ages, in centuries; it cannot be accomplished in a day, but it is none the less valuable on that account. We would not deceive ourselves as to the nature of the evil or as to the sufferings of the patient. We would utter what truth and justice demand whether it can be realized or not. So we began by seeking to tear aside a few fancies that cloud the issue.

It was said that the land is bounteous and all have enough. We answered: The land is bounteous, but all have not enough. It was said that labor is a commodity, to be bought and sold like any other, and sentiment must not be allowed to interfere in matters of business; that the price of a coat was regulated by the number of coats in the market and by the demand for them; and so the price of labor must be regulated by the number of laborers in the market and by the desire to employ them. We answered indignantly that there is no department of life in which moral sentiment has not the right to be heard. We pointed out this difference: that the coat when it sinks in value is not affected thereby, but when the laborer, on the labor of whose hands depends his living and that of his wife and children—when he sinks in value he is affected thereby. Labor is not a mere commodity, because labor feels hunger and thirst, winces under pain, and writhes under ignominy. It was said that there is only one law for all, and that the lowest can rise to the highest stations by industry, frugality, and perseverance. We answered that only seldom does one so rise; you see a few brilliant examples of success that dazzle the eyes, but you do not see the myriad failures of which no record is preserved. You see one cabin-boy who rises to lordly wealth and honor, one Swiss weaver who rises to a commanding position in the moral world, but you do not see the thousands of others who, with the same talents and moral qualities, but lacking the same fortunate combination of circumstances, remain cabin-boys and weavers through all their weary lives.

They said, It is idle to seek the improvement of the lower classes; for the more you give him the more riotous and reckless your workingman becomes. We replied that every savings institution in the land refutes this wholesale charge. We replied that the moral shiftlessness, when it occurs, is the result of the inconstancy of employment; that the bane of the laborer's life, far more demoralizing than low wages, is the uncertainty of living from hand to mouth; it is the not knowing whether there will be any bread to-morrow or not that is so fatal. We pointed out that extreme poverty must be wasteful as naturally as wealth is wasteful.

Now, what is it we demand for the laborer? Is it something wild, unheard of, and impossible? No; we do not wish to raise them above being laborers, but to raise them in their capacity as laborers. Three things we demand; intellectual freedom, industrial freedom, and moral freedom. Intellectual freedom; that is, equality; and that means not simply the species of equality that is accorded to the highest class in professional life, but only the same principle of thoroughness, the same special culture, that is accorded to the highest class of professional life. The professional man has his specialty, and is trained for it; so the workingman who is to live by tools should be taught the theory of tools, the principles of machinery, in order to do his work intelligently. We demand more skill in labor; for more skill in labor will enhance the value of the product as well as increase the dignity of the producer.

What we demand is increased facilities for the education of the workingman in connection with our common schools, or at least an advanced system of mechanical instruction in connection with our evening schools. This is the beginning of the road to intellectual freedom.

There are three forms of labor organizations; the monarchical, the republican, and the constitutional. The monarchical is that which prevails at present, in which a single person is sovereign, virtually controlling the enterprise. The republican form is that in which the laborer would become the capitalist; in which they would regulate and conduct the enterprises by a system of delegates and a chief executive, each sharing in the government and each being rewarded according to his ability and the value of his service. We agree that in order to make successful co-operation possible a long previous training is indispensable. The whole problem of the advancement of the working classes, therefore, resolves itself into an educational problem. And we also hold that between the lower and the higher forms of labor organizations an intermediate form is possible, which may be called a constitutionalism, in which the power is still retained in a single sovereign, as it were, but where the laborer would have a voice in the general control by a system of laws. Under this system of mutual control the jealousy and hate too often existing between the laborer and capitalist would be forever removed, the demagogue agitators would disappear, and peace and prosperity dawn upon the industrial world once more. We earnestly express the hope that the examples in the direction of constitutional industry in this and other systems will speedily follow upon the return of better times, and will be widely and successfully copied.

But, more than this, we ask moral freedom. Friends, we live in this great city of New York, and few of us know how vice blights the lives of the men and women who plod on their dreary lives around us. I think not only of the hundreds, nay, thousands, of babes who will doubtless perish this summer, as they do every summer, because they are blasted by foul air and because their life has been supplied by poor nourishment, or lack of nourishment, but I think now of the moral life that is constantly perishing around us; of the honor that is stabbed and the virtue that is slain. We see around us daily how the filthy hovels to which the poor are condemned break self-respect in the hearts of the poor; how the sacred limits of restraint are overridden by the promiscuous huddling of families in the close quarters of narrow rookeries. We see how when once a single vice springs up in these pestilential quarters, it quickly spreads, like the plague, and even the most innocent are not to be protected against the contagion. We place ourselves in the position of some honest workingman compelled to seek refuge with his children in one of these dens, and we echo the cry of despair that breaks from that man's lips; and we cry that he has a right to virtue, at least, if not to happiness. Sacred should we hold this right to virtue, for that it is which lends grandeur to the workingman's cause. It is not bread they ask for the sake of the bread, but because bread means also a state of higher life; because bread means also clean homes and dignity. They want to be clean inwardly; they want to be mutually free; and they ask our help, and we should lend it. We should strive with all our souls to take away what taint of materialism still clings to this movement, and turn it in the honorable direction of a movement for a new morality in the social world.

So did we preach the lessons of unselfishness in connection with the demand for a greater morality, and earnestly, also, did we address ourselves to our second task—that of educating children so that they should be able to practice those exalted virtues. We believed it proper to teach the children the history of the great religious systems, and to inform them concerning dogmas, first, because there is no means so great to break the influence of dogmas as the study of dogmas; and, secondly, because dogmas, though they do not solve the problem of philosophy, still keep in mind that there is a problem, keeping alive the consciousness of the mysteries of the universe by which we are girt around.

And not only did we teach the children the practical duties of the present and the future, the duties they owe to themselves—cheerful labor, endurance under trial, truthfulness—but the duties they owe to others: reverence toward superiors, respect toward equals, and toward those who are younger and weaker the most tender love. We would make these children better men and grander women, and a stay and support for the ethical school that is to be. We would see them lead the procession of their lives high and erect, with the light of a hero's soul beaming from their eyes.

Other topics, also, we touched upon—the atonement, the May festival, and woman's mission. We sought to show how woman's soul shall lead us upward and onward; how she shall refine the grosser masculine nature; how we through her, and she through us, shall grow until the man be more of a woman and she of a man; we gain in sweetness and moral height, she in mental strength.

We stand at the terminus of our second year, and now, as we look backward, we have reason to feel encouraged. In a time when great financial distress lay heavy as a burden upon the community, this society has constantly increased in prosperity, and we have won new friends for our cause—warm, faithful friends. We have shown that words do not suffice us, but that we give practical form to what we advocate. We have laid the foundations of our ethical school, which gives splendid promise for the future. By your generosity we have been able to support during the winter a prosperous kindergarten school, where over seventy children daily gather and daily receive instruction. We have seventy little mental plants taken out of the darkness and planted into the light in this children's garden; seventy merry faces which it is a delight and constant reward to behold.

We have lifted our eyes to more ambitious projects, such as the advancement of the working class, who, in all lawful and legitimate efforts for their emancipation, have our hearty sympathy and co-operation. We have received every encouragement. The attacks from without have not ceased, and there is ground for the belief that they will increase in viciousness as we advance. These attacks have not ceased, and they are sometimes hard to bear; but have not the poisoned shafts recoiled upon the marksmen? Thus, in the new cities of the West unexpected allies have appeared for our co-operation. Through them it has been made known that this society has weathered the first storms of its existence; that it has passed triumphantly through its ordeals. The new lands rise to the new thought with new helpers. If only we can do the missionary work of enlightenment, they will garner in the rich harvests that are waiting. The attacks from without have aided us without, and they have only tended to draw more firmly the bond of union within. We feel now more than ever before that we belong together; that we are embarked in a common enterprise of liberty for man on the shores of the great To Be.

To-day I recount our gains as a society. It is the anniversary day, and we must not forget to remember our losses also. The May month has come to crown the hills and valleys and send sweet fragrance into the abodes of the living. The gentle May plants flowers also on the graves, and decks with green garlands the still city where slumber our dead. In the circle of those who have been closely identified with this society as its members, two have been taken away from us by the hand of death, and, in obedience to the usages of society and the dictates of our own feelings, I will briefly recall their honorable names. One was a youth of extraordinary abilities and no mean acquirements. He was an intense, ardent friend of the Liberal movement, and understood the scope and the bearings of our work as few have done beside him. He was a graduate of one of the first universities of the land, and a graduate of high distinction. It was a privilege and a pleasure to instruct him. He was of an inquiring mind, and probed all things to the core. He was gifted with a splendid insight, both of intellect and heart; a man of downright conscientiousness was he. Suddenly he was stricken down by one of those terrible maladies that crush the patient slowly, with much cruel suffering. For over five weeks he battled against death; for five weeks he was stretched upon his bed of pain; but even under these trying circumstances his mind did not lose its clearness. He never failed to care more for others than for himself. To him the ethical idea was, indeed, a staff and a support, as he walked with open eyes into the dismal valley of shades. The night before the end came his mind was still intent on the great problems of existence, and the burden of his last ideas was a demand for light on the problems of duty. The name of Alfred Eidlizt is a dear one to mention. We have lost in him more than it is in my power to express.

The other was young also, but not, like him, gifted with extraordinary powers of mind. A sweet lady was she, full of tender talents, lovable and beloved; a gracious type of winning womanhood. In September, 1877, we crowned her with her bridal wreath. Four months had scarce elapsed when we were called to lay a different wreath upon her bier. The friends of Hattie Kauffmann have not forgotten her; her name will be remembered.

The dead sleep well. We send them silent greetings unto their still, spirit abodes, and whisper messages of unforgetable love to them in our hearts. But the remembrance of the dead shall not depress us; it shall lift our souls, and exalt and ennoble us. Yet a little, and we also shall pass away from the fading scene. Let us, then, truly live; let us live for the great and the good and the true. The lessons of death are life; and out of decay there springs forth rejuvenescence, and out of the old rises the new; out of the wrong and above the wrong will ever rise the right. To the right, then, which is our life, let us be dedicated; to greater justice, which is the nerve of our being, let us be consecrated. Let us vow, in this solemn hour, that promise of remembrance; vow it now, my brothers and my sisters, in the holy cause of freedom. So shall we bid farewell to the years that are gone. So shall we, with glad hearts, bid all hail! all hail! to the years to be, and to the work they bring.

The Financial Problem.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent Mr. J. Petty seems to think I misrepresented his article on "The Financial Problem." Well, if I did, I certainly did it unwittingly. He is in favor of money being "based" on the government. If I understand him rightly, I disagree with him. Let me illustrate. If the government issues a legal-tender currency, pays off the bonds with it, pays its debts with it, runs the government with it, or loans it to the people at interest, that is what I call being based on the government. The stability of the currency would depend upon stability of government. Mammon, instead of love and justice, would be the greatest factor in preserving the union of the States.

Now, such a currency I oppose. I want it based upon individual property, like a mortgage, the mortgage being given to "bearer" through the government. All I would have government to do is to make it a legal tender, guaranteeing the security, and compelling those issuing it to redeem within twelve months, when called upon, in labor, or satisfactory equivalent. I would have it beyond the power of government to make money. The power only to issue certificates of indebtedness based upon future taxation, but not a legal tender. And not that, except in a crisis of some kind, when taxation would be too slow.

The power to make money by government makes too many avenues, and creates too great a temptation, for extravagance and fraud.

I cannot see that interest is unjust. Government's undertaking to regulate or prohibit it is nonsense. It would be just as sensible and just to say that farmers should not sell their produce any higher on credit than for cash. Regulation or prohibition injures the very party it is intended to benefit.

Now, if enough money can be issued, with good security, so that the demand is not enough to command interest, I say, Amen. But I do not think that possible. It will command interest somewhere.

Mr. Petty says he did not touch the school question. What did he mean by saying, "And if our government was good for anything, it would see that this was carried out, so that all would be protected alike, and all its citizens well educated, free from superstition and falsehood; not as it is now, a kennel of rascals, swindlers, and cheats"? I am certainly pardonable for misapprehending him here. Mr. Petty asks why should not an honest and enlightened government own and run the railroads. When our officials are honest and enlightened the people will be so, too, and there will be no need of government. The expense of one can be saved. Taxation should always be as light as a simple but strong government will admit. To buy and build railroads would greatly increase taxes. The burden of taxation would be heavier than the burden of freight would necessarily be. The world depends too much upon railroads. The raising and driving of stock and good country roads for teams are the substitutes that are neglected. With good roads and cheap lands, horse power should be cheaper than steam. Why not have government steamboats, ships, schools, hotels, bath-houses, lawyers, physicians, barber-shops, etc., etc.?

While I am willing to admit that if labor will unite and run the government it is very probable a great improvement would be made, yet humanity is so imperfect that governments are never a success from a business standpoint. We need six "frees;" free soil, free trade, free government, free money, free elections (freedom to vote on any measure), and free woman. Then every "tub" will have a bottom, and can stand on it. Then give free competition in everything. Let the longest pole knock the persimmons; and humanity will be served in the best possible way: the greatest good to the greatest number. Amen. O. JONES.

Debate.

Since the insertion of my notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER I have received a host of calls for the "Debate;" which proves THE TRUTH SEEKER to be widely circulated among live Liberals. A large number of these friends generously inclose postage stamps. I am inclined to think that many labor under the impression that the "Debate" is a pamphlet report of one of my own discussions, instead of a circular designed to arouse the sleeping sentinels on Zion's walls. As I wish to disappoint none, permit me to say that brother Bennett is about to publish one of my debates through THE TRUTH SEEKER, and afterwards in pamphlet form, a copy of which I will send free to all who have applied for "Debates" up to this issue. Could I afford it, I would gladly continue beyond this date. My Debate circular I will continue to supply free to all applicants.

At present I am engaged in a joint oral debate with Jacob Ditzler, D.D., of Kentucky, in the Christian church of Kirksville. I think it will do great good for Liberalism, as all agitation of thought helps it; and, notwithstanding our opponents boasted that the great Dr. Ditzler would give Infidelity its death-blow in this city, I trust we will be able to report "Neither dead nor asleep." Nearly the whole of the learned doctor's first speech was a glorification on the victories achieved over Voltaire, Paine, Hume, Huxley, Draper, Theodore Parker, and, as the doctor expressed it, "other Infidels," won by Christians. I felt as proud that moment, in such Infidel society, as I ever felt in my life. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven," or, better yet, the Republic of Common Sense.

Our audience was over five hundred one evening. A small admission fee of ten cents is charged, which covers all the expenses of the eight evenings' controversy, and here will probably leave a small balance in the treasury. It is always better to have an admission fee; otherwise the burden falls on the willing, working few. It secures the attendance of the interested of all parties. This makes my thirteenth debate since September 25th last.

Our opponents are invariably sanguine of a victory for Christ's sake. It may be good for Christ, but it affords Liberals a first-rate opportunity to present their facts and principles. A plentiful harvest of doubts of Bible inspiration results from such controversies. Christians, who make it a point of religious duty to never listen to our speakers, will venture out when assured that Christianity is about to win another victory! "Lord, help!" The Liberal advances his facts and arguments, to which the preacher generally responds by exhortation and appeals to sympathy. No wonder that, on cool, mature reflection, the facts stick, while the fervid religious frenzy is forgotten. Then comes the wryful exclamation, "Discussion is injurious, not profitable!" Ah! it is of no use for them to deplore the inevitable. Christianity is doomed. As Oliver Wendell Holmes says, she must give an account of herself to Science.

Money Again.

It is passing strange that men, who appear to be as well educated as Mr. Truesdell is, should make such erroneous assertions as he made in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the 25th of May. He says "the financial history of nearly ever great nation on the globe presents the strongest evidence of the fact (?) that money must necessarily possess intrinsic worth in order to be the basis of all contracts." He could as well say that the civil policy of nearly every great nation on the globe has been a kingdom or empire, therefore we should adopt that system. Does not history teach us that the Spartans were a more successful and prosperous nation after Lycurgus had made their money of a cheaper material? Mr. Truesdell, the one example of France, with her inflated currency, because it is a test case, is worth all of your precedents quoted above. France and Scotland have the most inflated currency of any countries in Europe, and have also the greatest prosperity. I defy you to controvert this proposition, that labor is the basis of wealth. It is the only producer of wealth. And the financial system which keeps the population employed the best is the best system, and that system which causes the greatest number of men to be idle is the worst. Every day that a man works at useful employment the world is better off by his day's work, and every day that a man is idle the nation loses so much in the prosperity it ought to have. "Money is a machine to do business with," is the most practical definition of it I ever heard, and the cheaper the laborer can get hold of it the better.

The money-broker seeks a place where money is dear, but the manufacturer seeks the place where it is cheap. If we had money at a lower rate of interest here than in England, money would go there to be loaned; but manufacturers would come here, and that country would be tributary to us instead of we to them. But the last sentence is the most inexplicable. Mr. Truesdell, in substance, the laborers (a majority) will hold this inflated currency (their own promises), and a few practical financiers will own all of the real wealth of the nation. Greenbackers, you need fear no such idle warning if you are in the majority; you can vote a tax on that "real wealth of the nation" to keep your greenbacks good. You need fear nothing if you will hold a majority and demand the legislation you want. Those "practical financiers" will take more of your real wealth by means of scarce money and foreclosure than they can with plenty of money. J. R. PARKS.

Revised Spelling.

We propose to devote a space in our columns to articles spelled on the Anglo-American plan, wherein no new letters are employed, but each letter and digraph of the common English alphabet represents its most usual sound. A few common words are left unchanged in spelling, the object being to preserve a close resemblance between the revised and the ordinary print and script. Although the Anglo-American spelling is not strictly phonetic, in the sense of a single uniform letter for each sound, yet it relieves our orthography of nine-tenths of the anomalous and contradictory spellings which now disgrace it, and which torment children at school and grown-up people through life.

The following paragraphs are taken from the Liverpool Courier (England), and are from the pen of Mr. E. Jones, one of the principal movers for spelling reform in England:

"The jeneral prinsipels which guvern reviezd speling without new leterz ar az folo:

"1. Adopt the pronunsiaishon ov the standard dicshonariz.

"2. Ecspres eech sound in every wurd by the leterz, singly or in combinaishon, which most freecwently reprezent that sound in the comon speling.

"3. Omit uesles leterz.

"Theez direcshonz ar so simpel and reezonabel that enybody can comprehend and aplie them.

"The yoek ov the complicaited curent sistem ov speling haz been hevy and greevus tu be born, not only by children and forenerz, but by meny educaited peepel, hoo ar ofen compeld tu turn tu the dicshonary for the speling ov dificult wurdz. The standard ov rebelion iz now beeing raizd against the usurper hoo haz tiraniezd so long over old and yung, and we hav amung our leederz sum ov the first scolarz, linguists, and staitsmen ov the day.

"Prof. Max Müller, in an articl on speling which apeerd in the Fortnightly Review about too yeerz sins, asks, 'Iz ther no staitsman in England sufishently proof against ridicuel tu caul the atenshon ov Parlement tu whot iz a groing nashonal misfortuen?' The atenshon ov the Rt. Hon. Robert Lowe having been cauld tu this chalenj, that jentelman roet az foloz: 'I am not afraid ov ridicuel, and I hav a strong opinion on the speling cwestion, and yoo ar welcum tu it. Ther ar, I am informd, 39 soundz in the English langwaij. Ther ar 24 leterz. I think that eech leter shud reprezent wun sound; that 15 new leterz shud be aded, so that ther be a leter for every sound, and that every man shud riet az he speeks.'

"Most personz hoo hav thaut upon this subject wil agree that in 'prinsipel' Mr. Lowe iz riet. Every sound in the langwaij shud hav a leter tu represent it, az recomended by Mr. Withers, Mr. Pitman, Mr. Ellis, and uthers. The alfabet at first consisted ov 16 leterz only, and new leterz hav been aded from tiem tu tiem az new soundz wer develópt or recogniezd. In old English books ther wer no v, w, or j, which hav been aded sins the introducshon ov printing. Ther iz therfor no objecshon in theory tu the introducshon ov new leterz. Most ov the dificultiz ov English speling, however, ariez from the fact that we doo not uez the leterz we hav consistently; and consecwently an efort iz beeing maid—without giving up the prinsipel advocaited by Mr. Lowe, that we aut tu hav 15 new leterz—tu maik the best posibel ues ov ecsisting leterz; and Mr. Pitman haz a skeem for this purpos, and so haz Mr. Ellis.

"Most ov the dificultiz ov speling wud disapeer if the leterz and combinaishonz ov leterz wer uezd invairiably for the saim sound, even if no new leterz wer adopted. The wurdz 'chair,' 'sheep,' 'thing,' 'shoot,' 'shout,' in a strictly fonetic sistem, wud recwier too new leterz eech. If, however, I wer tu riet this comunicaishon with new leterz, the compositor cud not set it up, az the tieps ar not found in ordinary printing ofisez, and even if thay wer found and printed, meny ov yoor reederz wud at first find sum dificulty in desiefering my remarks.

"The pozishon, then, which iz jeneràly recogniezd now by leeding speling reformerz iz this; that whiel a compleet alfabet shud be lookt forward tu az the ultimait end, it iz indispensabel tu hav an interim sistem; imperfect and in sum sens illojical tho that sistem may be, it wud be a vast improovment upon the prezent stait ov thingz.

"This vew iz indorst by Dr. Temple, Bishop ov Exeter, hoo sayz: 'I taik much interest in the speling reform that iz proposed; but I am cwiet shuer that a begining wil hav tu be maid in wun way, and in wun way only, if eny result iz tu be ataind, and that iz, a sosiety must be formd ov educaited peepel, hoo wil plej themselvz, both in rieting and printing, tu spel foneticaly, and tu discard the prezent sistem. The sucses ov such a sosiety wud graitly depend on ther maiking the minimum ov chainj. Ther aut tu be no new caracterz, and only the introducshon ov a few diacritical marks. And whiel it iz nesesary tu insist on the prinsipel every leter or digraf shal hav wun sound only, it iz not nesesary, and it wud be wiez tu discard the prinsipel, every sound shal be reprezented by wun leter or digraf only.'

The practical good sens ov theez remarks, cuming from wun ov the first scolarz ov the day, wun hoo haz fild, and honorably fild, the ofisez of Inspector of Skoolz and then that of Hed Master ov Rugby, wil comend themselvz tu the aprooval of most thautful men. It wil be seen that both c and k ar retaind in the abuv in the pozishonz in which thay ar uezd in the comon speling, and that whot iz cauld the long sounds ov the vowelz e, i, o, u iz indicaited by ading e, az in see, die, foe, due. Which is the Vampire?

In The Index for May 30th appears three and a half columns, in the cultured editor's splenetic and vindictive style, upon Ingersoll and the Vampires of the Press, in which he labors hard—but vainly—to show that The Index is right, and that THE TRUTH SEEKER is wrong. Among the other terrible things, it charges us with being a "Vampire." It may be easily imagined how a person of our extremely sensitive nature must feel to be held up before cultured Liberalists as a "vampire"! How would one of our intelligent readers like to be called a "vampire"? especially by such a cultured and truthful man as the editor of The Index. Oh, it's terrible indeed! Have we lived so long to come to this at last! Are we indeed a "vampire"?

To enable us to make up our mind as to what kind of a horrible monster we are, and whether we are a vampire or not, we have consulted authorities, but nevertheless we are still in doubt. We shall lay the case before our readers, and we hope some of them will be kind enough to tell us whether we are a vampire or not.

The highest authorities we have consulted describe three kinds of vampires, to wit: 1. "A dead person who is believed by superstitious people of some European nations to return in body and soul and wander about the earth seeking the blood of persons asleep." Now as we are not dead yet, we can not "return" and as we have never sucked any blood from sleeping persons—that we know of—we cannot think we are that kind of vampire.

2. "One who lives by preying upon others—an extortioner." We don't prey on anybody nor pray to anybody. Nor are we an extortioner. We give full value for every dollar we receive. We give a third more reading than does The Index for the same money, and some insist that it is a third better, too; hence we are not that kind of a vampire.

3. "A large species of blood-sucking bat, native of South America, of a reddish-brown color, and as large as a magpie. It has two great projections, approximate under-incisors, and similar lancet-shaped superior canines, all of which are very sharp-pointed and arranged to make a triple puncture, like that of a leech. Their whole structure indicates that blood is their sole food. In some countries the rearing of calves is impossible on account of those bats," etc. Does that description fit us? Are we that kind of a vampire? We indignantly answer, No! We were not born in South America; we are not of a reddish-brown color; we are not the size of a magpie; we have not two great projections; we have no under-incisors or upper canines in our jaws, and have such teeth only as the dentist gave us, and we can take them out and show them to any cultured friend who wishes to examine them. Under all these tests, then, we stoutly deny that we are a vampire. If we are, we certainly do not know it. But we are willing to compromise. If the cultured editor will admit that he is a calf, then, just to humor him, we will consent that he may call us a vampire or a big bat that is after him. We would not suck his blood, but would be glad to get some of the falsehood out of him, that causes him to charge people with committing offenses they never thought of committing and of defending wrongs they never thought of defending. If that is his life blood, then we will be glad to get it out of him with our incisors, and by suction, even, if necessary.

The principal thing the cultured editor has succeeded in accomplishing, in his labored article about Ingersoll and the vampires, is to show his hatred and venom towards THE TRUTH SEEKER. We mourn as one who will not be comforted that we have failed to secure the approbation of the only really cultured paper in the Liberal ranks. We would have been glad to have secured its benignant and approving smile, but in this we have been unfortunate. We began in an humble, unpretending way. We did not profess to be cultured or high-toned. We had no company of rich stockholders to back us and help us. We made no pretensions to ultra respectability. We engaged in the work of disseminating the truths of Liberalism from a sense of duty, and we have discharged that duty honestly and with the best ability we possess. We have endeavored to express ourselves in a frank, outspoken, unambiguous manner. We have not studied fine phrases or a super-cultured style. We have spoken in language not easily misunderstood as to what we believed about theological tyranny and fallacious creeds. We have opposed wrong wherever we have found it. We have upheld what we believed to be the truth, and have fearlessly advocated it with such ability as we have—not, of course, equal to that of the organ of Cultured Freethought, for we have never seen the inside of a college, academy, or high school; and since the age of fifteen we have been a constant toiler, finding no time to go to school, and very little time for reading. We have taken no degree, but we have meant to be honest and truthful; and that is about as high as our culture has extended. It is perhaps greatly to be regretted that our opportunities and attainments have been so inferior to those of the cultured editor, but we can not see that we are to blame for it. We did not have the privilege of getting ourselves up. We were even here before we knew anything about ourselves. Had the question been put to us early enough as to what pattern we should be modeled after, possibly we might have answered, "Let it be one of high culture, extreme respectability, with a keen scent for obscenity, so that we can detect it even where it does not exist." But we were not consulted at all, and we were under the necessity of accepting ourselves just as we were. Cannot the cultured editor make some allowance for these early impediments on our part? Would he have done much better under the same circumstances?

Yes, we are extremely sorry that we have failed to meet the approbation of the cultured editor as we were to be equally unsuccessful in securing the approbation of his friends Anthony Comstock, R. Peterson, and Seth Wilbur Payne. Perhaps when an uncultured man finds such a worthy quartette—such an array of truly good and truly respectable men—opposed to him, it is enough to cause him to distrust himself and his own integrity, but with our uncultured mind we could not see that we had meant any harm. All that is left for us to do is to try and win the approbation of our numerous readers. If we are denied the approval of Comstock, Peterson, Payne, and Abbot, we at least trust that a portion of our readers may be able to perceive some merit in us, and that with such faults as we have been guilty of some good deeds may be set down in our favor on the credit side.

We certainly have sought no quarrel with The Index. With due respect for its culture and high tone, we only humbly craved to join its ranks and to coöperate with it in carrying out its demands. We said not a word against it, and though the hand of fellowship was not extended to us, our grief was silent, and we still bowed in adoration. But when the cultured editor strikes us with heavy blows, when he vilifies and asperses us, when he declares and reiterates that we are guilty of the grossest offenses—that we are an advocate of vile and obscene literature, that we wish to defend those who are trying to debauch the minds of the young, that we are trying to tear down all the barriers that divide decency from indecency and morality from immorality—then our grief knows no bounds, and we are ready to cry out in sore anguish, "Francis Ellingwood! Francis Ellingwood, why persecutest thou me?"

All this trouble has been brought upon our luckless head because we recommended a certain petition to Congress asking for the repeal or modification of certain unconstitutional and oppressive laws, the enactment of which was procured by the influence and efforts of the Young Men's Christian Association, which laws have been used as an engine of tyranny against the unfortunate wights not in favor with the Y. M. C. A. A good deal has been said about this petition. The cultured editor has denounced it, the writer of it, and the seventy thousand who signed it, in such strong terms, and has accused them all of favoring and advocating the grossest obscenity, that we will again lay this petition before our readers, and we hope they will examine it closely, and see if they can find in it a phrase or a word of an improper character or which excuses or defends anything that is impure, anything immoral or indecent; or whether there is a clause or suggestion that anybody but a super-cultured editor could take exception to. Here it is:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled:

The Petition of the Undersigned, Citizens of the United States, residing at or near ——, respectfully shows;

1 That they are loyal and devoted supporters of the Constitution of the United States and of the Republican form of Government, and that they are so principally from the conviction that under them Personal Liberty, Freedom of Conscience, of the Press, and of the expression of opinion, together with equality before the Law and the Departments of Government had been for the first time substantially secured among men; and your petitioners rejoiced in the belief that the rights thus guaranteed had in our own country forever abrogated every form of political, moral, and religious persecution and inquisition:—

2. That without the knowledge of your Petitioners, and as they believe, without the knowledge of any great number of the Citizens of the United States, certain Acts were procured to be passed by Congress in 1873 (since incorporated into the U. S. Revised Statutes, as §§ 1785, 3878, 3893, 5389, 2491), for the ostensible purpose of suppressing "obscene literature," &c., which reversed the policy and practice of our Government since its foundation.

3. That in the belief of your Petitioners the Government of the United States was established under the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution for the more general purposes of Government only, and for the protection, and not for the limitation, of the rights aforesaid. That to that end, i.e., "to secure the blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our posterity," Congress was prohibited from making laws affecting Religion or Conscience, or "abridging the freedom of the Press or of Speech," or the right of Petition; and the People were "to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects," &c. That the true construction and meaning of these great Charters of Liberty were declared by their authors, the founders of our Government, to be, that all persons were, and of right ought to be, equal in their protection and privileges before the Law, the Courts, and all the Departments of the Government, without discrimination or question, as to their social, moral, political or religious character. That the Statutes aforesaid are, in the opinion of your Petitioners, plain violations of the letter and spirit of these fundamental principles of our Government; and that they are capable of, and are, in fact, being used for the purposes of moral and religious persecution, whereby the dearest and most precious rights of the People are being grievously violated under the forms of legal inquisition, fines, forfeiture, and imprisonment:—

4. And your Petitioners further show, that they are convinced that all attempts of Civil Government, whether State or National, to enforce or to favor particular religious, social, moral or medical opinions, or schools of thought or practice, are not only unconstitutional, but ill-advised, contrary to the spirit and progress of our age, and almost certain in the end to defeat any beneficial objects intended. That mental, moral, and physical health and safety are better secured and preserved by virtue resting upon liberty and knowledge, than upon ignorance enforced by governmental supervision. That even error may be safely left free, where truth is free to combat it. That the greatest danger to a Republic is the insidious repression of the liberties of the People. That whenever publications, pictures, articles, acts, or exhibitions, directly tending to produce crime or pauperism, are wantonly exposed to the Public, or obtruded upon individuals, the several States and Territories have provided, or may be safely left to provide, suitable remedies.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that the Statutes aforesaid may be repealed, or materially modified, so that they cannot be used to abridge the Freedom of the Press or of Conscience, or to destroy the liberty and equality of the People before the Law and Departments of the Government on account of any religious, moral, political, medical, or commercial grounds or pretexts whatsoever.

And your Petitioners will ever pray, &c., &c., &c.

There, kind friends, is the terrible, iniquitous document, just as it was written, just as it was signed by nearly seventy thousand people, and just as it was presented to Congress for its consideration. It states fairly the reason why the Comstock law is objectionable, it calls attention to the fact that it abridges the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and simply defines the rights of American freemen, and respectfully asks for the law's repeal or modification. And for this the cultured editor charges the petition with being a terrible and fatal blunder, of occupying an utterly indefensible position; its writer and its seventy thousand signers with allying themselves with publishers of obscene literature, shielders of nefarious practices, of compromising the cause of Liberalism, and much more of the same kind. Because we have made ourselves active in having this petition signed and presented to Congress, the cultured editor denounces us as a vampire, and accuses us of insincerity, of dishonesty, and of complicity with crime. Now all this is simply false. There is not a word of truth in it. There is not a word in the petition in favor of obscenity and immorality. Not one of the signers placed his name to the document because he was in favor of obsenity; not one meant to lend his aid to any form of immorality, and there is scarcely a man in the country who would have the hardihood to pretend that the writer and the signers of that petition were aiders and abettors of obscenity, except Anthony Comstock and Francis Ellingwood Abbot, and every time those cultured men assert that such is the case they utter a base, calumnious falsehood. The drafter of that petition is as pure a man as either Comstock or Abbot, and the signers are among the best men in our land, and whenever the cultured, self-righteous editor insinuates anything to the contrary he is guilty of vilification and wrong towards his fellow-beings, far more criminal than vampirism or obscenity.

As bad as obscenity is, it is not the highest crime that is committed. Defamation of character, vilifying one's fellow-beings, blackening the reputations of others, and imputing dishonorable motives where none exist, and using calumny and slander are infinitely baser and blacker, and these the cultured editor has persistently been guilty of. Every time he insinuates that those in favor of a repeal of the Comstock laws are in favor of obscenity he utters a falsehood. Every time he says the petition calls for a "total repeal," he utters a lie. No such words as "total repeal" are used in the petition. Let the language of the last paragraph be closely studied and it will be seen that it asks for a modification just as much as for repeal. If language means anything, one is meant just as much as another. It is left to the option of Congress whether it shall be modification or repeal. How dishonest then, how base and untruthful is the cultured editor to persist in misrepresenting his betters the way he does! How absurd and uncalled-for the hypocritical, pharisaical howl about the "great blunder" that has been committed in asking for a repeal instead of a modification! Why, a blind man can see that a modification is asked for just as much as a repeal. Both words could not be named first. One had to have precedence, but the second is asked for just as much as the first, and people of ordinary culture can easily see it.

The cultured gentleman pretends to be in favor of a "radical modification," but condemns the petition to the lowest degradation because it asks for modification or for repeal, as Congress decides. What contemptible hair-splitting! What barefaced dishonesty! What despicable insincerity! If that is culture, if that is refinement, if that is the respectability which Liberals are enjoined to embrace, may God, or the forces of nature, or whatever else rules in the universe, save us from it! A thousand times sooner give us plain, old-fashioned honesty, truth, and common sense.

What a ridiculous thing it is for the Apostle of Culture to undertake to make such a wide difference between the repeal and modification of a bad law. He admits the law is bad, when he says he favors a "radical modification." If, then, it is so bad, where is the great harm in repealing it altogether, and getting up something better instead? Is there really such great wrong in repealing a bad law as to subject every one in favor of it to the charge of being obscenists? The petition clearly points out the way in which obscenity can be circumvented without destroying or infringing the liberties of the people. We well know that the Comstock law is unconstitutional, that it has placed in the hands of a bad, unprincipled man the power to oppress and grossly wrong his more respectable fellow-citizens, and that its rule has needlessly damaged in property and in reputation hundreds of upright American citizens. Is it then such a criminal thing to respectfully ask for its repeal? Because we have been somewhat instrumental in the movement is the cultured gentleman justified in denouncing us in every conceivable manner? Can it not be seen by persons of even common culture that he is making a great fuss about nothing? That he is scattering discord and contention where there is no necessity for it? Who has constituted him a dictator to insolently arraign people for performing conscientious actions? Is he to decide what kind of a petition we may sign and what not? Who has authorized him to elevate a cultured standard which all the Liberals of the land must bow down to and acknowledge? Is he indeed the infallible pope whose edict must be obeyed upon pain of excommunication and the rack, and without a question by all the Liberals from the Atlantic to the Pacific? Is he surely the Moses, which shall say to us, "this ye may do, but that ye may not do?" Cannot a petition be written and signed by the freemen of America without being subjected to the denunciation and vilification of this bigoted, self-righteous, semi-orthodox Pharisee? Are not calumny, misrepresentation, and attempted moral assassination infinitely worse than even the obscenity with which he so falsely charges others? He is perhaps the greatest assassin who stabs our reputation and he the greatest thief who steals our good name. Shakspere thus states it:

"Good name, in man or woman, dear my lord,
Is the immediate jewel of their souls.
Who steals my purse, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

A single quotation from Pollock, on the slanderer will suffice:

"Twas slander filled his mouth with lying words—
Slander, the foulest whelp of Sin. The man
In whom this spirit entered was undone.
His tongue was set on fire of hell, his heart
Was black as death, his legs were faint with haste
To propagate the lie his soul had formed.
His pillow was the peace of families
Destroyed, the sigh of innocence reproached.
Broken friendships, and the strife of brotherhoods;
Yet did he spare his sleep, and hear the clock
Number the midnight watches, on his bed,
Devising mischief more; and early rose,
And made most hellish meals of good men's names."

When the cultured gentleman asserts or insinuates that the friends and signers of that petition are advocates of obscenity, he robs them of their good name. It would undoubtedly be better for him to pay less attention to culture, to regard it less highly, and to place a greater value upon truth, honesty, and fair dealing.

Appropos to the cultured editor's hue and cry about the enormity of asking for the repeal of a law and the criminality those must be guilty of who presume to ask for it, and as an illustration of his honesty and sincerity, attention is called to the following Washington telegraphic dispatch which appeared in The Tribune and other papers on the morning of the 1st inst:

"The House Committee on the Revision of the Laws, in response to the petition of Robt. G. Ingersoll and others, has reported favorably a bill to repeal that section of the Revised Statutes which relates to the sending of obscene literature through the mails. This is the act commonly known as the Anthony Comstock Law and the section under which alone he obtains the exceptional powers which he exercises. The committee has been induced to favor the repeal of this bill on the ground that it is unconstitutional and that in many instances it has been executed in a tyrannical and unjust manner."

Here we see that the House Committee favor the repeal of the Comstock Law, and upon the very grounds expressed in the petition, first, the unconstitutionality of the law, and second, the tyranny and injustice that have been exercised under it, and thus directly snubbing Comstockism and Abbotism. What is the cultured gentleman going to do about this outrage? Will he permit a Congressional committee to absolutely favor a repeal of the Comstock Law without denouncing them as obscenists, cut-throats, and assassins? He must look to them at once for they are far more dangerous than the editor of this paper who asked for repeal or modification, while they recommend repeal and say nothing about modification.

The report of this committee is really a triumph in favor of the petition, whether the House finds time to vote upon it or not. It is a decision in favor of one of the largest petitions ever sent in to Congress. We can congratulate ourselves that we were instrumental in getting it up, while the cultured editor may have the unenviable credit of trying to stab it in its infancy, and of persistently denouncing it and those who signed it ever since. We would not change places with him for all the culture he boasts of.

Yes, this report of the Committee is a heavy blow upon Comstock, and he needs bestir himself at once. He will probably obtain a certificate of high morality and respectability, if not of culture, from the Rev. Mr. Courtney, the Rev. Mr. Tyng, and five hundred more of the clergymen of this city and Brooklyn, and with this holy backing, and a carpet-bag full of obscene pictures and books, he will hurry on to Washington and strive to annul the action of the Committee. May we not expect that the Apostle of Culture, Abbot, backed by A. W. Kelsey and H. Clay Neville, will also hurry on to Washington to save his friend Comstock's great moral law, and to kill the petition? Already has the cultured gentleman been guilty of the meanness of approaching Colonel Ingersoll with a request that the Colonel should not appear before the Senate Committee in favor of the prayer of the petitioners, which despicable request we trust the Colonel will totally disregard. We hope he will be influenced more by the prayers of seventy thousand honest, independent men, than by the request of one high-toned, truckling, weak-kneed, temporizing, pharsaical, semi-orthodox, though cultured man.

As regards the position of Colonel Ingersoll we have little to say. If he deems it the wiser course to work for modification rather than repeal, we shall not object. We have not pretended that he is in favor of repeal nor even that he signed the petition. We have not misstated a fact in relation to him, nor have we made any false pretensions in relation to the petition. That he is in favor of carrying out the prayer of the petitioners and of helping in the cause we have been glad to hear and still are. Moreover, if he is pleased with such a defense as the cultured editor gave him—saying on the one hand that, "Col. Ingersoll was quite ignorant of what he was doing when he signed or presented that petition," and on the other hand, twice quoting with approval the Rev. Mr. Eldridge who denounces the Colonel as a knave—if the Colonel is pleased with that sort of a defense he is easily suited and is welcome to it. As for ourselves we would not wish such a defense.

The cultured editor, in speaking of a letter of Col. Ingersoll to the Boston Journal, says: "THE TRUTH SEEKER did not, does not, and will not dare to print it." To show that the editor is no more truthful in this than in the other charges he has made against us, we will here insert the letter referred to, for there is assuredly nothing very formidable in it. Here it is:

WASHINGTON, March 18, 1878.

To the Editors of the Boston Journal:

My attention has been called to the following article that recently appeared in your paper:

"Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll and others feel aggrieved because Congress in 1873 enacted a law for the suppression of obscene literature, and, believing it an infringement of the rights of certain citizens and an effort to muzzle the press and conscience, petition for its repeal. When a man's conscience permits him to spread broadcast obscene literature, it is time that conscience was muzzled. The law is a terror only to evil doers."

No one wishes the repeal of any law for the suppression of obscene literature. For my part I wish all such laws rigidly enforced. The only objection that I have to the law of 1873 is, that it has been construed to include books and pamphlets written against the religion of the day, although containing nothing that can be called obscene or impure. Certain religious fanatics, taking advantage of the word "immoral" in the law, have claimed that all writings against what they are pleased to call orthodox religion are immoral, and such books have been seized and their authors arrested. To this, and this only, I object.

Your article does me great injustice, and I ask that you will have the kindness to publish this note.

From the bottom of my heart I despise the publishers of obscene literature. Below them there is no depth of filth. And I also despise those who, under the pretense of suppressing obscene literature, endeavor to prevent honest and pure men from writing and publishing honest and pure thoughts. Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

The cultured editor takes pains to inform his readers that he had an interview with Col. Ingersoll and it seems the Colonel, as is his wont, was genial and gracious with him and it was on this occasion that the cultured editor requested the Colonel to abstain from advocating the cause of the petition which the cultured editor had done his best to blacken and destroy. This we have from a mutual friend who conversed with the Colonel subsequent to the Abbot interview and to whom the Colonel made the statement. We too had an interview with Col. Ingersoll when he lectured in this city, and Comstock and his law were mentioned and it was very apparent that the Colonel entertained a very poor opinion of both and that he thought far less of either Comstock and his law than the cultured editor appears to, and that both would be easily set aside. We do not believe the Colonel's views have materially changed since—though that short interview in Boston with a man of culture may have been more than he could withstand. He may now be a Comstock man, as Abbot is, but we do not believe it. Of course, culture is more or less irresistible, but we cannot think the Colonel was entirely changed by one contact, nor do we think culture alone will deter him from advocating the prayer of the petitioners.

There are a good many inaccuracies of statement in The Index article on vampirism which should not appear in a journal of respectability and high culture. We have room to notice but a few of them. 1. "THE TRUTH SEEKER tried in its last issue to cover up the fact that Colonel Ingersoll opposes the repeal of the law of 1873." This is false. We tried to do nothing of the kind, and we did not know that Colonel Ingersoll was opposed to the repeal of the law, and we are yet far from believing that he is. We think we know his opinion towards Comstock, and we cannot believe he is specially anxious to retain Comstock's unconstitutional law on our statute books. If he is, we can only say his position is not consistent. We can easily understand that The Index will do all it can to show that he has gone over to the miserable few who howl about culture and high-toned decency, but we do not believe it.

2. "The greatest danger of Liberalism to-day is the low purpose of some of its popular exponents." This is untrue as the cultured man meant it, but it may be true as a matter of fact. It depends altogether who it is that have the "low purposes." If he means those who ask for the repeal of a bad, oppressive, unconstitutional law, he speaks falsely; but if he means the slanderer, the vilifier, the calumniator, and the besmircher of the good name of others, he is correct. He however did not mean that his purposes are low, but those of that obscene brother of his; hence his falsehood.

3. "We say without hesitation that Liberalism could have practically no worse enemy than he who purposely or without purpose, should actually place it before the public in the light of a defender of obscene literature." Here is a double falsehood. In the first place it means to insinuate that we are a defender of obscene literature when nothing is further from the truth. With the exception of a part of a filthy book which Comstock sent by mail to a friend of ours, we do not remember having seen an obscene book for twenty years. We are not at all in favor of that kind of literature, but believe there are effective means of suppressing it without breaking the Constitution of our country. Nor do we think a mistaken idea that Liberalism favors obscenity—as bad as obscenity is—is the greatest evil that besets Liberalism. Falsehood, slander, and wilful misrepresentation are far worse.

4. "It [the petition] asks that the law of 1873 be totally repealed." Utterly false and unprincipled, as we have shown. The petition asks for nothing of the kind, as any person can see by reading it. This is a case of gross and positive falsehood.

5. "The utter insincerity of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S opposition is proved by the extreme care taken by it to keep the difference itself completely out of sight, and to raise all sorts of ridiculous and personal side issues which have nothing to do with the main question." This is simply a cultured lie. We have been entirely frank and open in the matter. We have tried to cover or conceal nothing, and we have not tried to drag in irrelevant side issues.

6. "Liberalism cannot afford to take up an utterly indefensible position." As this was meant it is utterly false. It means that Liberalism cannot afford to ask for the repeal of an unjust, oppressive, unconstitutional law. That is as false as hell, regardless of what villainous, false construction may be placed upon the motives of Liberals. But "Liberals cannot afford" to be liars, slanderers, and vilifiers. They cannot afford to uphold injustice, priestly tyranny, and the suppression of the very principles of personal liberty. That is the way to state it. They can afford to be brave and true men, but they cannot afford to be arrant, cringing, weak-kneed cowards.

7. "The petition itself is a terrible and fatal blunder for the Liberal cause; for the act of demanding the unconditional repeal of the law of 1873 must and will, in spite of all protests and explanations, put the signers in the attitude of seeking to protect really obscene literature." False, doubly false! The petition does not ask for an unconditional repeal, and Mr. Abbot knows it perfectly well, if he knows anything. It does not seek to protect obscene literature, and the cultured falsifier also knows that perfectly well. There are plenty of ways to extirpate obscene literature instead of by unconstitutional, liberty-destroying Young-Men's-Christian-Association laws. And he who states to the contrary utters a falsehood.

8. "THE TRUTH SEEKER tries to convince its readers contrary to the truth, that Colonel Ingersoll really favors the repeal of that law." Utterly false. We have not tried to misrepresent Col. Ingersoll in the slightest degree. We did not know nor say whether he most favored repeal or modification; but if he favors either, he is in favor of the petition, for, we repeat, it asks for one as much as the other. Nothing has been further from our aim than to misrepresent anything connected with this affair. We wish the cultured journal was equally free from misrepresentation.

9. "It is a libel on Col. Ingersoll's good name to say that he is intentionally in favor of the total repeal of the law." In intent here is another falsehood. It seeks to imply that we have libeled the Colonel by representing him in favor of a total repeal, when we have done nothing of the kind, as the readers of these pages can truthfully attest. The entire implication is basely false, as are all the rest of the falsehoods from the same source.

10. The cultured slurs about "dragooning Liberals into the defense of publishers of obscene literature," the hideous crime of "social fountain-poisoning," and much else of a similar character we can afford to let pass for the present. It is probable the gentleman's own venom will poison him to death; and perhaps it is well that natural causes produce natural results.

More room has been taken in examining these cultured attacks and cultured falsehoods than was intended, and more perhaps than they deserve. The gentleman may act upon the principle that a lie told often enough will take the place of truth, but he is mistaken in this if he thinks so. Falsehood, injustice, and oppression must ultimately go to the wall, and it will take several journals of cultured thought—abler than his—to sustain them against the effects of reason, truth, and sterling honesty.

It appears to us that the cultured gentleman in this great struggle places himself in the position the traitors occupied in the revolutionary struggle of this young country. When the veterans of freedom were in a life and death struggle against heavy odds, and when they needed the help of every man, how base it was in the traitors to try to foil them, and play into the hands of the enemy. Can any good man entertain any respect for that class of men? Honest worth will ever be respected, while treachery and falsehood must ever be despised.

The cultured editor has a perfect right to be partial to kid gloves, patent-leather boots, and twenty-five cent cigars. As for ourselves we have had no use for either of these; but we fail to see that they make a man any more honorable or high-minded, or that they entitle him to misrepresent his fellow-men, or to impute wrong motives for their actions. He also has a right to defend, if he chooses to, Comstock and his miserable law, but we fear love's labor in this case will be lost. Comstockism is going down, and it will hardly be in the power of Courtney, Tyng, and Abbot to save it. There seems to be a fatal coincidence in the Comstock business all around. Just now the papers bring the intelligence that the great Comstock lode of Nevada is impoverished and exhausted, and the stock is away down. It is much the same with our Comstock stock here. It is to be feared it is so low it cannot again be resurrected. The Index will hardly be able to save it.

In closing, we charge the cultured editor with maligning and misrepresenting the intent of seventy thousand people. He has aimed to filch from them their good name and reputation; he has falsified their object and purpose. To this extent he has sucked away their very life-blood, and we leave it with our readers to decide which is the vampire.

THE Letter from the Devil is excused again this week. He was on hand, so far as he is concerned, and would have written with sufficient promptness, but our room was completely bespoke for other articles, and, as he is so good-natured, he does not object to being set aside for a week or two when necessary. Our article on astronomy also had to give way to other matter.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER XV.

ENTITLED SUBLIMITY.

Simon Again Proceeds Wearily on his Journey.

1. The gathering. The gathering of the mighty ones. The gathering of the great ones. Woe be to him that delayeth to come, woe to him that heareth not.

2. The mighty shall rejoice, and the weak-kneed shall fall down

3. And the viper of Ezion was married to the nether whirlwind, and the mighty ones were gathered together. And a great mist came out and overwhelmed the scribe, and built itself an habitation among the bushes; and sent out invitations to the feast.

4. And the crocodiles, and the locusts, and the grasshoppers of the sea isles came. And two beetles and a cimex presented themselves in baskets of filigree work.

5. And one of the crocodiles had a flat nose, and was an eunuch, and they stoned him, and drowned him with water till he died.

6. And divers of the conies said continually, It is well, it is well; and the grey falcons grew sick unto death, and made over their possessions.

7. And the great fish that sat in the midst, was possessed of a demon, and refused to sell, and the lepers were angry thereat.

8. But why they broke it, I know not, and no man living can tell, and of late the dead are silent.

9. And the scribe lifted up his voice, which had fallen into a pit, and cried, saying, Out of the depth, out of the depth, and the answer came quick, saying, Wallow.

10. And I sharpened mine ears with myrtle sprigs, and came down, and the beggar died.

11. And Abram gave him a four square cloth and said, Blow, and it was so.

12. And the other side was hollow, and said it was born so, and the horses and the chariots went away empty, nevertheless the man was a liar.

13. And it came to pass, and was not able, and went by on the other side of the dead crocodile, and began to scratch lustily, and the woe-begone cimex said, So let him find grief, and it was so.

14. Then I understood why the blood was seen, and what was meant by the wounded coppersmith. And the king said, It is better thus, and I said, Amen.

15. After this it grew dark, and there were seven of them.

16. He that hath ears to hear let him hear!

CHAPTER XVI.

ENTITLED DUALITY.

Simon in Deep Distress

1. And Simon departed upon his journey, and took leave of the guides. But the guide whose name was Godlyguts went with him to show him the way.

2. And they went in search of a certain city called the city of Sanctification, but they could not find it.

3. For the gutter called the Narrowway branched off in every direction, and the branches ran into each other, and through each other, and over each other, and under each other.

4. And there were turnings here, and twistings there; on this side was a bend and on that side was a bend; in one place the gutter was so deep that daylight was no longer seen, and in another so shallow that the pilgrims could scarce keep within it.

5. And Simon went on painfully and wearily day by day, tumbling headlong down into the deep places, and toiling up the ascent to the shallows.

6. And everywhere in the gutters were great stones called Arguments, which were cast in by the Giants, and they were exceedingly troublesome to the pilgrims, causing them often to fall down, and compelling them to clamber over, for some of the stones were very great and not easily got over.

7. And Simon and Godlyguts went on together, helping each other over the great stones, and tumbling down together, and lifting each other up again, and condoling with each other, and saying, We fell not, nor can we fall, and even while they were yet saying it, they went down sprawling.

8. And it came to pass at a certain place one of the Giants came and threw down a great stone upon them, where the gutter was very deep.

9. And the great stone came down swiftly, hissing as it fell, and Godlyguts being expert in such matters avoided it, but it fell upon Simon, and as an hammer driveth in a nail, so did it drive Simon into the ground.

10. Even up to the ears did it drive him into the ground, and not being able to get out, he took good counsel and stayed in, and his wits went gathering wool, and found little.

11. And when his wits came back from their journey, behold Godlyguts was gone away.

12. And Simon went after him, and overtook him, and said unto him, Why hast thou forsaken me, seeing I am nailed fast in the ground, and the great stone over me.

13. And after much entreaty Godlyguts went back with Simon, but they could not find the stone, nor the place where Simon was nailed down.

14. Then was Simon in sore distress, and went about as one distraught, moaning his grief to the winds, and Godlyguts grew weary of the search.

15. And Simon bemoaned himself bitterly, saying, Woe is me, woe is me; I am one of the lost sheep. Was ever man in such woeful guise, that he should not be able to find himself. Woe is me in very deed, for I know not where I am, nor where my carcase is laid. Oh, Simon, Simon, son of my father, where art thou? Why hidest thou thyself from me? Thou whom my soul loveth above all men, where art thou?

16. And after many days Simon found the stone, and was exceedingly joyful thereat, and he began diligently to dig under the stone, and in due time found himself.

17. And Simon was much shattered by the stone falling upon him, and he gathered himself up with great care, and placed himself in a basket, and putting the basket on his head he went on his journey.

18. And when he came to Gilead he repaired to the physician that dwelt there, and the physician repaired him.*

19. And Simon went on his way rejoicing.

20. And Simon rejoiced exceedingly.

21. And it came to pass that when Simon came to the——†

*In this verse and the six preceding, the doctrine of the duality of man's nature is plainly and unequivocally propounded.

†To our excessive dismay and grief, and to the incalculable loss of science, religion, and the rest of the professions, the rest of this highly interesting and very valuable chapter is for the present at least, lost! An irreverent rat (our eternal curses attend it), with a literary taste of ravenous dimensions, has eaten it! May its mother eat dirt! Our sorrow is of course great, and yet we do not sorrow as one without hope. We have borrowed a trap of Anthony Comstock (than whom a more tricky trapper never breathed), and have set it with a bait which we are sure neither gods nor men can resist. In the event of our catching the ignoble animal (to which end we desire the earnest prayers of the faithful), we shall engage an orthodox clergyman (than whom at cutting up the dead none have had more extensive practice) to perform a post-mortem examination, and having thus recovered the lost manuscript, we shall publish it in our second or third edition. Should the rat, however, elect to keep out of the trap, we shall engage the renowned strategist Moody. To say more than this is unnecessary.—Trs.

Hull to Stebbins.

Friend Stebbins: I do not know how long Bro. Bennett's patience may hold out, and I am not very particular as to who has the last word in this controversy over Spiritualism; but your reply to my strictures on your article in The Truth Seeker of April 20th demands a few words, and I feel "impressed" to write them. At first sight, it does seem a little cruel in me to "take up the cudgel and whack away" at you after Bro. Bennett had given you such a thorough castigation! It is so much like kicking a dead dog just to convince him that there is punishment after death that I frankly confess that I owe you an apology.

I was foolish enough to think (and I am not yet quite cured) that there were three sides to the question. There was, 1. The side occupied by Bro. Bennett, as the conductor of a great truth-seeking journal; his duty is to furnish mental food to the great mass of truth-seeking readers; 2. There is the side of anti-Spiritualists, of whom you are a representative, expressing disappointment because the editor had catered a little for the rest of his Spiritualistic readers, and 3. There is the Spiritualistic side, of which I am a feeble representative. Now, that you had spoken from one side, and Bro. B. from another, had I, as a constant reader of The Truth Seeker no right to a hearing? I do not blame you for fluttering! How could you do otherwise? I commend the resignation with which you submit to the flagellation.

You, after stating that I am sure the rappings were not, in the case of the Fox sisters, produced by the toes, say: "Well now, Moses, will you be kind enough to tell us how they were made? I feel sure you can if you will. You know as well as I that imps composed of sublimated ether, or more substantial hydrogen gas, could not produce an audible sound on stoves and other furniture. Neither could the will of man or spirits do the like."

Yes, I would like to tell you just how they were made, but I can not. I have a slight acquaintance with the most of your "seventeen different ways" of producing raps. I can say these were not produced by any of them. They were produced by an intelligence—by some one who could read the thoughts of all present—this thing that produced these and other phenomena called itself the spirit of a dead man. I do not know that it was, but I am better convinced of it than I am that Dr. Stebbins of Pennsylvania wrote the article to which I am now replying.

I do not see how you can know that the will of man or spirits cannot produce raps. I have not, as yet, found all the possibilities connected with the will of man or spirits; and I judge you have not, for in your closing paragraph you say: "Finally, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not affirm or deny anything touching the existence of Bennett's material ghosts, because I know not what he or nature is capable of producing. I frankly admit that Bennett, Moses, and the universe, can do much."

If you cannot "affirm or deny anything concerning spirits," or, if you "know not what nature is capable of producing," how do you know that "imps composed of sublimated ether, or more substantial hydrogen gas, could not produce an audible sound on stoves or other furniture." Where do you—seeing you know nothing of what nature is capable of producing—get the authority to say, "Neither could the will of man or spirits do the like?" A wiser man than either you or I once said: "What right has a scientific inquirer to dispute the occurrence of any class of actual phenomena? By what authority does he presume to question the veracity of men whose integrity is above suspicion? His appropriate business is to observe, analyze, classify, and explain. When he attempts to evade the truth, to deny the facts brought to his notice, and to defame the passive instruments employed in their production, he abandons the true method of science, and becomes a mere dogmatist, whose arrogant self-conceit is far more conspicuous than his wisdom."

Skipping over a few things which you put in just to fill the columns, I find the following:

"In hinting that the raps might be made by the medium's toes, I had in mind a work published in 1851, by Herman Burr, in which he exposes the tricks of all the noted mediums to be found at that time in five different States. He smoked out their various methods, and became such an adept in the art of imitating them, as to be able to say, 'I can now produce mysterious rappings in seventeen different ways.'"

Ah! was that a hint; well, somehow I never could understand hints! I turn to your article in The Truth Seeker, of April 20th, page 249, under the heading, "Another one Disappointed" I read:

"I have examined the spiritualistic philosophy ever since the Fox family commenced their rappings and toe-snappings, and to me it is no less absurd than the ghost fooleries and witch romances of old."

Isn't that rather a loud hint? If you have not positively in that asserted that "the Fox family commenced their rappings and toe-snappings," I cannot understand my mother-tongue. I do not blame you for wishing your positive assertion were only a hint, but don't call it so. You are in danger of loosing your reputation for veracity.

By the way, is it not a little queer that Herman Burr, should as early as 1851, only three years after the raps commenced in the Fox family, publish a work thoroughly exposing Spiritualism, and that Spiritualism should go right along for twenty-seven years, "conquering and to conquer" making converts every day, as though it had not been killed! His killing it so soon after it was born was almost equal to Prof. Lawrence killing it with his "fourth lecture" so many years before it was born! A good many lives Spiritualism has; it will stand a thousand more such killings, and get fat on them! Yes, Mr. Burr "smoked out seventeen different ways," producing so-called spirit rappings! really! That seems to be about sixteen more than necessary, but I suppose he wanted to make thorough work of it! That is the reason Spiritualism has been so thoroughly dead ever since; This reminds one of the lawyers kettle:

"If the court pleases we have proved: 1. That the kettle was broken when we borrowed it; 2. It was whole when we took it home; and 3. We never had the old kettle anyhow."

Will Mr. Burr's seventeen different methods of exposing Spiritualism hang together as well as this? if so, I cannot wonder that we heard nothing of Spiritualism since the publication of the astounding book in 1851.

A want of space compels me to pass unnoticed many items in your article. Your thrust at "healing medium swindlers," strikes me as being perfectly natural. I see you put M.D., after your name. I notice that doctors are not altogether unlike other men; they like a monopoly of their business, it hurts many of them to have sick people "swindled" with anything else than their own drugs.

Of course, I cannot object to your defending your kind; the "healing medium swindlers" have swindled the regulars out of many victims! hit them again I'll stand by you.

It seems that you commenced your warfare on Spiritualism "more than thirty years ago." If you had said, exactly thirty years ago, that would have been in less than thirty days from "the time the Fox family commenced their rappings and toe-snappings." As it was more than thirty years ago, you seem determined to have been on time in your attacks! Was it your idea to help Dr. Lawrence kill it before it was born?

How successful you have been! Just think, you commenced your war on it before it commenced, and conducted it with such success that it has only made, in this country, about fifteen millions of converts! Your success should be rewarded! You deserve a cardinal's cap!

Let me call attention to one more of your assertions and then I will give you rest.

You say: "Bennett gives the living organized brain of man credit for all mental phenomena, and if that be true, it follows that we are utterly destitute of spirits or souls, to be saved or damned, such as Christians believe in."

Is that so? I assert that a violin makes music. This gives you as much right to assert that music originates with a violin, as you have to make the above assertion. How would this sound? "Hull gives the violin the credit of making music, and if that be true, it follows that we are utterly destitute of musicians such as Christians believe in."

No violin ever made music without an operator; no brain ever produced mental phenomena without an operator; that operator I call the spirit. My pen is at this moment writing thoughts, but the thoughts did not originate with the pen, they only flow though it to the paper, so that the printer can catch them; so thought is produced to the external world through the brain. In haste I am as ever, Moses Hull.

The Jewish Jesus.

About A. D. 200 (some suppose earlier, others later), Celsus wrote a work against Christianity, entitled Logos Alethes, "True Doctrine." All we know of its contents is what Origen has transmitted to us in a large volume of refutation. Celsus was familiar with gospel-stories, like ours, but not identical. He introduces a Jew who has a personal discussion with Jesus.

"In the first place he accuses him of having invented his birth from a virgin, and upbraids him with being born in a certain Jewish village, of a poor woman of the country, who gained her subsistence by spinning, and who was turned out of doors by her husband, a carpenter by trade, because she was convicted of adultery; that after being driven away by her husband and wandering about for a time, she disgracefully gave birth to Jesus, an illegitimate child, who having hired himself out as a servant in Egypt, on account of his poverty, and having there acquired some miraculous powers, on which the Egyptians greatly pride themselves, returned to his own country highly elated on account of them, and by means of these proclaimed himself a God" (Orig., agt. Cels., i, 28).

The father of the illegitimate child is afterwards described as a soldier named Panthera (i, 32).

Celsus discredits the story of the massacre of the infants by Herod, of the flight into Egypt, of the dove alighting on Jesus at his baptism, and of the resurrection.

Origen is indignant at Celsus for calling Jesus a carpenter, and says that "in none of the gospels current in the churches is Jesus himself ever described as being a carpenter" (vi, 35). True, but Origen ought to have told us what he was doing up to the age of thirty or thirty-five, if he did not work at the same trade as his father.

Origen accuses Celsus of ignorance as to the number of the apostles, quoting him thus:

"Jesus having gathered around him ten or eleven persons of notorious character, the very wickedest of tax gatherers and sailors, fled in company with them from place to place, and obtained his living in a shameful and importunate manner" (i, 62).

Celsus says that Jesus was reported to have been "little, ill-favored, and ignoble." Origen's answer is remarkable. He admits that Jesus was ill-favored, denies that he was ignoble, and says there is no certain evidence that he was little (vi, 75). But the only proof he adduces is from prophecy. He quotes the Septuagint version of Isaiah liii, 2, 3, which reads, "He had no form nor beauty; but his form was ignoble and inferior to that of the sons of men" (instead of "ignoble," the English translation of Origen has without honor). Origen then cites psalm xlv, 3, "Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty, with thy comliness and thy beauty," to prove that Jesus was not ugly in appearance, and argues that he looked differently to different persons and at different times. On the whole, Celsus seems to have the best of the argument.

The compilation of the Jewish Talmud is claimed to have been begun as early as A.D. 180, and completed about A.D. 500. The earlier part, called the Mishna, containing the laws and traditions, was completed about A.D. 220. The later part, called the Gernara, consists of comments mingled with tales and legends. There is a Jerusalem and a Babylonian Talmud.

In these ancient records we read of a Jesus the son of Pandira and of Mary, otherwise called Stada—who transgressed the laws of chastity and separated from her husband. This Mary is several times mentioned in the Talmud as a plaiter of women's hair.

One day several rabbis were sitting at the gate of the city, when two boys passed. One of them, according to custom, covered his head in token of respect; the other, who was Jesus, boldly passed by with his head uncovered. He must be a bastard, said one rabbi; The son of a separated woman, said a second; He is both, said a third. And to prove his assertion the third rabbi went to the market, and finding there the boy's mother selling herbs, assured her of happiness in the world to come if she would confess the true origin of her son. The woman confessed, and the rabbi returned and told his associates that his assertion about the boy was proven true.

Jesus when a young man went to Alexandria in Egypt, with Rabbi Joshua Ben Perachiah, or Perachides. It was in the reign of Jannay who persecuted the rabbins. (King Alexander Jannaus reigned over Judea from 105 to 78 B. C.) After a while, being informed that peace was restored, Jesus and Perachides returned to Judea. On their way they quarreled and were never again reconciled. Jesus then began the practice of magic, which he had learned in Egypt. The Egyptian priests, in order to keep a monopoly of the art, searched everybody who went away lest he should carry with him the secret charm. But Jesus cut open his flesh and hid the charm under his skin. Then Jesus became a conquerer in Judea.

On one occasion he healed the child of a rabbi by pronouncing a magical word, which so horrified the pious father that he said, "Better had it been for the child to die." And straightway the child did die.

This same Jesus, the son of Pandira and Mary, alias Stada, was at last arraigned for sorcery and deception. He was allowed forty days to prepare for trial, but he made no defense. He was condemned to be stoned and hanged in Leed, i. e. Lydda, on the evening of the Passover. (Lydda is situated twenty-two miles northwest of Jerusalem, and twelve miles southeast of Joppa.)

Jesus had five disciples, who were all slain. As they were brought to trial their names were called off and translated thus: Matthai, "when shall I come?" Nakai, "innocent;" Nezer, "branch;" Boni, "my son;" Toda, "a psalm of praise."

Further details from the Talmud concerning Jesus may be found in Lightfoot and Lardner. It is by no means certain or even probable that they all relate to a single Jesus or to a single period.

In another article we shall give some further particulars of the history of the Jewish Jesus derived from an ancient Hebrew manuscript, never before translated into English.

Funeral Service.

The funeral services at the burial of Catherine, daughter of M. J. F. Tonks, of 56 South Fifth avenue, this city, on Thursday, the 23d, were conducted by Mr. A. L. Rawson, member of the Society of Humanity. The friends of the family brought a great quantity of flowers, arranged in several designs, one of which bore in violets, on a ground of white flowers, the pet name, "Kitty;" and another was arranged as a symbol, with a red center surrounded with white and purple flowers in bands and fringed with green leaves. A great number of articles about the room indicated the esteem in which the deceased had been held. The house was well filled with the family and their friends and a few invited guests.

Taking the bouquet in his hand, the speaker said it was a symbol of the faith of the new life, which looks for its heaven on earth. The green border is the world of nature surrounding us; the purple band of flowers is science, exact knowledge classified; the white band was philosophy and art, the selection and grouping and presentation of the best facts and thoughts on any and all subjects of inquiry; the red flowers in the center were the family, the heart of society, from which all the new life radiates through humanity. The whole is a type of the regenerated soul, whose faith is founded on exact and scientifically-arranged and classified knowledge, quickened by the love of humanity, and whose knowing the true and doing the good is an atonement to itself in every good deed. When knowledge is universally distributed, ignorance and crime will be unknown, and peace and good will reign in a heaven here on the earth. Every family can realize this heavenly condition within itself, now, by learning more about the laws of nature, and obeying them. No law can be broken without the penalty following sooner or later. In this case a young life was ended, as it seems to us, far too soon. Some law was broken, and the penalty came in the shape of pneumonia. There can be no blame laid at any one's door in this case, because we are, as a whole, physicians and all, least acquainted with the causes and cure of what is commonly called a cold, frequently the most suddenly fatal of all diseases.

The loss of this daughter and sister may be gain to the family who are left, by bringing them closer together in love and sympathy. She will not then have lived and died in vain, but be worthy of a place in our new calendar of saints. At the head of this list belongs the mother, the divine source of humanity, both material and spiritual; beside her is the father, also a divine source of humanity; then comes the wife, who to the husband becomes first in reality in all true marriages, where the souls are united by true love and the sacred union of the sexes. All sexual union is sacred and should be inviolable. Then follow sisters, brothers, and friends, all those who have done good service in the cause of humanity, in science or art, philosophy or religion. With this calendar of real saints ever present in our mind we strive to increase knowledge and banish ignorance.

The true standard by which to judge of another is by that other's ideals which make up the spiritual life of the person, and also to consider the surroundings and general condition of society. How careful should we be, therefore, on all occasions, in speaking of the supposed character of another, especially of an absent one, who cannot answer or defend by reference to the true motives.

And this brings us to consider the possible state of the absent one. I have always cherished the hope of immortality—a life beyond the grave, where we shall meet those whom we have loved here. Such may yet be the future of humanity revived, or as the Greek poets said, passed on into the light of the brighter world among the gods. But we can know nothing certain about the condition of the soul after the death of the body. No one has returned to life after death to tell us about that future state. We have, therefore, to give our attention to the things of this life here on the earth, without wasting precious time and energy on the supposed heaven in the clouds, peopled by supposed gods, which we now know to be nothing more than the laws of nature personified. If there is any power, material or spiritual, above or superior to nature's laws, we are not able to comprehend it. We are limited in our capacity for knowledge by our senses, and can have no information through any other agents—there are no other agents of information for us besides our senses. With our senses scientifically trained to act, we may advance in culture, elevate ourselves and our surroundings, and make this world a fitter place for home and the higher pleasures of life. In the new faith, human prevision and prevention, and sympathy and relief, are to take the place of the old illusion called divine providence. Human providence is with us and can be felt and relied on. The well-springs of consolation are within our own bosom, in the care of reason itself. We look for no miracles, we ask for no infraction of law, both of which would work confusion; but we do look for the means of adapting ourselves to the imperfect condition of things around us, for we know that in spite of external wrongs and adverse circumstances the substance of happiness or of misery is to be found within our own mind. The soul that cannot help itself in these times of trial is not yet ripe, and needs tuition and culture. The strong, healthy soul revives the eternal ideas of the progress and destinies of mankind, and renders the dead loved one immortal and worshiped in the truest sense. We must work for the family diligently in our proper calling, coöperating with others in promoting the general prosperity and welfare of our fellow-creatures, and in the enjoyment of the beautiful in nature and in art. This home is still beautiful, and can be made more so by the exertion and coöperation of its inmates. The dead will live in your hearts, a gentle and loving reminder of the end towards which we are all moving. Knowledge of the inevitable laws of nature will give us courage to meet the end whenever it comes, and to look on the close of life as we now view the close of a day, as an event natural and beneficial, by which the forces of life are changed and renewed. Death and life go hand in hand, as the ancients symbolized them to us, death and resurrection, the sunset and sunrise, the ceaseless round of the seasons; the human race ever dying, ever living. We are only parts of the great whole. Let us try to learn our true position and our fitness for the place, and to be content when the end comes.

Splinters from the Liberal Club.

It is always useful to see one theologian upset another. That is the way in which that race of animals gets slaughtered the most cheaply. We have not to spend our time upon them, and it is always a great gain when we can make two varieties annihilate each other.

The whole trouble with the theologians is their anthropomorphism; they are trying to make out a God as though he was a man, and they have produced a bundle of contradictions.—T. B. Wakeman.

You cannot ask God to cure evil or abolish the devil. He could not do it, and if did it would be suicide. He could not exist himself without a devil. The devil has existed in all religions. Even in Positivism we cannot get along without a theoretical devil and hell. And as I have often said, a religion without a devil and without a hell is not worth a damn.—T. B. Wakeman.

If you have a God you must have a devil, and if you have a devil you must have a hell, for even a devil must have a house and home and some employment.—T. B. Wakeman.

Men contend that human reason is to settle all of the great questions of philosophy, that it is through the medium of logic that we are to work out these various problems; but fortunately theology, and particularly Christianity, has never pretended to base itself upon reason.—Herman H. Shook.

Take that man, Anthony Comstock; he may have no more goodness than the devil, but give him the power ascribed to God and he would put all the literature and all the women that don't agree with him out of existence at once.—Dr. Hallock.

You have heard of the Egyptian myth about some king who made a labyrinth covered all over so that the sky could not be seen, in which the man who got in wandered about and could never get out, because the light was shut out. So it is in this great labyrinth in which we are moving around; when we begin to reason and think, these theological gentlemen have got a book which they shut right down over us which keeps the light of nature out.—Dr. Hallock.

The devil is the result of a struggle for existence. Of a host of devils of many varieties he is the survivor; whether the fittest or not, I shall not say. He is only the latest of a numerous race of devils, not always called by that name, but bearing different titles, that have flourished in our world. It is a singular fact that there is no devil in the Old Testament. The two or three supposed reference to a devil are susceptible of an entirely different interpretation. We have our devil introduced to us in the New Testament accompanied by a crowd of new ideas, like the Holy Ghost. The Old Testament has no Holy Ghost. He or it was evoluted with the devil, which is an importation from Persia brought back by the Jews after the Babylonish captivity, crossed with some fine specimens of Greek mythological satyrs, and god Pans, and the devil we now have is the result. It is an interesting example of the struggle for life, of Darwinism applied to diabolism.—Porter C. Bliss.

Mr. Chapman's Closing Remarks.

Mr. Hammond: I did not provoke this discussion which has drawn forth personalities doing no credit to either of us. Instead of carrying on a controversy which will render our fellow-beings' condition no better, nor enlighten them how to extricate themselves from the galling yoke, let us endeavor to assist in removing those obstacles which now are eating the bone and sinew of the entire laboring class.

I am very much pleased to find that you do not justify Congress in giving away the people's lands and money to railroads, and that you think it would be better for all mankind not to use rum and tobacco.

The question of abortion I do not care to discuss. I have had no experience of it whatever; my observations and the testimonies of others have fully convinced me that it prevails among the rich. If not so, why do abortionists concentrate in the cities, and locate in their wealthiest purlieus? Madame Restell resided on Fifth avenue among the wealthiest, where she accumulated a large fortune, and it is evident that she could not have acquired it from poor people.

Mr. Hammond, it was very foolish of you to fire at nothing; and still more so when I placed nothing before you the second time to kick and fire again. Please do not be so foolish hereafter?

I hope Mr. Hammond will aid his fellow-men in securing the lands from the grasp of monopolies, and in making laws that will give each person free access to that portion of the earth required to support him. If we cannot accomplish it in our day, then let us work for the freedom of our posterity, even if death were our only reward. Without love for each other, we are brutes caring only for ourselves; and to live for others is a splended thought; and to die for a good cause is a noble sacrifice.

A BIBLE LESSON.

BY A. DAMPHOOL.

"The adulteress shall surely be put to death."—Lev. xx. 10.

No idle words, no light authority; "Thus saith the Lord." And a man has been found who believes in and practices the teachings of the Bible, and who has the nerve to be consistent. He has taken that good book as the man of his counsel; he seeks advice from it when he is in trouble or doubt. Lately he learned that his daughter had committed adultery. Distracted with grief, he turned to his Bible for advice and consolation as in duty bound. He read the above words. Here was what suited the case exactly. "But she is my daughter." "No matter," said the promptings of the Holy Spirit; "Isaac was Abraham's only son, yet when the Almighty ordered him to slay that son, he faltered not. 'He that loveth son or daughter better than me, is not worthy of me.' 'If ye love me, keep my commandments.'"

He knew that the law of the land would not enforce the divine command, but he dared not hesitate, even if his own life were forfeited. Relying upon the promise of Jehovah, he closed the holy book, and told his daughter to take a walk with him. A certain good Bible man had cut his daughter in quarters when she was innocent; his daughter was guilty. Unsuspecting as little Isaac was when his father invited him out for a similar purpose by a divine command, she went with him. The father picked up a heavy stone—"Ye shall stone them to death with stones; thus shall ye put away wickedness from among you"—told his now trembling daughter what they were come for, and bade her offer up a last prayer to the God she had offended, before she was ushered into his presence. Instead of doing so, she made her prayer to him, her father; but to the tearful earnestness of that prayer, made on her bended knees, he turned a deaf ear. He then commenced to carry out the holy will of God by beating his defenseless child on the head with the stone. Finding her pitiful prayer of no avail, the poor bruised creature tried to escape, and ran a little distance; but he overtook her and pounded her head into a jelly. When the will of his God was accomplished, he considered what next to do. He knew that he had obeyed God, but he also knew that the law of Ohio would not be pious enough to sanction him in "following the dictates of his own conscience." He was not insane; he was consistently pious. He had a clear conscience and an abiding faith in his God; it remained to be seen which was the strongest, the power of Almighty God, or the puny authority of the State of Ohio.

He went and voluntarily gave himself into the hands of the law. He told the officers just what he had done, why he had done it, and where to find his child's corpse. Had he been insane, he would have wandered about unconscious of any offense. But he knew just what he had done—knew what law he had violated, and where to find its officers. He is now awaiting trial. If the doctrine that could breed such Christians were not more to blame than he is, the infuriated populace would have taken him out and hung him long ago.

Fellow Liberals, what are we coming to? What do you think of this religious fruit, grown under a law which says that all men may obey the dictates of conscience? What shall be done with this man? Of course we must expect that Christians will defend him, and the law that granted him freedom of conscience, but what is to become of us, when they get God into the Constitution? May we not fare about as fared this girl?

HANNIBAL, MARION CO., MO., May 28, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I have never before had the pleasure of writing to you, but the cause of Liberalism for which you are so energetically striving, and the good you have accomplished in arousing our dormant intellects to a lively appreciation of the great struggle between science and theology, superstition and the bright sun-light of literary genius, is my excuse for addressing you so cordially. Yes, we all feel that you are dear to us while defending so justly the right, battling the wrong for the true. May Father Time lay his hand gently upon you, and may life with its onward march to eternity, be to you like a placid stream in its flow to the mighty ocean.

The Liberal element in our midst would be very strong and effective if properly organized, and Mr. David Jenkins, your agent here, is striving to attain so desirable a result, but, at present, it is rather vacillating and disposed to waive outspoken sentiment to popularity of opinions. In the future we may have a better report to make of Liberal progress than at present, at least we trust so.

Very respectfully, A. R. CLEMENT.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., May 28, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am pained exceedingly that our good, high-toned Bro. Abbot of The Index should have felt it his duty to censure you in the manner he has in this Comstock affair. Learning is good, culture and refinement are good, scientific attainments are very useful, and it is possible for a person to possess all these good qualities, and yet prostitute them to a bad purpose in advocating a bad cause, or in upholding mean, treacherous, filthy, and contemptible vagabonds like Comstock when he is attempting to destroy men a thousand times his superiors in moral worth, in good principles, and in their daily life, to his rotten, obscene, and filthy self.

Liberals cannot afford to waste their time and energies in wrangling with each other, but there are principles underlying the structure of Liberalism—equal rights, and free thought—which we should not suffer to be assailed by a man so low and debased as Anthony Comstock, or by any other man, no matter of how much moral worth, how great his literary and scientific attainments, or however good his intentions. The conservative course that friend Abbot has taken in your matter, the sanction given to the schemes of Anthony, and the nice distinctions he has drawn in favor of tyranny, religious bigotry, intolerance, persecution, and oppression, have not, in my opinion, been commendable to him as a learned, Liberal, and judicious editor of a worthy and popular Freethought paper like The Index, and had he felt the iron heel of despotism as severely as you did, perhaps it might have materially changed his views.

You, on account of your plain, outspoken, and positive manner of expressing your views, and because they oppose the popular orthodox religion of to-day, and because of the growing popularity of THE TRUTH SEEKER among the people, have been selected by the dissipated Anthony, as the particular object of his venom and malignity that he sought to remove out of the way, and you would have suffered at his hands had it not been for the mass of Liberals in this country who rose as a man almost, to help squelch this infamous persecutor of free thought and free speech. I should hope the editor of The Index was not envious of your success, as you have earned it all by persistent hard work, and a firm iron will, guided by a high moral purpose to do right, and bless humanity by delivering them from the superstitions and errors of the past, with a laudable ambition for making people better and happier in this world.

Your last to The Index should be sufficient. It is candid, square, fair, and manly, and I think a credit to yourself in your own self-defense and should be heartily endorsed by the Liberals throughout the country. I hope it may be satisfactory to the highly cultured editor of The Index, whom we all so highly esteem, and hope ever after he may be found upon the right track. Yours for the rights of all,

R. C. TROWBRIDGE.

DECEPTIVE SENSATIONS.

BRO. BENNETT: The case referred to by your maimed correspondent, Dr. Chapman, is not an isolated one by any means. Many persons have suffered severely from the creeping, biting, and tickling of supposed vermin between the toes of a limb which had been amputated; and careless Spiritualists have asserted that it was a spiritual nerve that was suffering. This loose way of explaining phenomena has been no little damage to the cause of Spiritualism. People of a scientific turn of mind have thought that a class of people so careless in their exposition of natural phenomena cannot be trusted as exponents of the phenomena of Spiritualism.

This phenomenon is quite frequently manifested in persons with perfectly sound limbs. Sometimes the most terrible itchings and tormenting pains will be felt at the extremity of the nerve, and the physician will make all kinds of outlandish applications to relieve the pseudo-affected part when there is nothing whatever the matter with it. The nerves of the extremities have independent lines running to the sensorium, and any difficulty felt at any part of the nerve seems to be at its extreme end at the corpuscle, as when a person strikes the elbow, the fingers become numb. In the jar of the elbow there there are two sensations, one in the corpuscles of the nerves terminating at the point of contact, the other in the corpuscles of the nerve terminating in the fingers. It is well that non-professional people should understand this, as well as doctors, that they may be able to prevent the empiric from damaging a member of the body from doctoring at the wrong place. These are some of the difficulties which I wish to explain in my lectures on hygiene and the nerves. D. W. HULL, M. D.

Montgomery, Ind.

ROCKFORD, ILL., May 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Since you have given my two former letters a place in your valuable paper, I feel still more emboldened to ask for further space to eliminate the philosophy of Spiritualism from the mists in which some seem to find it surrounded: and I feel the more so since in your reply to brother Stebbins you evince the idea of your giving your adhesion to the belief in a future state of existence. And, by the by, I find several suggestions in brother Stebbins' letter to which I would like to reply. But since you have consigned that task to our friend Moses, to Moses it must go. And I doubt not that he is much more capable of doing the subject justice than my humble self. But as my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER was instrumental in causing some inquiring letters to be sent to me in regard to the principles of Spiritualism and spirit manifestations, and their teachings, and, also, being convinced that there are many seekers after the truth or falsity of this philosophy who are yet very much in the dark as to its teachings, I would like to say, through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, something of what its teachings are to me. Not that I would wish to put forth any set of doctrines or creed for others to follow, being satisfied that there are no two persons who think exactly alike on all subjects; and more especially is this the case in regard to thinkers and investigators of religious teaching. And herein is the beauty of fostering and encouraging free thought and untrammeled investigation; for as there are no two pebbles on the seashore, or leaves on the trees, or flowers of the field, which are just alike; and as there is exhibited all through the arcana of nature this universal law of diversity, producing a universal harmony, so ought it to be in the realm of thought. And it is in this same spirit of tolerance that I would speak of the subject of Spiritualism.

Were I asked for an explanation of what spirit is, I would frankly say, I cannot tell; but from the manner in which it manifests itself to me, I should say that I think that it partakes more of the nature of electricity than any other principle to which I can compare it. But, doubtless, to another class of thinkers—such as our good brother Stebbins, for instance—this would be very vague and unsatisfactory. They would, most likely, want to know whether it was composed of gases, such as oxygen and hydrogen, and what might be its specific gravity, and how much and what kind of food it consumed per day. To such I can give no satisfactory answer; but from the sounds that it makes around me, and the force with which it touches me, and the electric shock which it gives me (which at times is more powerful than I ever received from a galvanic battery), I know that it possesses force. If asked whether it can make itself visible to the natural eye, I would reply that it has never done so to me but twice that I am positive of, and that was in the form of vapor; and these instances occurred at two separate times, about two months apart, during the past winter, when I was sitting alone in my room. The first time I was figuring, and the next time I was reading, and each time it continued to pass before me, not three feet from my face, for the space of several minutes.

If asked whether it can talk or not, I should say that I think not—unless it can get the use of vocal organs, or the organs of speech—any more than the air can make harmonious sounds without some kind of a musical instrument to make them with. Yet if a spirit possesses physical power enough to control some other spirit which is in the natural possession of a physical body, then I see no reason why it may not use that body either to speak or write or give other manifestations of its presence.

If asked whether a spirit cannot manufacture or materialize a body of its own, I must confess that I have not examined the subject of materialization sufficiently to pass an opinion upon that subject. One year ago last November I attended two seances at Bastian and Taylor's in Chicago, when what purported to be spirits came out of the cabinet and moved chairs from in front of the cabinet door and sat down in them, and walked out into the room arm in arm with those of their friends whom they had come there to meet and converse with; and one spirit each evening would dematerialize before the audience, appearing to sink down through the floor, and commence from the floor and again materialize to its full height. But after seeing all of these and many more wonderful things there, I cannot say that I am now fully converted to believing in materialization, although if there was a fraud in the operation I was unable to detect it. But our materializing mediums are being pretty thoroughly tested all over the country, and if they are frauds I most certainly hope that they may be exposed. And if the manifestations are genuine, and it is finally demonstrated beyond a doubt that materialization is a fact, and that our friends who have passed to spirit life can under any conditions return and make themselves known to us in this way, I do not know of any reason for us to be afraid of it.

And, furthermore, if materialization is proved to be a fraud and a humbug, it does not affect, one way or another, the grand truth of our spirit friends being with us, trying as they may to help us in the struggles of life, and trying to lead us into a better life. Nor does it affect the blessed assurance we have of a life hereafter. And its teaching, that the better and purer our lives are here, the better we shall be fitted to enjoy the next life, is grand and noble teaching to me, and should be an incentive to us to try to build up good and noble characters. I have no faith in the miraculous or supernatural; but I believe that all things, past, present, or future, have been, are, and will be controlled by natural law. And as all of the workings of that law in the past have demonstrated an evolvement for the better—a progression into higher and better forms of development—so we should continually seek for higher development, and by so doing we shall attain a greater degree of happiness. How men and women who are really and honestly Spiritualists, and believers in certain retribution for every breach of natural laws, can live bad or impure lives is truly wonderful.

We, as Spiritualists, can ill afford to take as our example and rule of life the acts and teachings of those who believe that, at any time they choose, they can, by simply asking some unknown power, have all of their sins forgiven, and the bad effects of all of their past lives removed, and immediately become as pure and spotless as new-born babes. It is a lamentable fact that many, far too many, do as it is said one did of old, who, after living a life of licentiousness and folly, when he had become too old to any longer find pleasure or enjoyment in his former dissipations and follies, was led to exclaim, "Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, all is vanity!" This kind of teaching will not do for us. Having no scapegoat for our sins, it stands us instead to live such lives as shall tend to our best and highest betterment here, and, as a natural result of good living, secure for us better and more exalted entrance into a brighter and more glorious hereafter.

Respectfully yours for the truth, F. F. FOLLET.

P. S.—There is much that I would like to say on this subject of Spiritualism through THE TRUTH SEEKER. People are down on Spiritualism more through ignorance of its real teachings than from any other cause. They merely read what they see in the secular papers, about the exposures and the frauds, and immediately call it a humbug, without taking the least pains to give it an investigation. I am not surprised at the narrow-minded and bigoted orthodox doing this, but it does hurt me to see thinkers and Liberals following in their wake. I know that it is to be lamented that Spiritualists do not live up to what they teach, yet we must remember that they are but human, and are too apt to do as others do. F. F. F.

LATER.—May 23. MR. BENNETT: When I made mention, in my communication of the 20th inst., in regard to attending Bastian and Taylor's materialization seances in November, 1876, I had not heard or read anything about their being exposed. In fact, I had never heard anything against the genuineness of the manifestations seen there until last night, in looking over the Religio-Philosophical Journal of May 18, at a friend's house, where I was stopping over night. (I am not a subscriber for the Journal, only get a chance to read it occasionally as I visit my Spiritualistic friends around the country.) Neither had I seen anything of the Mott exposé, except the extract from the New York Times in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can give no reason why I made mention of the Bastian and Taylor seances in my letter. It was certainly with no desire to either throw favor or disfavor upon materialization. I most heartily hope the whole matter in regard to materialization may have a thorough testing and sifting, and if it is all a fraud and humbug, the sooner it is exposed the better. I, for one, feel (and I think that I speak the hearty sentiment of every true Spiritualist) that Spiritualism cannot afford to bolster up frauds.

Yours, F. F. FOLLET.

MERCHANTS AVE., CLEVELAND, O., May 21, 1878.

Mr. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: I take this opportunity of expressing my heart-felt thanks to you for the bold and fearless manner in which you answer all inquirers for truth and facts concerning the great problem of life as you understand it. Go on, brother; do not get discouraged and hide the great light of facts as you have found them. It matters little to the human family how facts are obtained, whether it is through the organisms of the despised mediums or through the sciences of astronomy, geology, chemistry, or evolution, so we can get at knowledge and facts. If you have received evidence through the mediumship of Mrs. Lord's organism, and learnt that there is something more than we have ever dreamt of in our philosophy, and by the solicitation of Mr. J. Newell for you to give your evidence in reference to a continued life after death of the physical body, Brother Bennett; in reply to the request of Mr. J. Newell concerning what evidence you could produce to prove a future life, is your business and not mine, nor Dr. George F. Rockwell's. I shall take the opposite opinion of your criticism to Dr. Rockwell and others who have written to you saying they were much pained at your opinions, for I am free to say that I am willing for you to express your opinions and give your evidence on any topic of which you have been asked by others to do, and as I cannot agree with you I will agree to disagree and will not compel you to agree with me.

It seems to worry Dr. George F. Rockwell and others who have written to you, saying they were much pained and troubled that you might establish the fact of a continuous life after the body has dissolved, and returned to its original elements. For my part, I would greet this as one of the greatest boons the universe could confer upon me, as this life is so short that I cannot grasp but a few of the facts and little of the knowledge which make mankind happy, great, and wise. Although I am a Materialist in the full sense of the word, I can comprehend but a small amount of the great material of the universe. There are the imponderable gases undergoing a continual change which I cannot comprehend; there is electricity, animal magnetism (which is all material or matter which I cannot understand, but which the scientists may some time explain and make it clear and discernible to our intellects). I, however, wish to say a few words in behalf of the Spiritualists, as to their being called orthodox. They are, as a body, as free from it as Liberals. Their society at Cleveland, Ohio, I have for a number of years attended very often for the reason that we as Materialists and Infidels have not been sufficiently strong to continue our lectures and lyceums for want of money to pay rent and other necessary expenses. I have found in the society of Spiritualists a free platform for all Liberals, Infidels, and Atheists to express their thoughts and ideas just as freely as any could be in a society of Liberals.

Dr. George F. Rockwell is alarmed and fearful that you may run after strange gods because you have intimated that it might be so arranged by the laws of the universe that man has a continuous life after the death of the body; so he has undertaken to criticise and reprove you for your opinion, asking you so many foolish questions—whether you have not embraced the doctrine of Spiritualism, and is not Spiritualism only another phase of orthodox religion, and saying that the Bible teaches Spiritualism as much as it teaches anything. If you believe in Spiritualism you must accept the Bible as being inspired and you must renounce your belief that the universe possesses powers and forces adequate to the production of organized life; and you must believe that man has a soul and that that soul is immortal; and more, you must believe in the existence of a god, and asks how you, in your senility, can abandon reason and science for ghosts and spirits. I [he] would ask you if modern Spiritualism has not been proven to be a stupendous humbug; and finally, I [he] would say that if you have concluded to go with the Spiritualists THE TRUTH SEEKER is doomed. Now, Brother Rockwell, wait a moment. Our beautiful, scientific TRUTH SEEKER will not be doomed as long as D. M. Bennett is its editor, and he keeps its columns open for the investigation of scientific facts. Brother Bennett, fear not to express your knowledge or opinions on all subjects, especially if asked by your constituents. Go on with the good work that you have begun. Do not fear nor falter in doing right. Express your opinion on all subjects as you have arrived at truth from your standpoint regardless of the opinions of Brother G. F. Rockwell, myself, or those other brothers of the orthodox, straight-jacket Materialist or Atheist grumblers. Give us the truth as you find it from your standpoint, and then let us answer your opinions by scientific facts, showing to the world that you are mistaken in your investigation—that we have tested it and proved it to be a false theory, and show how you were deceived and how millions of other minds have been deceived on this problem of Spiritualism. I am not prepared to say "humbug," and give no other argument to the contrary as long as there are many great, scientific minds who were Materialists and Atheists, who have investigated, and undertaken to prove by science that Spiritualism is in accord with some law of nature.

Brother Bennett, I will send to you two dollars to continue my paper for one year, and at the expiration of that time I will try to have enough money earned and laid by to pay for the paper another year, for I wish to have the TRUTH SEEKER in my family as I do prize it as much as my brother, George F. Rockwell, does, who says truly that THE TRUTH SEEKER is freighted with scientific truths which the hungry, inquiring mind so much relishes, and, I add, so much needs to make the human family the better for it.

Truly yours, JAMES M. WIGHT.

LUNENBURG, MASS., May 26, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I want to write you a letter—a real earnest letter—and I want you to print it in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am, I believe, the only living man who has not written you a letter, or written a letter about you, either in praise or censure; and, inasmuch as you hold to free thinking, free speaking, and free reading, you must needs hold to free printing and a free transportation of the printed word; and if some demi-god has got astride of the mail-bags, and we can't unhorse his holiness, why, send from "over the river" for our noble Leggett to inaugurate a new mail service, and set adrift Uncle Sam and his hired railways to skin their own eels. The foregoing embraces the primary tenets of my religion, creed, or psalm—just as you please to have it. But this is not half of my declaration of faith. I believe there is nothing in the vast universe too holy or too profane, too pure or too obscene, too comely or too ugly, for the thought, sight, hearing, and knowledge of man, woman, and child, or any other existence, superior or inferior; and it comes with an ill grace from those who say that God made everything in the universe just as nice as he knew how, to come forward and tell men seventy years old that not half the world is fit to be seen or talked about, and more than half—the most vital to life and life's success—is wicked, vulgar, and obscene. God save us from his friends—from those who have such care of him and us—all the way from Comstock to Abbot, who have just now locked hands in the holy crusade against naked babies and books treating on the natal and ante-natal relations, conditions, and surroundings of naked babies. Let the dear little nakeds die, until such times as mothers grow modest enough to robe their offspring before birth—at least before Comstock and Abbot get their immaculate eyes upon the little naked innocents.

I see many people are alarmed at what they call an increase of libidinous publications. These same people get up a scare on anything that they can turn to cash or reputation. They mistake "reputation" for character; hence this show-off about the "corruptions of our youth;" the secret vices of other folks; the dangers of other people. In all this array of moral solicitude I detect nothing but priestcraft and doctor-craft locking arms, cheek by jowl, to propagate ignorance on matters that have heretofore brought profitable grists to their mills. These Comstock laws were up at the Paine anniversary last winter; the wisest men in our communion were there, and it was humiliating to see our giants shiver in the wind of reputation. You, yourself, sir, are weak-kneed in this struggle. Dare you ignore all our best anthropotomists, anthropologists, and physiologists? So be it; Mr. Abbot will give you his cultured Chestnut street glove, and Comstock his Christian mittens. I understand all about Mr. Sargent's parlors. They, up there, can't eat beans with a two-tined fork, even when the guests and in the pay of hard-worked mechanics who are minus cultured clerical forks with five tines. Do these godly, cultured people think other people fools? What shall be done with Drs. Carpenter, Graham, Nichols, Trall, Treat, H. C. Wright, and a houseful of men, to say nothing of the ancients like Moses and Aristotle, who have devoted their lives to the living faith that the race must be made better through knowledge of themselves? Did those saints ever see a coalpit break and blaze? The colliers sometimes get burned.

I have long looked for one young man ruined by pictures, books, cards, or candy figures, to five hundred ruined by the liquors, meats, and examples of their homes. Read Sylvester Graham's addresses to young men on the sexual function, and test their potency in debauching young people with a bottle of wine, brandy, or rum. "Bar-rooms and brothels" are ever nearer neighbors than lewd books and vices of any sort.

A. H. WOOD.

WAMEGO, KAN., May 22, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I send you by this mail two Memphis (Mo.) papers with statements in regard to the Mott exposure. I noticed the article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 18th. About two years ago I spent a week at Mr. Mott's house in Memphis, and attended seances there. There is no doubt in my mind that he is a genuine medium, and I believe that he and his people are honest, truthful people. While I was at his house I had every chance to investigate the phenomena that a person could expect to have, and saw no evidence of fraud. Very respectfully,

LOUIS B. LEACH.

ANAHEIM, CAL., May 17, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: Dear Sir: Please don't stop my paper, for at last I have obtained three dollars to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER. To me it is invaluable. We look for it with the greatest interest. If it is allowed to die the world will miss its truth-illumined pages.

I feel much interested in Lois Waisbrooker's, Macdonald's, Hammond's, Chapman's, Marshal's, and Thompson's thoughtful words on finance, and last of all the exposé of Payne given by O. H. Lowery. Will he please be so kind as to inform us whether he meant it as a sneer against her sex, or a great compliment, to call Alice Huntly Payne the head of the establishment, while he styles her "better half "both a fool and a knave"? "The Rage of the Age" proves that she has brains, if we do not get the remainder. I dislike to feel that perhaps its author is lacking bread, even if she is owned by a fool or knave. One thing is evident: his contemptible story about you only proves that he is without brains if his wife does have a man's head.

Never fear but that inquiry is abroad with sleepless eyes. Superstition's throne is trembling under the sturdy blows given by word and pen. When women like MRS. E. D. Slenker appeal to the reason, and dare to call in question gods, devils, heaven, and hell it shows that the power of priestcraft is doomed. If the priests wish to make a living by talking they had better read H. W. Beecher's lecture on "The Burdens and Wastes of Society" and profit by it.

"Never to old to learn" would be a good motto for all who attempt to live by the superstitious devotion of mankind to some mysterious, unfathomable, unknowable, unfindable, incomprensible being called Almighty God.

May you succeed is the highest wish of your friend,

MRS. KATE PARKER.

Tucker vs. Comstock.

We clip the following from the Boston Post:

May 23, 1878.

To the Editor of the Boston Post:

Having been the innocent occasion, yesterday afternoon, of some disturbance at Anthony Comstock's meeting in Park street vestry, and the affair having been variously reported and misrepresented in this morning's newspapers, I deem it best, with your permission, to make a statement to the public through your columns, of the facts as they actually occurred. Hearing on Monday last that such a meeting was to be held for the purpose of furthering Mr. Comstock's pretended anti-obscenity movement in New England—a movement which I have closely watched from its inception with an eye ever jealous in the interest of liberty of thought, speech, and action—I procured a ticket, and attended the meeting, that I might be a quiet witness of Mr Comstock's method of procuring the aid and sympathy of the public by deceiving it as to his real intent. As I sat listening to his speech, which overflowed with statements which I knew to be false, he suddenly singled me out for attack, saying to the audience that one sat in their midst who was in active sympathy with the venders of obscene literature; that I had followed him since 1873, that I made it my business to attend obscenity trials, Freelove meetings, and smut leagues; that, whenever he looked at me, scorn was upon my face, and that my sneer had become unendurable. Then, at the demand of the audience, he pointed me out; whereupon, his excited hearers clamoring for a better opportunity of seeing this monster of iniquity which had been painted, I arose and pronounced Mr. Comstock, on the strength of the facts which I am about to relate, "a liar." And I submit that, considering the circumstances—standing as I did, slandered before an audience of intolerant, enraged, and threatening Christian clergymen—I was amply justified in the plainness of my speech.

In answer to his false assertions, let me say that no man excels me in detestation of obscenity. Instead of following Mr. Comstock, I have seen him only a few times: First, early in 1874, in New York, at the trial of Woodhull, Claflin, and Blood on a charge of libeling Luther C. Challis—a trial which both of us attended, and which resulted in the unanimous acquittal of the defendants by a jury which included among its members the editor of "The Galaxy," and the branding of Mr. Comstock's friend Challis, before the community, as guilty of the offenses charged; second at the examination and trial of E. H. Heywood in this city, on a charge of mailing obscene literature, the conviction of the defendant being secured by a charge from the judge almost unexampled for bitterness and malignity. With these exceptions I never saw Mr. Comstock until the meeting of yesterday afternoon. It is barely possible that he has seen me once or twice at Freelove conventions, though I doubt it very much; I certainly never saw him at one. I have never exchanged a word with him, and I hope I never may. Scarcely a moment's attention have I bestowed upon him personally, and the only feeling I have for him is one of utter contempt. I have at various times publicly criticised his movement, and, during my editorship of the "Radical Review," published an article against it. This is the extent of my offending. If Mr. Comstock has ever observed an expression of scorn upon my face, I will guarantee it was a faithful representation of my real feeling. If my contempt for him is a source of annoyance to him, as he confesses, he can at any moment change it into high respect by leaving off minding other people's business and tending faithfully to some legitimate business of his own. Until he does thus make himself a useful citizen, I fear he will have to endure my "scorn and sneer" with what little grace he can command.
